2. It is urged by the defendant that by the contract of shipment it was provided: "That as a condition precedent to a recovery for any damage for delay, loss, or injury to live stock covered by this contract, the second party will give notice in writing of the claim therefor to some general officer or the nearest station agent of the first party, or to the agent at destination, or some general officer of the delivering line, before such stock is removed from the point of shipment, or from the place of destination, and before such stock is mingled with other stock, such written notification to be served within one day after the delivery of such stock at destination, to the end that such claim shall be fully and fairly investigated; and that a failure to fully comply with the provisions of this clause shall be a bar to the recovery of any and all such claims." The defendant contends that this provision of the contract was made upon sufficient consideration and was therefore valid, and that the plaintiff did not give the above notice and is therefore barred from a recovery herein. From the agreed statement of facts it appears that when the plaintiff delivered his property for carriage at Mayfield, Ky., he received from the carrier at that point a contract for through shipment to Harrison, Ark., for which he paid the full rate that was required, and that in that contract the above provision as to notice did not appear; but, on the contrary, that contract provided that the claim for damages should be made to the agent of the company at the point of destination within 10 days from the time said stock was removed from the cars. When the car arrived at Memphis, Tenn., it was turned over to the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company for further transportation, and that company, without taking up the original contract of shipment entered into by plaintiff with the Illinois Central Railroad Company, thereupon entered into a second written contract with plaintiff for the further carriage to the same destination, in which contract is the above provision of limitation of liability for failure to give notice within the reduced time. There was no further consideration given upon the execution of this last contract, other than the carriage by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company as the connecting carrier. The original contract of shipment was still retained by plaintiff. In the determination of this case it is not necessary to pass upon the question as to whether there was any consideration for the execution by plaintiff of this second contract of shipment, so as to make its clauses of limitation of liability binding and valid, because we think that there was a sufficient compliance with the provisions of the second contract as well as the provisions of the first contract of shipment relative to the giving of notice of claim of damages.

The agreed statement of facts shows that the car with its goods and live stock arrived at Harrison, Ark., on February 19, 1907, at 4 o'clock p. m., and that the entire shipment in the car was not unloaded until the morning of February 21, 1907, so that the entire shipment was not delivered until that time. The plaintiff began unloading the car late in the evening of February 19th, and the taking of the live stock out to his farm, a distance of $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles, where they were not mingled with other stock before the hereinafter mentioned notice was given. Upon the morning of February 21st, the entire shipment was unloaded and delivered, and on the same morning, about 8 o'clock a. m., the plaintiff told the agent of defendant at Harrison, Ark., of his claim of damages. The agent then told plaintiff that he had better make out his claim, and plaintiff then asked him if it was necessary to make it out in writing, and the agent then said "he would guess so." The plaintiff at once made out a written claim for damages, to which he called the attention of defendant's agent, to which the agent offered no objection or protest. Now, the place where property is to be delivered by the carrier is at the usual place for making such delivery at the point of destination, unless the specific place is named in the contract of shipment. In this case there was no evidence which indicated where the usual place of delivery was at the point of destination, and no place was named in the contract. In the absence of such proof, the plaintiff had the right in the course of unloading this property and stock to take the same to some place for care and protection, which was within a reasonable distance of the car, before it can be said that there was a completed removal of same within the meaning of this provision of the contract, and under the above provision of the contract and the circumstances of this case we do not think that a removal of the stock to the farm of plaintiff, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the car, was an unreasonable distance. 6 Cyc. 467.

The plaintiff was entitled to a reasonable time in which to remove his property and stock, and we cannot say that the time required by plaintiff for such removal in this case was unreasonable. 2 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 712. The shipment was made in one car, and the carriage of same was indivisible. The carriage was not completed until there was a delivery at the destination. So that the delivery of the shipment was indivisible, and the delivery of no part of the shipment was completed until the delivery of the entire shipment was made, provided same was removed within a reasonable time. 6 Cyc. 465. Under the agreed statement of facts therefore we find that within one day after the removal and delivery of the stock and shipment the plaintiff gave notice in writing of his claim for damages to the agent of defendant at destination and before the stock was mingled with other stock. This was a sufficient compliance with the terms of the contract of shipment relative to the giving of notice of claim of damages.

We are of the opinion therefore that there is sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the court, and that its judgment based thereon is correct. *

The judgment is affirmed.

ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO. v. RUTTAN.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 19, 1909.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 8*) — PROPERTY SUBJECT TO PRESCRIPTION — RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY.

The statute of limitation operates against the right of way of a railroad which is held adversely, as well as against lands of individuals.

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 31*) — NOTORIOUS POSSESSION—NOTICE.

Where a grant to a railroad conveyed a strip 100 feet wide through certain lots, a deed thereafter executed by the grantors to such lots, "except that part upon which the track of the * * * railroad is laid," constitutes notice of a claim of ownership of all that part except that covered by the track.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Crawford County; J. H. Evans, Judge.

Action by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company against J. M. Ruttan. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Evans and B. R. Davidson, for appellant. Sam R. Chew, for appellee.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. This is an action instituted by appellant railroad company against appellee to recover possession of a strip of land in the city of Van Buren, Ark., originally embraced in the right of way conveyed to the company in the year 1882 by the then owners of the land, Cyrus Lomax and Oliver Maxey. The grant to the railroad company conveyed a strip 100 feet wide through lots 1, 2, and 3 of block 20 in the city of Van Buren, and the company proceeded to lay the main track of its railroad in the center of the right of way thus granted. Lomax and Maxey thereafter executed to one Miller deeds conveying said lots, "except that part upon which the track of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company is laid," and in 1893 Miller took possession of the land in controversy and held it until he conveyed it to Mary Carter, who in turn conveyed it, in 1896, to appellee. It is agreed that appellee and his grantors Miller and Mary Carter before him have held actual, open, and continuous possession of the strip of land in controversy, claiming to be the owners thereof, since the year 1893. The strip in controversy is inclosed, with the remainder of appellee's premises, by a fence running parallel with the railroad track, and this particular part has, during the period of time described above, been cultivated as a garden. It is also agreed that the officials and employees of the railroad company knew that the strip in controversy was fenced and in the actual occupancy of appellee and his grantors, but had no actual notice that they claimed ownership. On these facts the trial court, sitting as a jury, rendered judgment for appellee on his plea of the statute of limitations, and the company appealed.

It is contended that the right of way of a railroad company rests upon a different principle from real estate in general, and that, inasmuch as the company is not compelled to actually use the full width of its right of way until the needs thereof should demand, the statute of limitations will not commence running unless there be actual, adverse occupancy and actual notice of the hostile claim be given to the company. The statute of limitations operates against railroad corporations whose lands are held adversely as well as against individuals, and this applies to the right of way. Graham v. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 69 Ark. 562, 65 S. W. 1048, 66 S. W. 344; Ill. Cent. Ry. Co. v. Houghton, 126 Ill. 233, 18 N. E. 301, 1 L. R. A. 213, 9 Am. St. Rep. 581; Paxton v. Y. & M. V. Ry. Co., 76 Miss. 536, 24 South. 538.

The fact that the company is not compelled to use the full width of its right of way within a particular time, and that nonuser of the entire right of way is not conclusive evidence of its abandonment of the unused portion, may alter the character of proof upon which adverse possession is to be determined; but after all, as in other cases wherein the question arises, it becomes purely a question whether or not the possession is adverse and has, either actually or by necessary implication, been brought to the attention of the company. This court, in Little Rock v. Wright, 58 Ark. 142, 23 S. W. 876, speaking of the application of the doctrine of adverse possession against a city, said: "What is adverse possession? No possession consistent with the right of the true owner can be adverse to him. In this case the land was dedicated to public use for streets, but it remained inclosed and obstructed after the dedication. The city had the right to postpone the removal of the obstructions and the opening of the streets until such time as its resources permitted, and the public necessities demanded." In that case the adverse possession was asserted against the city by the heirs of the dedicant, and the court held that the occupancy was not inconsistent with the rights of the city, and did not become hostile until actual notice of the hostility of the claim was brought to the attention of the city.

The doctrine of that case has been recognized in many subsequent decisions of this court. In Graham v. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 69 Ark. 562, 65 S. W. 1048, 66 S. W. 344, which was a controversy between the railroad company and the devisee of the original grantor of the right of way, in which the statute of limitations was pleaded by the latter, Mr. Justice Riddick, speaking for the court, said: "Though the continued possession of the land by the vendor after conveyance executed is not, of itself, sufficient to show a holding adverse to the vendee, yet there is nothing in their relations which will prevent the vendor from acquiring a title by adverse possession; but, before the vendor or those claiming under him can acquire title in that way against the vendee, the intention to hold adversely must be manifested by some unequivocal act of hostility, such as to give notice to the vendee of the intention of the vendor to deny his right and hold adversely to him. Until this is shown the statute does not commence to run. [Citing authorities.] The distinction between a vendor and a stranger in such a case relates to the character of evidence necessary to show that the possession was adverse. If the parties are strangers in title, possession and the exercise of acts of ownership are, in themselves, in the absence of explanatory evidence, proof that the holding is adverse; whereas, if the vendor, after having executed deed, continues to remain in possession, the natural and reasonable inference, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, would be that he holds in recognition of the rights of the person to whom he has conveyed."

In Eldorado v. Ritchie Gro. Co., 84 Ark. 52, 104 S. W. 549, 120 Am. St. Rep. 22, which was a controversy between an incorporated town and the grantee of the original dedicant of a street, in which the statute was pleaded, the court held that such grantee was a stranger to the title under the dedication, and applied the rule announced in the Graham Case, holding that the possession ripened into title by limitation. In a similar case the court said: "The rule is different as to Mrs. John, who was a stranger to the dedication deed, and her occupancy of the premises and exercise of acts of ownership over it were of themselves evidence of adverse possession." Stuttgart v. John, 85 Ark. 520, 109 S. W. 541.

The presumption as to whether the appellee's possession was hostile to the rights of the railroad company, or in subordination thereto, would be different if he had accepted a conveyance which in terms recognized the rights of the company; but the various deeds to the land expressly include the land in controversy, for they convey the whole lots except that part upon which the track is laid. This language is susceptible of only one construction, and that is that the intention was to convey all that part which had been previously conveyed to the railroad company except the part covered by the track. This leaves no room for the contention that appellee, by the acceptance of the conveyance, recognized the rights of the company in and to the strip conveyed to him.

We are therefore of the opinion that the evidence established appellee's title by limitation, and that the judgment of the court in his favor was correct.

Affirmed.

PRICE, County Treasurer, v. MADISON COUNTY BANK.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 19, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 20*)—NATURE OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION — JURISDICTION OF LOWER COURT.

The circuit court on appeal from the county court acquires only such jurisdiction as the county court had, and can render only such judgment as the county court should have rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 81-87; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. COURTS (§ 124*)—GENERAL JURISDICTION—COUNTY AND CIRCUIT COURT.

An action to compel a depository of county funds selected under Acts 1907, p. 113, to pay interest in United States currency, and not in county warrants, is within the jurisdiction of the circuit court under Const. art. 7, § 11, conferring on the circuit courts jurisdiction in cases not vested in some other court, and is not within the jurisdiction of the county court under section 28, giving the county courts exclusive original jurisdiction in all matters relating to taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

3. COURTS (§ 37*)—JURISDICTION—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER BY CONSENT.

Since consent cannot give jurisdiction of the subject-matter where none exists, the question of jurisdiction of the subject-matter may be raised at any time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 146; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

4. COSTS (§ 232*)—COSTS ON APPEAL.

One appealing from a judgment of the circuit court rendered on appeal from the county court is entitled to the costs of the appeal on the appellate court dismissing the cause because the county court was without jurisdiction.

Proceedings by J. R. Price, county treasurer, against the Madison County Bank, to require defendant to show cause why it had not paid to the county treasurer interest due on county funds, and for the penalties because of its refusal to so pay. From a judgment of the circuit court ordering the county treasurer to accept county warrants in payment of the interest rendered on appeal from the county court in favor of the county treasurer, he appeals. Reversed, and cause dismissed.

Harris & Ivie, for appellant. E. A. Routh, for appellee.

HART, J. The General Assembly of 1907 passed an act to provide a depository for the county funds of Madison county. Acts 1907, p. 113. Pursuant to the provisions of the act, an advertisement for bids was made, and an order was made by the county court selecting the Madison County Bank as such depository; it having offered the highest rate of interest per annum offered for said funds. Section 3 of the act provides that the interest shall be computed on the daily balances to the credit of the county, and that the same shall be payable to the county treasurer quarterly, and shall be immediately placed by said treasurer to the credit of the common school funds of the county. One quarter's interest, amounting to $300, became due. The Madison County Bank claimed that it was payable in county warrants. The county treasurer contended that it was payable in lawful currency of the United States, and, upon the refusal of the bank to make payment in such currency, filed a petition with the county court of Madison county reciting the above facts, and asking that said bank be required to appear in said county court and to show cause why it had not paid to the county treasurer said amount of interest due, and why judgment should not be rendered against it for the interest due, amounting to $300, and for the penalties attaching on account of its refusal so to pay. On a hearing of the cause the county court rendered judgment in favor of the county treasurer against said bank for the sum of $300, with interest at the rate of 6% per cent. The bank appealed to the circuit court. On a trial anew in the circuit court the presiding judge was of the opinion that said interest was payable in Madison county warrants, and a judgment was rendered ordering the county treasurer to accept county warrants in payment of said interest. The county treasurer, in turn, has appealed to this court.

The first question that presents itself is that of jurisdiction. It is settled that upon appeal from the county court the circuit court acquires only such jurisdiction as the county court had, and can render only such judgment as the county court should have rendered. Pride v. State, 52 Ark. 502, 13 S.

W. 135. The question then is: Did the county court have jurisdiction of the matter in the first instance? If the county court had jurisdiction, it acquired it under section 28, art. 7, Const., which provides that "the county courts shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in all matters relating to county taxes," etc. In the case of Christian et al. v. Ashley County, 24 Ark. 142, it was held that the county court has jurisdiction to render judgment against a delinquent collector or his sureties "for the county revenue which he has collected and failed to pay over as required by law." To the same effect, see, also, Pettigrew et al. v. Washington County, 43 Ark. 83. Here the case is different. This is not a matter of the settlement of the collector or treasurer with the county court for the taxes. Prior to the passage of the act, no one had authority to loan out the county funds. The act under consideration makes it lawful to loan out the public funds of the county under the conditions imposed by the act. Section 4 of the act provides that all stockholders of any such bank shall be liable for all public funds that such bank shall fail to pay over on demand to the person entitled to receive the same. Section 6 provides that a bond shall be given for the prompt payment and accounting of the funds according to law, and that for any breach of the bond the county or any person injured may maintain an action in the name of the county to the use of the county, or person thereby injured. In the present case there was no settlement to be made, for there was no dispute about the amount due. The controversy was as to whether the amount due should be paid only in United States currency, or whether it might be paid in county warrants. It was a debt due the county. The act authorized the funds of the county to be loaned out to the highest bidder; and, upon the failure of the bank to pay the loan when it became due, there arose a cause of action in favor of the county for the amount due. We do not think the clause of the Constitution above referred to in regard to taxes meant to give the county court jurisdiction of all matters indirectly affecting that subject. Such a broad construction would give to a court whose presiding judge is not required to be "learned in the law" powers which evidently were not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. We think that it was only intended by them that the county court should have jurisdiction when the subjects enumerated in section 28, art. 7, were directly affected. This construction is borne out by the decisions of our court. This distinction has already been recognized by this court. Martin v. State, 79 Ark. 236, 96 S. W. 372; Hunter State Bank v. Mills (Ark.) 117 S. W. 760. In the case of Martin v. State, 79 Ark. 236, 96 S. W. 372, under an act similar in all essential respects to this act, suit was brought by the state against the treasurer of Scott county for penalties for failing to comply with an order of the county court directing him to deposit the public funds in a county depository.

The suit was brought in the circuit court; and, while the question of jurisdiction was not raised by the pleadings or discussed in the opinion, yet the question of jurisdiction of the subject-matter always presents itself; for it is well settled that consent cannot give jurisdiction of the subject-matter where none exists. Feld, Brown et al. v. Dortch, 84 Ark. 399; American Soda Fountain Co. v. Battle, 85 Ark. 213, 107 S. W. 672, 108 S. W. 508. Obviously if section 28, art. 7, gives exclusive jurisdiction to the county court in the matter, none could exist in the circuit court. We are of the opinion that the circuit court was the proper forum under section 11, art. 7, Const., which provides that "the circuit courts shall have jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases, the exclusive jurisdiction of which may not be vested in some other court provided for by this Constitution." Appellant, however, is entitled to a judgment for the costs of the appeal. American Soda Fountain Co. v. Battle, supra.

Therefore it is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and that the cause be dismissed without prejudice to bringing another action.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lonoke County; Eugene Lankford, Judge.

Action by C. C. Abbott against Tate Herron. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Trimble, Robinson & Trimble, for appellant. Geo. M. Chapline, for appellee.

BATTLE, J. C. C. Abbott filed a complaint against Tate Herron, in the Lonoke circuit court, alleging that he was the owner of and entitled to the possession of certain lots in the town of Lonoke, in this state. That on the 15th day of August, 1906, he leased the lots to the defendant for one year, and placed him in possession thereof.

"That after the expiration of said lease, plaintiff demanded possession and declined to lease the same to Herron for any additional length of time, because it was his intention to move to Lonoke permanently and occupy the premises himself.

"That afterwards, on the 6th day of September, he agreed to let the defendant remain on said premises and occupy the house thereon as a tenant at sufferance, until he, the plaintiff, got ready to move to Lonoke. This was with the understanding and agreement that Herron, during the time he occupied said premises as such tenant, would pay rent therefor at the end of each month.

"That he wholly failed, neglected, and omitted to do so from that time up until the 20th day of December, 1907. That about the same time plaintiff further agreed that the said Herron might continue to occupy said premises with his family in consideration that Herron would board plaintiff when plaintiff moved to Lonoke, for said occupancy, but refused to lease said premises to defendant for any definite length of time or for any other consideration.

"That on the 30th day of June the said Herron notified plaintiff that he could not board him any longer, and demanded that plaintiff get out by the 1st of July, 1908, and further stated to the plaintiff that he had eaten his last meal there, and refused to board him any longer, which was a breach of his said agreement and contract.

"That the said defendant owed a balance of $25.80 as rent during the time he occupied said premises from September 6, 1907, to December 20, 1907, the time his board was to begin, which was past due, which defendant refused to pay. That he now willfully and unlawfully occupies and holds possession of said premises after possession thereof has been demanded and notice to quit in writing duly served on him.

"That plaintiff is lawfully entitled to the possession of said lots and premises above described."

And asked for judgment for the possession of the lots, and for $100 as damages, and for costs.

Defendant answered, and alleged that on the 15th day of September, 1907, he paid the plaintiff all that he was owing him for the rent of lots in Lonoke, and that plaintiff leased to him the lots until the 1st day of January, 1909.

He denied that he is indebted to plaintiff for the rent of the lots from the 2d day of September, 1907, until the 20th day of December, 1907, and denied that at the time he leased the lots he agreed to board plaintiff for the use and occupancy of the lots.

He alleged that plaintiff, on the 22d day of December, 1907, moved to the lots to board, but no price was agreed upon; and that he took possession of a part of the lots and kept his horses there.

He denied that he owed plaintiff a balance of $25.80 for rent for the time he occupied the lots from the 2d day of September, 1907, until the 20th day of December, 1907.

He alleged that, at the time this action was brought, plaintiff was indebted to him for board from the 22d day of December to the day of the commencement of this action, at the rate of $20 per month, aggregating $128.66; that plaintiff is indebted to him for 32 bushels of corn at 85 cents per bushel—$20.80; for work on hydrant, $1.50; for padlock, 50 cents; and for amount paid for water, $5.

He alleged that, notwithstanding plaintiff is indebted to him, he, within three days after he was notified to surrender possession of the lots, tendered to plaintiff $15, which was more than he was entitled to.

Plaintiff replied, and denied that he was indebted to the defendant for board, or on any other account, and that legal tender was made to him for rent due and unpaid.

Each of the parties adduced evidence in the trial in the action which tended to prove the allegations of his pleadings. Plaintiff testified in his own behalf. On cross-examination he testified in response to interrogatories as follows:

"Q. Now, Doctor, didn't you make arrangements while you were there at Mr. Herron's to move to Kerr Station?

"A. I did make arrangements.

"Q. Make a trade with Dr. Brewer?

"A. In February * * * Dr. Brewer spoke to me and told me what a nice location he had, and wanted me to come there and locate, and asked me how would I like it, and I said I had not considered it very much and that I would think it over, and after I had thought over it for a while I would see him again. I told him that if I could make the arrangements that I wanted to and could see my way clear it might be possible he and I could make a deal. * * *

"A. I could not tell exactly when it was.

"Q. Didn't you consummate the trade with him? * * *

"A. No, sir, I didn't."

Over the objection of the plaintiff, Dr. J. F. Brewer testified in behalf of the defendant as follows: "I am acquainted with Dr. Abbott. I live at Kerr, Ark. Dr. Abbott made a trade with me to move to Kerr, which we closed the 1st of February (1908). He did not comply with his trade."

The court instructed the jury at the request of the defendant, over the objection of the plaintiff, as follows: "If you find that the defendant was renting by the month for money rent, and within three days after notice to quit you find that upon a settlement between them he would not have owed the plaintiff more than $15, and he offered to pay that amount, then the plaintiff fails in this action, and you will find for the defendant."

Other instructions were given.

The jury returned a verdict, and the court rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

The testimony of Dr. Brewer was inadmissible. It was used to contradict the plaintiff, Abbott, as to a collateral matter, as to which he testified on cross-examination. The rule in such cases was stated by this court in Butler v. State, 34 Ark. 480, 485, as follows: "In order to avoid an interminable multiplication of issues, it is a settled rule of practice that, when a witness is cross-examined on a matter collateral to the issue, he cannot, as to his answer, be subsequently contradicted by the party putting the question. The test of whether a fact inquired of in cross-examination is collateral is this: Would the cross-examining party be entitled to prove it as part of his case, tending to establish his plea?" In this case the defendant denied that he agreed to board the plaintiff in payment for rent, and alleged that he had leased the lots until the 1st day of January, 1909, and that plaintiff was indebted to him. The testimony of Dr. Brewer was as to transactions which occurred subsequently to the time when the contract of lease by plaintiff to defendant was made, was entirely disconnected with it, threw no light upon it, and did not tend to prove that either was indebted to the other, and according to the rule stated was inadmissible. See Brown v. State, 24 Ark. 620; Jones v. Malvern Lumber Co., 58 Ark. 125, 23 S. W. 679; Plunkett v. State, 72 Ark. 409, 82 S. W. 845; Hinson v. State, 76 Ark. 366, 88 S. W. 947.

The instruction given at the request of the defendant, over the objection of the plaintiff, as to tender of $15, should not have been given. There was no evidence that he kept the tender good. It is true that he tendered to plaintiff $15, which was refused. But this is not sufficient. "After a tender is duly made it must, to preserve its legal effect, be kept good." Kelly v. Keith, 85 Ark. 30, 32, 106 S. W. 1173. The defendant denied that he was indebted to plaintiff, but said he had tendered to him $15. He made no offer to keep it good by paying it into the registry of the court or otherwise. He was content with having made it at two different times. He did not renew it in his answer.

Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 128*)—MASTER'S LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO SERVANT—SAFE APPLIANCES.

Negligence in permitting the drawheads of a flat car to become out of repair, so that too much play was allowed between the car and another when coupled together, cannot be made the basis of a recovery by an employé whose foot was caught between the drawheads while attempting to climb upon the car, for it could not have been anticipated by the master, in furnishing reasonably safe appliances, that a danger of that sort should be guarded against.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clark County; Jacob M. Carter, Judge.

Action by Patrick McGrory against the Ultima Thule, Arkadelphia & Mississippi Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wood & Henderson, for appellant. T. D. Wynne, J. H. Crawford, and T. D. Crawford, for appellee.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. The plaintiff, Patrick McGrory, sues his employer, the Ultima Thule, Arkadelphia & Mississippi Railway Company, for damages resulting from physical injuries received while performing his duties, and alleged to be due to the negligence of other servants for whom the employer is claimed to be responsible. After all the testimony had been introduced, the trial court gave the jury a peremptory instruction to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, and judgment was entered accordingly. Thus the only question presented here is whether the testimony was sufficient to warrant a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, giving it the strongest probative force which the jury might have accorded to it.

There is little, if any, conflict in the testimony on the material points. The defendant owned a railroad which it operated as a common carrier through Clark and Dallas counties in Arkansas, and plaintiff was employed as road master and superintendent of construction. He had no authority to employ or discharge trainmen; but, in the event of accident or wreck of a train on the line, it was his duty to take charge of the train or trains for the purpose of clearing up the wreck and restoring the trains to proper service. On such occasions, he had charge of the trains, and his authority was supreme; the conductors and other trainmen being under his immediate supervision and subject to his orders. The evidence shows, however, that the conductors were left in charge of their trains subject to his orders, and that they were expected to give orders according to their judgment, except when otherwise directed by the plaintiff as superintendent. The latter's orders to trainmen were given through the conductors. On the occasion of the plaintiff's injury, one of the engines, No. 12, got off the track, and it was necessary to procure the assistance of another engine in getting it back, and plaintiff was notified. He got another engine, No. 14, and, after coupling two flat cars to it, proceeded to the scene of the wreck of engine No. 12. Night fell while the work was going on, and plaintiff went over to engine No. 14 to give an order to the engineer, and, water being up to the track on either side, he undertook to climb upon a flat car attached to the engine in order to pass over to the engine, and while doing so the engine and cars were moved, and his foot was caught between the drawheads. The signal to the engineer to move his engine was given by the conductor in response to the request of the section foreman for the engine to be moved, so that he could repair the track. This was after engine No. 12 had been gotten back on the track. Neither the conductor who gave the signal, nor the engineer of No. 14, knew of the situation of plaintiff when the signal to move the engine was given and acted upon. It was dark, and neither of the trainmen knew where the plaintiff was, or that he had started over to engine No. 14.

It is contended that the act of the conductor in giving the signal to move the train constituted negligence for which the defendant would be liable. According to the undisputed facts, the plaintiff was a vice principal of the defendant at the time of the injury, and the negligence of the employé, if any, which caused the injury, was that of one of his subordinates. Is the master responsible to a vice principal on account of the negligence of another of its servants who is a subordinate of the vice principal and under the latter's control? It is plain that the master is not responsible, for that is one of the ordinary risks which the servant assumes when he takes service and assumes control over his subordinates.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The master is not bound, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, to indemnify one servant for an injury caused by the negligence of another servant in the same common employment, unless the negligent servant is at the time acting as the master's representative; in other words, the vice principal of the master. 2 Labatt on Master & Servant, § 470; Quebec Steamship Co. v. Merchant, 133 U. S. 375, 10 Sup. Ct. 397, 33 L. Ed. 856. The subordinates of the vice principal over whom he exercises control are his fellow servants in a common employment so far as the responsibility of the master to him for their acts is concerned, and the master discharges his full duty to his vice principal by exercising ordinary care in selecting competent subordinate servants.

It is contended that a contrary doctrine is announced in the case of St. L. & S. F. R. Co. v. McFall, 75 Ark. 30, 86 S. W. 824, 69 L. R. A. 217. We think, however, that that case announced a principle altogether different from the one applicable here. There, the injured party was a conductor on a train, and his injury was caused by the concurring negligence of Adams, the engineer of his train, and the servants in charge of another train. The question there was whether the negligence of Adams, the engineer, which contributed to the injury, should be imputed to McFall so as to deny him the right of recovery; and we held that, inasmuch as Adams was not under the immediate control of McFall, the negligence of the one could not be imputed to the other. The controlling principle in that case was announced in the following language: "It follows, then, that in cases where the injured and negligent do not sustain to each other the relations of master and servant, or principal and agent, or other relation by which alone one is responsible for the act of the other, the contributory negligence of a third person will not be imputed to the party thereby affected, unless he was at the time subject to the control of the injured person, and the wrong, the negligence, was committed at a time when it was within the power of such person to prevent it, and it was his duty to do so, and under circumstances which indicated that he assented to or acquiesced in the wrong by his failure to interfere, or directed it to be done; and that, when the conditions are reversed, the reverse is true—it will be imputed." Now in the present case, there is no question of imputed negligence involved. The sole question, as before stated, is whether the master is responsible to his representative, or vice principal, for the acts of another servant in the common employment, but who is a subordinate of the former.

There is another allegation of negligence in the complaint, to the effect that the master was guilty of negligence in permitting the drawheads of the flat car to become out of repair, so that too much space or play was allowed between the cars when coupled together. It is contended that but for this negligence there would not have been enough space between the two drawheads for the plaintiff's foot to have gotten down between them, and therefore no injury would have occurred. We are of the opinion, however, that this could not be made the basis of a charge of negligence as the proximate cause of the injury. It could not have been anticipated by the master, in furnishing reasonably safe appliances, that a danger of this sort should be guarded against. It could not have been reasonably anticipated that a servant would place his foot between the drawheads, or in the discharge of his duties would permit his foot to get in that position. We can see no causal relation between the alleged act of negligence and the injury, and therefore it could not be made the basis of a recovery.

We do not undertake to decide whether or not, under the facts in this case, the plaintiff himself was, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence in climbing on the car in the darkness without apprising the trainmen of his presence. It is unnecessary to do so. Upon the whole, we are of the opinion that the undisputed evidence shows affirmatively that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and the peremptory instruction to the jury was correct.

Affirmed.

STATE v. BOWMAN.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. March 22, 1909.)

1. STATUTES (§ 19*)—ENACTMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION—VOTE.

Const. art. 5, § 21, providing that on the final passage of all bills the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays and entered on the journal, is mandatory, and failure to comply therewith, as a rule, renders the law void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 60*)—CONSTRUCTION—EXTRINSIC AIDS.

When a question arises as to the existence of a statute, the court may resort to any source of information in order to arrive at a correct determination, and to that end may examine the legislative journals.

3. STATUTES (§ 60*)—LEGISLATIVE JOURNALS—CERTIFICATE.

The certificate of the Secretary of State as to the contents of the legislative journals is not conclusive, but the court may examine them for the purpose of verification.

4. STATUTES (§ 283*)—ENACTMENT—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where an act has been signed by the Governor, deposited with the Secretary of State, and duly published as a law, it will be presumed that every rule and requirement was complied with in its passage.

5. STATUTES (§ 18*)—ENACTMENT—LEGALITY.

The vote on the final passage of Act No. 59, Gen. Assem. 1868, approved July 23, 1868, entitled "An act to define and punish offenses against the public peace and tranquillity" (Acts 1868, p. 214), having been taken by yeas and nays, and entered on the journal, and the act having been duly signed by the Governor, deposited with the Secretary of State, and published as a law, it was legally enacted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Johnson County; Hugh Barham, Judge.

John Bowman was convicted of a breach of the peace. On appeal to the circuit court, a demurrer to the information was sustained, and the State appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Hal L. Norwood, Atty. Gen., and C. A. Cunningham, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

FRAUENTHAL, J. An information was properly filed with a justice of the peace of Johnson county charging that defendant, John Bowman, did commit the offense of a breach of the peace in violation of section 1648, Kirby's Dig. He was convicted in the court of the justice of the peace, and duly appealed to the circuit court. In the circuit court the defendant interposed a demurrer to the information upon the ground that section 1648, Kirby's Dig., under which the information was filed and the prosecution brought, was never enacted or passed by the Legislature of the state of Arkansas, and that therefore the information did not state facts sufficient to constitute an offense against the laws of Arkansas. Section 1648, Kirby's Dig., is one of the sections of Act No. 59 of the General Assembly of the state of Arkansas of 1868, entitled "An act to define and punish offenses against the public peace and tranquillity," approved July 23, 1868 (Acts 1868, p. 214). With his demurrer the defendant filed a certified copy of the journals of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of 1868, showing the proceedings of the Legislature relative to the passage of said Act No. 59, which is duly authenticated by the Secretary of State in manner prescribed by law. From this certified copy of said journals it appeared that said Act No. 59 was Senate Bill No. 15, and that it regularly passed the Senate, and that on the final passage of the bill in the Senate the vote was taken by yeas and nays, and duly entered on the journal of the Senate. But from said certified copy of the journal of the House it did not appear that said Senate Bill No. 15 was read a third time, and it did not appear on the journal of the House that on the final passage of said bill in the House the vote was taken by the yeas and nays, and entered on the journal of the House. The circuit court sustained the demurrer of the defendant, presumably on said ground that, upon the final passage of said bill in the House, the vote was not taken by the yeas and nays, and entered on the journal. The state of Arkansas through its prosecuting officers has duly prosecuted this appeal from the judgment of the circuit court sustaining said demurrer, and discharging the defendant.

The question thus involved in this case is whether said Senate Bill No. 15 in the printed Acts of 1868 became Act No. 59 of the General Assembly of Arkansas of 1868 and was legally enacted. By article 5, § 21, of the Constitution of 1868, under which the above act was passed, it is provided: "On the final passage of all bills the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays and entered on the journal." The failure to comply with the above provision of the Constitution on the final passage of a bill by the Legislature, as a rule, renders the law void; and in this state this court has held uniformly that said provision is mandatory and imperative. 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 543; Coolley's Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) 201; Post v. Supervisors, 105 U. S. 607, 26 L. Ed. 1204; Vinsant v. Knox, 27 Ark. 267; Worthen v. Badgett, 32 Ark. 496; Smithee, Land Com'r, v. Garth, 33 Ark. 17. Now, whenever a question arises as to the existence of a statute, the judges who are called upon to decide have a right to resort to any source of information in order to arrive at a correct determination, and to that end may examine the legislative journals. The certificate of the Secretary of State as to the contents of the legislative journals is not conclusive, but the judges may examine them for the purpose of verification. In the case of Gardner v. Collector, 6 Wall. 499, 18 L. Ed. 890, it is said: "We are of opinion, therefore, on principle as well as authority, that whenever a question arises in a court of law of the existence of a statute, the judges who are called upon to decide have a right to resort to any source of information which in its nature is capable of conveying to the judicial mind a clear and satisfactory answer to such question, always seeking first for that which in its nature is most appropriate, unless the positive law has enacted another rule." Worthen v. Badgett, 32 Ark. 496; Chicot County v. Davies, 40 Ark. 200; Powell v. Hays, 83 Ark. 448, 104 S. W. 177; 12 Ency. of Evidence, 43.

Upon a more careful examination of the journal of the proceedings of the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the state of Arkansas of 1868 it is found in said journal that on the final passage of said Senate Bill No. 15 the vote was taken by the yeas and nays, and entered on the journal of the House. In the House on July 8, 1868, the said Senate Bill No. 15 was read the first time, and on July 10, 1868, it was read the second time. On page 514 of said journal of said House of Representatives appears the following: "On motion of Mr. Johnson the report of the judiciary committee on Senate Bill No. 15, 'An act to punish disturbers of the public peace,' was adopted. On motion of Mr. Benjamin the bill was read third time and put upon its final passage. Mr. Speaker put the question whether the House would agree to the final passage of said bill and it was determined in the affirmative. Yeas 45, nays 1. Those who voted in the affirmative were: [The journal gives here a complete list of those voting in the affirmative, those voting in the negative, and those absent and not voting.] Ordered that the clerk return said bill to the Senate, with information that the house has concurred in the passage of the same." This entry in said journal of the House must have been inadvertently overlooked when the above certificate was prepared, and upon which the circuit court acted. We have examined the journals of the Senate and House of Representatives of the General Assembly of 1868, and the proceedings as shown by those journals relating to the passage of said Senate Bill No. 15, and we find that the journals show every action taken that was expressly required by the Constitution for the legal enactment of said bill. And as to every other matter, as is said by Mr. Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) 193: "When the Legislature is acting in the apparent performance of its legal functions, every reasonable presumption is to be made in favor of its action. It will not be presumed in any case, from the mere silence of their journals, that either house has exceeded its authority or disregarded a constitutional requirement in the passage of legislative acts, unless when the Constitution has expressly required the journals to show the action taken." This act of the Legislature of 1868 was duly signed by the Governor, deposited with the Secretary of State, and duly published as a law. It will be presumed that every rule and requirement was complied with in its passage. Pelt v. Payne, 60 Ark. 637, 30 S. W. 426; Chicot Co. v. Davis, 40 Ark. 200 (215); Glidewell v. Morton, 51 Ark. 566, 11 S. W. 882; 12 Ency. of Evidence, 48. Act No. 59 of the General Assembly of the state of Arkansas of 1868, approved July 23, 1868, which was Senate Bill No. 15, and section 1648 of Kirby's Digest, which is one of the sections of that act, was therefore legally enacted.

The judgment of the Johnson circuit court sustaining the demurrer to the information, and discharging the defendant, is reversed, and this cause is remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and to proceed with the trial of the defendant.

TRAIL et al. v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Jan. 22, 1908. Rehearing Denied April 28, 1909.)

1. BAIL (§ 56*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—ACTION ON BOND.

In view of Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 443, relating to the requisites of the citation in proceedings to forfeit a bail bond, it is not necessary in such proceedings to show that accused was arrested, so that it is immaterial whether the capias was valid.

2. BAIL (§ 58*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—REQUISITES OF BOND.

It is not necessary that a bail bond should state whether accused was charged by information or indictment.

3. BAIL (§ 77*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—REQUISITES OF JUDGMENT NISI.

It is not necessary that a judgment nisi on forfeiture of bail should state whether accused was charged by information or indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

4. BAIL (§ 77*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—ACTION ON BOND—VARIANCE BETWEEN BOND AND JUDGMENT.

Since it is not necessary that either the bail bond or the judgment nisi state whether accused was charged by information or complaint, that the judgment stated that he was charged by information and the bond stated that he was charged by complaint was an immaterial variance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

5. BAIL (§ 76*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—BOND—NATURE OF OBLIGATION.

Though a bail bond in a criminal case was a joint obligation in terms, the Court of Criminal Appeals would construe it to be a joint and several obligation.

Appeal from Grayson County Court; J. W. Hassell, Judge.

Action on a bail bond by the State against Bill Trail and others. From a judgment for the State, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Smith & Wall, for appellants. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. This appeal is from the judgment of the county court on a forfeited bail bond. Appellant insists that no forfeited bond could be taken, because the capias upon which the principal was arrested failed to charge any offense against the law, and that an arrest could not be had without a capias, and, as the capias was void, therefore, the whole proceeding, as well as the taking of the bond, was void. It is not necessary or material, in a proceeding to forfeit a bail bond, to show the defendant was arrested. See article 443, Code Cr. Proc. 1895. In the case of Lindley v. State, 17 Tex. App. 121, we held that it was a requisite to the validity of a bond for the state to show a legal capias. The case cited, however, was subsequently overruled in Werbiski's Case, 20 Tex. App. 131, and followed in Conner's Case (Tex. App.) 9 S. W. 63.

Appellant further contends that there is a variance between the bond and the judgment nisi, and that the judgment nisi recites that the principal stands charged by information, whereas the bond says by complaint. We hold that it is not necessary that either the bond or the judgment nisi should state whether the party was accused by information or indictment, and that it is not necessary to allege either one or the other. The variance, if as stated, would be an immaterial one. See McGee v. State, 11 Tex. App. 520.

The last insistence of appellant is that the judgment is erroneous in that it is against each surety for the full amount of the bond, while the bond charged upon was a joint obligation. The bond is not a joint obligation, but a joint and several obligation, and so states upon its face; but, even if it had been, this court could correct same, as indicated in the following authorities: Mathena v. State, 15 Tex. App. 460; Rainbolt v. State, 34 Tex. 286. As stated, however, the bond is both joint and several.

ed by the Court of Civil Appeals at Galveston. 44 Tex. Civ. App. 123, 97 S. W. 1078. The case appears to have been tried again on the same pleadings, with the same result, in the district court, to wit, a verdict instructed for the plaintiff.

As stated by appellant in her brief, the suit is brought by the Advance Thresher Company against Eliza Kempner, doing business under the name of "H. Kempner," for the contract price of a threshing machine and automatic stacker, amounting to $835, with $91.20 freight charges. Defendant denied liability, and by way of cross-bill sought to recover damages of plaintiff, alleged to have been the result of plaintiff's breach of warranty or agreement with reference to said machinery.

The Court of Civil Appeals, upon the former appeal, held that under the evidence the contract between the parties consisted of the original contract made in January, 1903, except as the same was modified by subsequent correspondence in the same year. We hold the same upon the testimony in this record. We hold, also, that there was nothing in the subsequent correspondence changing or inconsistent with the remedy embodied in the provisions of the original contract on the subject of "warranties," which provided and stipulated that the machinery should be of certain character, perform certain work, and in a certain manner, and further provided:

"That if any of the parts of said machinery (except the belting) fail during the year of purchase, in consequence of any defect in material of said part, the Advance Thresher Company agree to repair the same, or to furnish a duplicate of said part, free of charge, except freight, after presentation of defective piece showing flaw in the material, at the factory or to the dealer through whom said machinery was bought, at any time within the year, but deficiencies in any piece not to condemn other parts.

"Each of the above warranties and warranties is made by this company and accepted by the party giving the within order on the following conditions, and agreed settlement of all claims for damages: That upon starting the machine, and the purchasers using the usual care and skill of threshermen, are unable to make the engine, thresher, stacker, feeder or other attachment herein ordered to operate well, they shall within five days from the day of the first use, give written notice to the Advance Thresher Company, at Battle Creek, Michigan, by registered letter, stating which machine or part, and in what manner and wherein it fails to fill the warranty; and also, within said time, shall notify the agent through whom purchased, and a reasonable time shall be allowed them to get to the machine and remedy the defect, if any there be (if it be of such a nature that a remedy cannot be suggested by letter), and the purchaser hereby agrees to render freely all assistance asked of him, and longer use or use without such notice, is to be taken as fulfillment of all warranty. That if the workman visiting the machine from the company does not leave the same working well, the purchaser must at once give notice to the company at Battle Creek, Michigan, by registered letter, and to the local dealer as before, and state in writing specifically the machine's defects, and wherein, and another workman may be sent to remedy the defect. That on failure to send a second workman for five days, or failure of workman to remedy the defect, then the part of the machinery that could not be made to fill this warranty shall be returned by the purchaser to the place where received, and another furnished, or the money and notes which have been given for the same shall be returned if the whole purchased machinery is defective, or there will be indorsed on the notes, if only part of the machinery covered by this order, a proportionate part of the purchase price, as shown by the price list of the year of sale, to the price for which the same was sold, the company to have said options. No further or any other claim is to be made on the Advance Thresher Company under the sale of said machinery. That being the stipulated and agreed satisfaction of all claims for damages by the purchaser under this order and said company, and that the conditions of the warranty are thereby settled, and the contract under this order at an end. Each machine, apparatus or appliance herein ordered to be taken as separate machinery, and defects in one not to apply to the other; and the defective machinery returned, to be returned without discount to the other.

"Continued possession of said machinery for five days, without said notices, or failure to return said machinery as above provided, shall be conclusive evidence that all warranty has been fulfilled, and the purchaser hereby releases all claim for damages and the right to return the machinery after said time, and any and all right or claim to recoup for any damages or injury in any suit brought to collect the purchase price.

"Order for Pneumatic Straw Stacker.

"Agents taking this order will mail the original at once to the factory at Battle Creek, Michigan, retaining two copies, one for themselves and one for the purchasers.

"Dated at Galveston, state of Texas, this 31st day of January, 1903.

"The undersigned hereby contract with the Advance Thresher Company (a Michigan corporation) at Crowley, Louisiana, for one pneumatic straw stacker, as indicated below, manufactured by said company, at their factory at Battle Creek, Michigan, to be shipped to or in care of Howard Smith Co., at Houston, Texas.

"The above stacker is ordered, purchased and sold, subject to the following express warranty and agreement, and none other, viz.:

"That the said stacker is well made, of good material, and, when properly run and rightly managed, will carry off the straw and chaff and stack them together, clear of the separator, with the help of one man to direct the chute and blast.

"It is expressly agreed that upon starting this stacker, if the undersigned are not able to make it operate well, written notice by registered letter, stating wherein it fails to satisfy the warranty, is to be immediately given by the undersigned to the Advance Thresher Company, at Battle Creek, Michigan, and also, within said time, shall notify the agent through whom purchased, and reasonable time allowed them to get to it and remedy the defect, if any, unless it is of such nature that they can advise by letter, and the undersigned hereby agrees to render freely all assistance asked of him, but if failure of said stacker to perform in a satisfactory manner is through improper management or lack of proper appliances on the part of the undersigned, then the purchasers will pay all necessary expenses incurred.

"It is expressly agreed that any failure or deficiency in said stacker shall be reported by the undersigned in writing, by registered letter, as above stated, within five days after starting said stacker, and longer use, or use without such written notice, is conclusive evidence of satisfaction and fulfillment of all warranty.

"That if the workman visiting the stacker does not leave the same working well, the purchaser must again give notice to the company at Battle Creek, Michigan, by registered letter, and to the local dealers, as before, and state in writing specifically wherein the machine is defective, and another workman may be sent to remedy this defect. Failure to send said second workman for ten (10) days, or failure of workman to remedy the defect, and said stacker cannot be made to work as warranted, then the undersigned shall remove the same from said separator, and shall order from said Advance Thresher Company their regular ordinary stacker, 18 feet long, with riddle, belts, shafts, etc., complete, to attach to said separator, at a cost of thirty dollars ($30.00) and freight, and the cash and notes given in settlement of this pneumatic stacker shall be returned or credited upon the notes of the undersigned, and said Advance Thresher Company shall be discharged from all liability whatever on account of said stacker, all the conditions of this warranty being thereby settled, that being the stipulated and agreed satisfaction of all claims for damages by the purchaser under this order and said company, and that the conditions of the warranty are thereby settled, and the contract under this order at an end.

"It is expressly agreed that if any part of said stacker falls during this year, in consequence of defect in material of said part, the Advance Thresher Company have the option to repair the same or to furnish a duplicate of said part, free of charge, except the freight, after presentation of the defective piece, clearly showing the flaw in material, at the factory or to the dealer through whom said stacker was bought, at any time within this year, but deficiencies in any piece not to condemn other parts.

"It is further expressly understood and agreed by the undersigned that the sale and warranty of this stacker is wholly separate and distinct from the warranty and sale of any other machinery and of the separator to which this stacker is attached, and that a failure in whole or in part in said stacker in no way affects the sale or warranty of said separator or other machinery.

"Notice.—It is expressly understood and agreed by the undersigned that the agents, salesmen and experts of the company have no general powers, and are only authorized to make sales upon this form, and that all agreements appertaining to this order are included herein, and that the above warranty is the only one, and only form made or authorized by the Advance Thresher Company to be given on the above machinery, and that failure to follow the same waives and settles all claim for damages for any cause, and all claim or rights to recoup for damages or injury in any suit brought to recover the purchase price.

"That no agent or other person shall or can make any different warranty, or vary or modify any of its terms, or waive any of its conditions; that any attempt to do so shall not bind the Advance Thresher Company or affect this contract. The fact of any agent, expert or employé of this company being sent to said machinery, or working on the same, shall not change or modify this contract, or the terms or conditions of the warranty herein.

"Changes can only be made in writing by the treasurer and the board of directors.

"All agreements must be in writing, as no verbal agreement shall be recognized or claim under same made by undersigned.

"This order is forwarded to the factory at Battle Creek, Michigan, to ascertain if the above-described machinery can be furnished according to specifications, with the express understanding that the Advance Thresher Company shall not be liable for any inability to fill this order, or for any delay, either in shipping or in transit."

We find, as a fact, from the undisputed evidence, that defendant has not shown by testimony that she has ever been placed in a position to demand of plaintiff, under the contract as above interpreted, any remedy in reference to the machine, unless it was the right, at a proper time, if the machine was defective, etc., to return the same and thereby cancel her obligation for the price. And we further find that, while there is evidence that after it had been used through the season of 1903 defendant expressed dissatisfaction with the machine, and complained of the unsatisfactory manner in which it worked and offered to return it, and Foley was unwilling to take it back, still defendant went on and used it through subsequent seasons and then traded it off to Gaar-Scott & Co. for another machine.

The course pursued by defendant did not, under the circumstances, operate to relieve her from paying for the machine, as a positive and sustained tender might have done; and the very terms of the contract preclude her from claiming consequential or other damages. Buckstaff v. Russell, 79 Fed. 611, 25 C. C. A. 129; Shearer v. Gaar-Scott & Co., 41 Tex. Civ. App. 39, 90 S. W. 684; Gaar-Scott & Co. v. Hodges (Tex. Civ. App.) 90 S. W. 580; Wisdom v. Nichols (Ky.) 97 S. W. 18; Watts v. Nat. Cash Register Co. (Ky.) 78 S. W. 118.

Appellant claims that in the correspondence Foley warranted that the machine should give satisfaction and thresh from 350 to 400 sacks of rice daily, and also claims that whether Foley's statement in this regard was a representation or a warranty was a matter of fact which should have been submitted to the jury. We think the statement did not amount to a warranty, and, if it could be taken as a warranty, the effect would be merely to add it to the category of warranties mentioned in the original contract, and its failure would give defendant no further right than to cancel the notes by a return of the machine.

It is apparent that the reason why Foley was unwilling to take back the machine was that he was claiming that the machine worked all right. The testimony concerning the offer to return the machine, and the unwillingness of Foley to allow it, was that this occurred in a conversation in H. Kempner's office between the agents of Mrs. Kempner and Foley, the latter of whom was there demanding payment of the notes. This occurred late in November or early in December, 1903, and the correspondence immediately preceding shows that there was a difference between them concerning the working of the machine.

Mrs. Kempner's right to return the machine and get back the notes depended upon the defectiveness of the machine. If not defective within the meaning of the warranties, she had no such right. Now it seems to us that when her agent offered to return the machine and Foley did not accede to this, and no further effort was made to return it, but, on the contrary, she continued to use it in the field for two more seasons and then disposed of it as her own, she must be taken to have receded from her offer to return it, and acceded to Foley's refusal to allow her to do so. It is not deemed necessary to consider whether or not appellee was bound by Foley's correspondence. We have proceeded upon the assumption that he was authorized.

The above conclusions of fact and law dispose of all the assignments of error.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. COBB.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 4, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 1, 1909.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—NEGLIGENT DELAY—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action for delay in delivery of a telegram held to show that the messenger intrusted therewith was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 81*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—REGULATIONS—OFFICE HOURS.

The regulation of a telegraph company fixing office hours in a town of about 600 people of from 8 a. m. to 8 p. m. on week days, and from 8 to 10 a. m., and from 4 to 6 p. m. on Sundays, is reasonable.

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 32*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—CONTRACTS—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

A telegraph company cannot be held liable on an unauthorized contract of its agent at a sending office to deliver a telegram, tendered for transmission after the receiving office, under a reasonable rule as to office hours, had closed for the night, before opening time next morning.

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 74*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—DELAY—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for failure to promptly deliver a telegram tendered to the agent at the sending office for transmission after the receiving office had closed for the night, it appeared that such agent had no authority to contract to deliver before office hours the next morning, it was error to submit to the jury the issue of defendant's negligence in failing to deliver that night.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Error in submitting such issue was harmless, where defendant was negligent in failing to use reasonable care to make timely delivery after the telegram's receipt at the receiving office the next morning.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

6. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 71*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—NEGLIGENCE—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Where, in an action against a telegraph company for mental anguish caused by negligent delay in delivering a telegram, it appeared that such negligence prevented plaintiff from reaching the bedside of his son, to whom he was greatly attached, before death, a verdict for $1,200 was not excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 74; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Chas. E. Ashe, Judge.

Action by J. E. Cobb against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff for $1,200, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hume, Robinson & Hume and Norman G. Kittrell, Jr., for appellant. Love & Channell, for appellee.

PLEASANTS, C. J. This suit was brought by appellee against the appellant to recover the sum of $1,999 as damages for mental anguish caused him by the negligent failure of appellant to transmit and deliver with reasonable promptness a telegraphic message informing appellee of the fatal illness of his son, by reason of which negligence he was unable to see his son before his death. The petition contains the following allegations: "That heretofore, to wit, on or about June 13, 1905, J. E. Cobb was at Bay Ridge, about two miles from La Porte, in Harris county, Tex., at which time his son, John Cobb, was very sick at his (plaintiff's) home at Houston Heights, in said county; that during the afternoon he (John Cobb) became worse and, to wit, about 11:30 p. m. of the same day, E. S. Cobb, another son of plaintiff, prepared a written message and delivered it to defendant at Houston, Tex., for transmission by telegraph to plaintiff, at his instance and request and for his use and benefit advising him to come home at once, that his son was worse, a substantial copy of which is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit A'; that said E. S. Cobb paid defendant for the transmission of same 25 cents; that he explained to defendant's agent that plaintiff's son, the sender's brother, was very low and could not live long, and said agent agreed, in consideration of an additional amount of 50 cents, paid to it, to have the said telegram delivered that same night, to wit, the night of the 13th, which said amounts were duly paid to defendant for plaintiff's benefit; that notwithstanding defendant's duty and agreement to deliver it immediately, it was not delivered until about 4 o'clock p. m. of the next day, and after his son's death, which occurred at 1:30 p. m. on that day; that his said son was rational until a few minutes before his death, and was repeatedly asking for his father, saying he wanted to see him and talk to him; and that on account of plaintiff's failure to see his said son before his death, plaintiff has suffered great mental distress and anguish."

It is further alleged that, after sending said telegram on the night of June 13th, the said E. S. Cobb on the next day, about 1:30 p. m., delivered to defendant's agent at Houston a second telegram to be sent to his father notifying him of the condition of his son and requesting him to return home at once, but that said telegram was not delivered by the defendant until about 3:45 p. m. on said day. The petition then proceeds as follows: "Plaintiff alleges that his suffering was directly and proximately caused and occasioned by the negligence and carelessness of the said defendant company, its servants, agents and employes, in that: (1) It failed to send and deliver the first said message or telegram to plaintiff on the night of the 13th aforesaid. (2) The said first telegram having arrived at La Porte at 8:10 a. m., or about 10 minutes after 8 o'clock a. m. of the 14th of June aforesaid, defendant failed to deliver it within a reasonable time and without unnecessary delay, and that 30 minutes would have been ample time and a reasonable time in which to have delivered same, but the delivery of same was negligently and unnecessarily delayed until about 4 o'clock p. m. of said day. (3) That both of said messages were not transmitted and delivered within a reasonable time and without unnecessary delay. That notwithstanding defendant had notice of the nature and importance of said messages to plaintiff, and that up to the time of the delivery of the messages plaintiff was at Bay Ridge, it failed to deliver the first until after 4 o'clock p. m. of the 14th of June aforesaid, and after his son's death. That had defendant delivered same on the night of the 13th aforesaid, plaintiff could have taken the morning train leaving La Porte for Houston about 7:30 a. m. and arrived at home at about 8 o'clock a. m. of the 14th aforesaid. That had defendant delivered the first of said messages within a half hour, or a reasonable time after it was received at La Porte, or would have been received at La Porte by the exercise of ordinary care by defendant, plaintiff could and would have driven home, a distance of about 20 miles, within three hours, and have been with his son by 40 minutes after 11 o'clock a. m., and several hours before the death of his son. And that he did not know of the dangerous condition of his son and was deprived of the privilege of seeing him through the negligence of defendant."

In addition to a general demurrer and general denial, the defendant's answer contains a special plea setting up that it had established office hours at its office at La Porte, said hours being from 8 a. m. to 8 p. m. on week days, from 8 to 10 a. m. and from 4 to 6 p. m. on Sundays, and that at the time the telegram was filed with its agent at Houston for transmission to La Porte the office at the latter place was closed, and it was therefore impossible to transmit the telegram before 8 a. m. on the following day. Defendant also filed a special plea denying the authority of the agent at Houston, who received said telegram, to contract for the delivery of the message on the night on which it was sent, or to make any special contract with reference to the transmission and delivery of the telegram. The cause was tried with a jury, and verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of plaintiff for $1,200.

The evidence shows that plaintiff and his family resided in Houston Heights, a suburb of the city of Houston, at the time of the sending of the telegram. Plaintiff is a carpenter, and for some time prior to said date had been working at his trade at Bay Ridge, a well-known subdivision of the town of La Porte, about 18 miles from the city of Houston. He left home to go to his work at La Porte the Sunday evening before the death of his son. At that time his son, John Cobb, who was about 14 years old, was sick, having had a chill on that day; but his sickness was not thought to be serious. On the following Tuesday the boy's condition became serious, and on that night it became so alarming that the family decided to notify plaintiff and request his return home. In pursuance of this purpose, E. S. Cobb, another son of plaintiff, went to the telegraph office of appellant in the city of Houston and delivered to the receiving clerk at said office the following telegram to be sent to plaintiff at La Porte: "To J. E. Cobb, Bay Ridge, La Porte, Texas. Come at once. John is worse. [Signed] E. S. Cobb." This telegram was received by appellant's agent about 10:30 p. m.

E. S. Cobb, after stating that he first tried to communicate with his father by telephone, testified in regard to sending the telegram as follows: "I went to the telegraph office and sent a message to J. E. Cobb. That is the message I sent (referring to the telegram above copied). I delivered that message to the company's agent, I suppose. I delivered it over here at the telegraph office; at the office of the Western Union Telegraph Company over here on Main street in Houston, Tex. I did ask the agent what the charges would be to deliver that message. He charged me 40 cents to send it—to deliver it after it got to La Porte. I did explain to him where my father was. I told him he was at Bay Ridge, La Porte, Tex. I told him, I asked him, could he send it off, and he told me, 'Yes,' and I told him, well, I wished he would. The boy was very sick, and I wished he would deliver it, and I wanted him to come home. What he said about delivering it was, he told me all right. I paid the fee to send it to La Porte, 25 cents. About the charge for delivering it from La Porte to Bay Ridge, he told me 40 cents. I asked him and paid it to him. I paid him the money, and that was somewhere about 10 or 11 o'clock, and I then went home. The boy was very bad off when I went home, he was not any better at that time. The next day the effort I made to communicate with my father was: I waited and I went down to the office here frequently. He had not come in, in the first place. I had not heard anything from him, and I went to the office and asked had the telegram been delivered, and they said 'No,' and then I waited around there for awhile for to hear from him, and I never did hear, and I went on home and told my mother at once. The reason, they said, they had not delivered it, they could not find him, and I went home and told my mother at once. That was between 10 and 11 o'clock, when I went home, and then after dinner, about 1 o'clock I reckon, when I left the house, she told me to go and send him another telegram. When I sent the second telegram, it was about 1 o'clock, somewhere along there. After sending that last telegram, I waited around the telegraph office until about 5 o'clock in the evening, waited trying to hear from my father, and I heard he had got the telegram, and I went home, and when I got home the boy was dead. I suppose it was 9 o'clock or 9:30 o'clock that same night that my father got home. I was not there when my brother died. This last telegram I paid for it, to send it there is all I paid for. I paid to send it there, I mean I just paid for the message, the message fees to La Porte, straight message fees. I did not pay any special charges on the last one. On the first one I paid special charges on it to be delivered. Before I sent the first telegram on the night of the 13th, I made inquiry of the clerk there as to whether it could be delivered if I sent a telegram, if they could deliver it. That was my understanding of it, it was to be delivered that night, and after that, after he told me that, I wrote the telegram and paid him for it to go and to be delivered both."

The second telegram was as follows: "J. E. Cobb, Bay Ridge, Texas, John Stradley residence: Come home at once. John is very low. [Signed] E. S. Cobb." The first telegram before set out was not transmitted to La Porte until the morning of June 14, 1905. The indorsement upon this telegram shows that it was received at La Porte at 8:10 a. m. on June 14th. It was not delivered to plaintiff until after he had received the second telegram, which was delivered to him between 2 and 3 o'clock p. m. on said day.

The town of La Porte has a population of about 600. Bay Ridge is a well-known residence section of said town and is situated about two miles from the railroad station, where the defendant has its telegraph office. It would take about 30 minutes for a messenger to carry a telegram from the office at La Porte to Bay Ridge. Plaintiff was at work at Bay Ridge during the whole of the day of June 14th and could have been readily found if reasonable inquiry had been made in that section of the town; there not being many houses in said section. When plaintiff received the telegram informing him of the serious condition of his son, he at once inquired as to when the first train would leave for Houston and was advised by friends who were with him that there would be a train that evening, and that he could reach Houston just as soon by waiting for the train as he could by going by private conveyance, and, acting upon this suggestion, he waited for the train and arrived in Houston between 8 and 9 o'clock. His son died about half past 1 o'clock that evening. If the telegram had been delivered to plaintiff within a reasonable time after it reached La Porte, he could have reached home by private conveyance some time before his son's death. While plaintiff does not testify in express terms that he would have immediately gone to the bedside of his son upon receipt of the telegram, from the anxiety which he showed to reach home as soon as he heard of his serious condition and the undisputed evidence as to the affection which existed between the father and son, no other reasonable conclusion can be drawn than that he would have gone to him as soon as possible, and the undisputed evidence shows that he could have procured a horse and conveyance and could have reached home by such conveyance within three hours. Shortly after the telegram was received at La Porte on the morning of June 14th, it was placed in the hands of N. J. Bonner, a hack driver, who promised defendant's agent at La Porte to deliver it to plaintiff. The testimony in the record as to the efforts of Bonner to make prompt delivery, we think conclusively shows that he was negligent in such undertaking, and that, if any reasonable effort had been made to deliver the telegram, plaintiff could have received it in time to have reached home before his son's death. Plaintiff was at Bay Ridge on the night of the 13th of June, and, if the telegram had been sent to La Porte on that night, he could have been found, and the telegram delivered, if there had been reasonable diligence on the part of the defendant to make such delivery. A train left La Porte for Houston about 8 a. m. on the morning of the 14th, and, if plaintiff had received the telegram on the night it was sent, he would have taken this train for Houston and arrived at home about 9 a. m.

The agent of defendant at Houston who received the telegram on the night of June 13th had no authority to contract with E. S.

Cobb that said telegram would be transmitted and delivered that night. The telegraph office at La Porte was closed at the time the message was received at Houston, and it was impossible to have transmitted said telegram before 8 a. m. on June 14th. The regulation of the defendant as to office hours at La Porte was reasonable.

Under appropriate assignments of error, the appellant complains of the charge of the court submitting to the jury the issue of negligence on the part of the appellant in failing to transmit and deliver the telegram on the night of June 13th under the special contract alleged to have been made with the Houston agent, and of the refusal of the court to charge the jury, at appellant's request, that the failure of defendant to transmit the message on the night of June 13th was not negligence. We agree with appellant that under the pleading and evidence it could not be held liable for failure to transmit and deliver the telegram on the night of June 13th, and that issue ought not to have been submitted to the jury.

Conceding for the sake of argument that appellant might be held liable on the special contract to deliver the message on the night of June 13th notwithstanding its office at La Porte, under a reasonable rule as to office hours, was closed at the time the telegram was received for transmission at Houston, and it was therefore impossible to send it to La Porte that night, it could not be held upon a special contract of this kind made by an agent who had no authority to make same, and the undisputed evidence shows that the agent of appellant who it is claimed by appellee made said contract had no such authority. The issue of estoppel against appellant's denial of the authority of said agent to make the contract based upon his apparent authority is not raised by the pleadings, and it is therefore not in the case. Trespalcios Rice Co. v. Eldman, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 542, 93 S. W. 699. This error in the charge, however, does not require or authorize a reversal of the judgment because the undisputed evidence establishes as a matter of law that appellant was negligent in failing to use reasonable care to make timely delivery of the telegram after its receipt at La Porte, and that as a result of such negligence appellee failed to see his son before his death and was thereby caused to suffer mental pain and anguish as alleged in his petition. Such being the state of the evidence, no other verdict than one in favor of appellee could have been properly rendered, and therefore the error in the charge was immaterial.

There is no merit in the assignment assailing the verdict on the ground that it is excessive. There is nothing in the record to raise a suspicion that in arriving at the amount of their verdict the jury were influenced by any improper motive, and the size of the verdict is not such as to justify this court to conclude that they were actuated by any improper motive, or that the amount awarded was not the result of their unimpassioned and unprejudiced judgment as to what amount would fairly compensate appellee for the wrong sustained by him through appellant's negligence. Telegraph Co. v. Sloss (Tex. Civ. App.) 100 S. W. 854.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed, and it has been so ordered.

HOUSTON & T. C. R. CO. v. MALLOY.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 19, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 8, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 150*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—FAILURE TO WARN.

In action for injuries to servant, defendant held negligent in failing to warn plaintiff of the danger in the manner in which the work was done.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 297; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 213*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMED RISK.

Plaintiff held not to have assumed the risk of injury from metal flying out under blows from the sledge hammer which he was using under directions of his foreman.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 245*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where plaintiff was injured by striking the axle of a railroad locomotive with a sledge hammer in accordance with the direction of his foreman, and the danger was not so patent to plaintiff as to justify him in refusing to obey his superior's command or to require a finding that no prudent man would have undertaken it, plaintiff's act of obedience was not negligence.

4. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL OF REQUEST.

Where the court's main charge sufficiently presented the law of the case on the issues involved, the court did not err in refusing defendant's special request.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Admission of plaintiff's statement that, if metal which struck his eye under a blow from a sledge hammer had been steel, the accident might have been more serious, was harmless error, where defendant consented to the introduction of a portion of plaintiff's written statement that plaintiff believed it was a particle of lead that hit him, and that if it had been steel it would have gone through the plaintiff's head further than it did, and that he did not think it could have been a piece of the hammer.

Error from District Court, Harris County; Norman G. Kittrell, Judge.

Action by Charles P. Malloy against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood and Lane, Jackson, Kelley & Walters, for plaintiff in error. Lovejoy & Parker, for defendant in error.

McMEANS, J. This suit was brought by Charles P. Malloy, as plaintiff, against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him while in its employ. The plaintiff alleged that he was employed by the company as a boiler maker, and was sent from Houston to Austin, November, 1905, to work on certain boilers at that place; that while so engaged he was sent for by one Glass, foreman of the company's roundhouse at Austin, to assist in adjusting a driving wheel of a locomotive on the axle by striking with a hammer on the end or face of the axle; that, in obedience to the order of said roundhouse foreman, he struck with great force with a sledge hammer on the end of the axle, and thereby caused a portion of lead, babbitt, or other soft metal in the end of the axle to fly or spurt out and strike him in the eye, causing the loss of one eye. The plaintiff alleged with particularity that his injuries "were due to the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, its agents, servants, and employes, in this: That plaintiff was not employed by defendant to do the character of work which he was required to perform, and which he was performing, when injured; that the work involved the danger of lead or babbitt or other soft metal flying or spurring out under the blows of the hammer, and was more perilous than the work plaintiff was employed to perform; that plaintiff was inexperienced in said work, and was ignorant of the danger of said metal flying or spurring out under the blows delivered by him on the end or the face of the said axle, and that he had not equal means with the defendant of knowing the danger; that defendant and its agents, servants, and employes in charge of the said work knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care would have known, of the danger, and they knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care would have known, of plaintiff's inexperience and ignorance, and, so knowing, they wholly failed to warn him of such danger. And, in this connection, plaintiff further alleges that the method employed in doing the work was not the one usually and customarily employed in such cases; that the usual methods in doing said work were slackening the tire of the wheel by heating the same, by means of hydraulic pressure, to be applied in the regular workshops, etc.; that the defendant was familiar with such methods, and had the facilities for applying the same, and that such methods involved no peril to those employed in their execution, and plaintiff is informed that defendant, after his injury, did in fact, adjust the said wheel by the use of a sufficient and proper method, namely, hydraulic pressure." The defendant answered by general demurrer, general denial, and pleaded assumed risk and contributory negligence. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for the sum of $6,000. The case is now properly before us on writ of error.

The evidence justifies the following conclusions of fact: Plaintiff was about 30 years old, and had worked several years in railroad shops, and was an expert boiler maker, and was employed in that capacity in defendant's railroad shops in Houston. In November, 1905, several days before his injury, he had been sent by his foreman, at Houston, to Austin, to make certain repairs upon boilers of locomotives there, and directed to report to one Glass, the defendant's foreman at Austin, upon his arrival. This he did, and was put to work by Glass upon the boilers he was sent to repair, and continuously engaged in this work up to the 28th of November, 1905, when the foreman, Glass, sent for him to assist in trying to force into position one of the driving wheels of a locomotive that had moved a little out of line on the axle. The axle, when originally made, is turned or rounded by means of a lathe, the axle being held by appliances at each end in holes called "lathe holes," that are afterwards filled with lead or babbitt metal, which conceals the hole and makes the end of the axle smooth, and gives it the appearance, after it is painted, of being solid. Plaintiff knew that lathe holes were in the ends of all such axles, and that some of these holes were filled with lead or babbitt metal, but at the time in question he did not think of it. When he reached the engine he found the foreman and some of his machinists striking the end of the axle, and was told by the foreman to strike with the hammer on a piece of iron which was held against the end of the axle; but this he declined to do, for fear that the iron, being brittle, would break under the force of his blows, and that flying particles might injure himself or some of the others present, and, to demonstrate the reasonableness of his fear, struck the iron a light blow which broke it. The iron was then removed, and plaintiff was directed by the foreman to strike on the naked end of the axle, which he did, without the hoped-for result. Plaintiff then suggested the use of a ram, and one was constructed; but the piece of iron used as a ram was too light to answer the purpose, and this method was abandoned. The foreman again directed plaintiff to strike the end of the axle with the hammer, and although the latter protested that his efforts would be futile, because the driving wheels were placed on the axles by hydraulic pressure of forty or fifty thousand pounds and could not be moved by the method employed by the foreman, he, in compliance with the orders of the foreman, again began striking the naked end of the axle, and on delivering the last blow a piece of lead or babbitt metal, with which the lathe hole was filled, spurted out, striking plaintiff in the eye with such force as to destroy the sight and to require the removal of the eye. The work which plaintiff was called upon to perform was work usually done by machinists and their helpers, and not by boiler makers, but the work in question was not such as required any special skill further than to strike with reasonable accuracy a heavy blow with a sledge hammer. It was not infrequently the case that boiler makers would be directed by their superiors to do certain kinds of work usually performed by machinists where no special skill was required, and, when called upon by the proper authorities to do such work, were required to obey. Had plaintiff thought about it, he would have known that the soft metal was in the lathe hole; but he had never worked with that character of metal, nor had he ever done that character of work before, nor had he seen it done, and did not know that the metal was likely to fly out under the force of the blows. The foreman did know this, however, although he did not think of it at the time; and the uncontradicted evidence is that such blows delivered on the face of the axle frequently caused the soft metal to spurt out with such force as to injure persons near by, and that this was known to machinists generally. Plaintiff was unaware of this danger, and the foreman did not warn him nor did he take any precaution against plaintiff being injured by the flying out of the metal. It was shown that the reason the metal flew out was because plaintiff, although directed to strike as near the center of the face of the axle as possible, did not strike truly, so that the face of the hammer did not entirely cover the soft metal in the lathe hole and thereby prevent the spurting out of the metal, but that with a hammer weighing 18 to 20 pounds it is impossible to strike in the same place every time. The end of the axle had been painted, and the lead or babbitt metal was not visible prior to the blow that caused a part of it to fly out and injure plaintiff.

Under these facts we conclude that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in striking upon the axle under the circumstances, nor was his injury the result of a risk assumed by him, but was due to the negligence of defendant in failing to warn plaintiff of a latent danger of which the plaintiff did not know, but of which the defendant knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known.

By its first assignment of error plaintiff in error complains of the refusal of the court to give its first special charge instructing the jury that under the undisputed facts the plaintiff had failed to show any liability on the part of the defendant, and to return a verdict for defendant. It is urged in support of this assignment (1) that the testimony being undisputed, and the facts being such that ordinary minds could not differ in concluding that no actionable negligence was shown, it was the duty of the trial court to direct a verdict for the defendant as requested in the special charge; (2) that whatever danger there was of the lead or babbitt metal flying out under the blows from the hammer was as well known to plaintiff, as open to his observation, as to the foreman, and there being no defect in the instruments used, and the flying out of the lead or babbitt metal being the natural effect of a blow from a hammer on soft metal, the resulting injury was a known risk or danger ordinarily incident to such work, for which the defendant was not liable; and (3) that the undisputed testimony showing that the flying out of the soft metal was directly caused by the improper and careless manner in which plaintiff struck the blows, not on the center of the axle face, his own careless conduct was the proximate cause of the injury, and he was not entitled to recover.

The foregoing findings necessarily dispose of these contentions adversely to plaintiff in error. The danger to which plaintiff was subjected was not open to his observation and was not known by him, but was known to the foreman, who was the representative of the master. Plaintiff had had no previous experience in that kind of work, further than that he knew how to wield a sledge hammer; and he was employed in a different department of the service from those whose duties required them to perform such work, yet he was called from his duties and ordered to perform service in another department, which order he was required to obey, and which he undertook to obey without knowledge of the danger, and was given no warning by the foreman.

In Railway v. Callbreath, 66 Tex. 526, 1 S. W. 622, it is said by our Supreme Court: "As a general rule it is not the duty of the employer to instruct him (the employe) as to the rules of the service, or warn him of the dangers incident thereto, unless information be asked." Railway Company v. Watts, 64 Tex. 568. But the court proceeds to say: "This rule is subject to some qualifications. It was held by the court in the case last cited that, the servant being inexperienced and ignorant of the dangers of the service upon which he was just entering, it was the duty of the company to have informed him of the dangers. The law is thus stated by a well known text-writer: 'When there are hazards incident to an occupation, which the master knows or ought to know, it is his duty to warn the servant of them fully, and, failing to do so, he is liable to him for any injury that he may sustain in consequence of such neglect; and this rule applies where the danger or hazard is patent, if through youth, inexperience, or other cause the servant is incompetent to fully understand the nature and extent of the hazard.' Wood on Master and Servant, 714." Railway Company v. Rutland (Tex. Civ. App.) 101 S. W. 531. As said in the case last cited: "We think that the correct rule applicable to cases where the danger is secret and extraordinary, as in the present case, is thus stated in appellees' brief, quoting from Labatt on Master and Servant: 'The doctrine which may be regarded as representing the converse of the propositions, discussed in the preceding sections, is that a master is prima facie bound to instruct a servant as to all risks which are abnormal or extraordinary, and at the same time of such a kind that the servant cannot be held chargeable with an adequate comprehension of their nature and extent, or of the proper means by which to safeguard himself. The presumption is that all risks which belong to this category are not known to the servant. Hence the question whether the servant should have been warned is always for the jury, where the evidence is fairly susceptible of the construction that the peril to which his injury was due was one of this description, and there is no positive evidence tending to charge him with actual or constructive knowledge of that peril.' Labatt, Master and Servant, §§ 240, 241; Bailey, Master and Servant, 111 et seq., 124, 125; Mather v. Rillston, 156 U. S. 399, 15 Sup. Ct. 464, 39 L. Ed. 464; Dowling v. Allen, 74 Mo. 13, 41 Am. Rep. 298; Perry v. Marsh, 25 Ala. 659; Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501, 27 N. W. 662, 1 Am. St. Rep. 542; Fox v. Peninsular Car Works, 84 Mich. 676, 48 N. W. 203; McGowan v. La Plata, etc., Works (C. C.) 9 Fed. 861; Kliegel v. Aitken, 94 Wis. 432, 69 N. W. 67, 35 L. R. A. 251, 59 Am. St. Rep. 901; W. U. Tel. Co. v. McMullen, 58 N. J. Law, 155, 33 Atl. 384, 32 L. R. A. 353."

Applying this rule to the facts of the present case, we think the evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that plaintiff in error was negligent in failing to instruct the plaintiff as to the danger in the work which he was ordered to perform. Nor do we think that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence as a matter of law in the manner in which he struck upon the face of the axle. It may be that if he had struck truly in the center the metal would not have spurted out, but the fact that he did not so strike was not because of carelessness upon his part, but because of the impossibility of any one striking, with such an implement, in the same place at every blow. There is nothing in the facts of this case to justify the court in taking the case from the jury.

The danger of striking upon the axle was not so patent to plaintiff as to justify him in refusing to obey the command of his superior, or to render such obedience an act of negligence under the circumstances. "Where an act is done by one in obedience to the order of his foreman, the law will not declare the act of obedience negligence per se, unless the danger of obeying the order was so obvious and glaring from the servant's standpoint at the time he undertook to obey it that no prudent man would have undertaken it, but will leave it to the jury to say whether he ought to have obeyed it or not." Railway v. Wray, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 380, 96 S. W. 74, 16 Tex. Ct. Rep. 679; Railway Company v. Puente, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 246, 70 S. W. 362, 5 Tex. Ct. Rep. 957.

There are a number of assignments of error complaining of the charge of the court and the action of the court in refusing special charges. We think the main charge of the court sufficiently presented to the jury the law of the case upon the issues involved. In our judgment it contains no errors of which the plaintiff in error can complain, and sufficiently embraces the law applicable to the facts proved as to render the requested special charges wholly unnecessary. The charge of the court, omitting various definitions, is as follows:

"Now, therefore, if you shall believe from a preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff, while at work for defendant on certain of its boilers at Austin, Texas, was sent for by Charles Glass, foreman of defendant's roundhouse at Austin, and ordered by said Glass to strike with a sledge hammer with great force upon the end or face of the axle or journal of a locomotive, and believe there was lead in a hole in the end of the said axle or journal, and that the striking by plaintiff caused a portion of the lead to fly or spurt out and strike plaintiff in his right eye, and injure the eye so that the same had to be and was thereafter removed; and you further believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the said Glass, as foreman of defendant's roundhouse, had authority to order plaintiff to strike upon the axle or journal, and you believe that plaintiff was caused to strike thereupon by the order of said Glass, and that in so doing he did that which a man of ordinary prudence would have done under the circumstances, and you believe that the flying or spurring out of the lead under the blows delivered by plaintiff and striking him in the eye, if it did that, was a latent or secret danger incident to the said work of striking, and believe that the said danger, if any, was known to the defendant and the said Glass before the said striking, and believe that the said danger, if any, was unknown to plaintiff at the time of the said striking, and would not have been known to him in the exercise of ordinary care at said time, and believe that the said Glass, in ordering plaintiff to strike upon the said axle or journal, if he did that, rested under a duty to plaintiff to warn him of the said danger, if you find there was such danger, and believe he failed to give him such warning, and that in so failing he was guilty of negligence as that term has been hereinbefore defined to you, and you believe that such negligence, if any, was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, and you do not find that plaintiff assumed the risk of injury, or was himself guilty of contributory negligence, as herein-after explained to you—you will return a verdict for plaintiff, but, unless you so find, you will return a verdict for defendant.

"If, however, you do not find from a preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff was caused to lose his eye by lead flying or spurring out of a hole in the end of the axle or journal under the striking of plaintiff; or if you do believe that he lost his eye from such cause, but do not believe such action of the lead was a latent or secret danger, or if you believe that the said danger, if any, was unknown to the said Glass and would not have been known to him in the exercise of ordinary care; or if you believe the danger was not of such character as to impose upon the said Glass, when he ordered plaintiff to strike upon the said axle or journal, if he did that, the duty to warn him thereof in the exercise of ordinary care; or if you believe plaintiff had equal means with defendant of knowing the danger, if any—you will, without inquiring further, return a verdict for defendant.

"Or if you believe the striking was attended by a latent or secret danger, but yet you believe that the plaintiff knew thereof, or in the exercise of ordinary care would necessarily have known thereof; or if you believe the said danger, if any, was open to ordinary observation, or was patent or obvious—then in either such case he assumed the risk of injury therefrom, and you will return a verdict for the defendant.

"Or if you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff carelessly and recklessly struck upon the axle or journal and upon the lead or other soft metals thereof in such manner and with such force as to cause his injury, as that in so doing he was guilty of 'contributory negligence,' you will also return a verdict for defendant.

"Or, if you believe that the accident which occurred to plaintiff was one which arose from the ordinary risks of the business in which he was engaged, you will find for defendant.

"Or, if you believe the plaintiff's injury was the result of an accident, you will also return a verdict for defendant.

"Or if you find that the plaintiff has failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the injury to his eye was caused by a piece of lead or babbitt or other soft metal which was in the end of the journal striking him in the eye, or if he has failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence what missile struck him and where it came from, you will find for defendant."

Plaintiff in error's fourth assignment is as follows: "The court erred in permitting the plaintiff to testify, over the objection of the defendant, that, if the missile which struck him in the eye had been a piece of steel off of the hammer, it would have produced a more serious injury than that which occurred to him; because the plaintiff testified that he did not know what struck him in the eye, and this question and answer elicited merely an inference, based upon his opinion, and should not have been permitted to go to the jury as evidence."

Plaintiff alleged, and was then endeavoring to prove, that the missile that injured him was a piece of lead or babbitt metal that flew out of the lathe holes under the force of his blows. While testifying in his own behalf, he was asked by his counsel: "If that had been a piece of steel off of the hammer, what would have been the result?" and was permitted, over the objection of defendant, to reply: "It might have been more serious." If the evidence was not competent, and upon this we make no decision, we think that its admission was harmless error, because it seems clear the defendant waived the objection by consenting for plaintiff to introduce in evidence the following portion of his written statement, made at the instance of defendant soon after he was hurt: "After hitting several times, a piece of metal flew and hit me in the eye. It is my idea it was a particle of lead that hit me. I think, had it been steel, it would have gone through my head further than it did. I do not hardly think it could have been a piece of the hammer, as the journal (axle) was of sufficient width so that I would not hit an edge which might have silvered it." The defendant then introduced in evidence the whole of the statement, including the portion above set out. The assignment is overruled.

We are of the opinion that plaintiff in error's assignments present no reversible errors, and the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

MAYES v. MILLER et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 7, 1909.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 85*)—CONSIDERATION—AGREEMENT TO RESCIND.

A deed to land purchased under an agreement to refund the money if the vendor does not dig an oil well on neighboring land is a sufficient consideration for the promise of the vendor to refund the purchase money, and a rescission of the contract of sale and a transfer of the property back to the vendor constitutes a sufficient consideration for a promise to return the purchase money.

Appeal from Harris County Court; A. E. Amerman, Judge.

Action by W. H. Miller and another against A. B. Mayes. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Masterson, Atkinson & Masterson, for appellant. Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood, for appellees.

FLY, J. This is a suit instituted by W. H. Miller and T. T. Cotman to recover of appellant the sum of $625, alleged to be due by appellant on a written promise to pay the same. The cause was tried by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of appellees.

It appears that appellant, for himself and others, sold to appellees 2½ acres of land in Matagorda county for $625, which was paid by them. It appears from letters written by appellant that he had promised to dig an oil well on land near that he sold to appellees, and that if he did not he would refund the purchase money. He did not have the well dug, and agreed, if appellees would send a deed to the land and a check for the amount, that he would pay it. The deed and check were sent, and appellant failed to pay the amount due by him on his promise. He admits that he made the promise to refund the money, but did not do so because he had failed to sell the land to another party.

The deed to the land was a sufficient consideration for the promise to refund the money. The land may not have been worth the amount appellant agreed to pay for it, but that would not destroy the consideration. Appellant got that amount for the land, and cannot avoid his repurchase on the ground of a want of consideration. A rescission of the contract of sale and a transfer of the property back to appellant constituted a sufficient consideration for the return of the purchase money, when it was voluntarily agreed to by appellant. It would not matter what appellees' reason was for desiring to reconvey the property to appellant. The latter agreed to the reconveyance, and agreed to repay the money they had paid him for the land.

made, and upon which patents have issued, are declared valid, and the titles to the lands within their lines are vested in the counties for which the same were made, and in all such surveys the calls for distance shall control calls for natural objects when the calls for distance will give the quantity of land intended to be included in the survey and the calls for natural objects will not. Held, that the boundaries of the survey of school land will be determined by the field notes, and the calls of the survey will not be affected by a mistake of the surveyor, and the ordinary rules of ascertaining the effect of calls will not affect the right of the county to all of the lands embraced in any of the calls in the field notes which can be ascertained with certainty, although the survey so constructed will contain an excess, and it is permissible in ascertaining the boundaries of school lands to run a reverse course from that stated in the field notes, where such a method recognizes the controlling influence of the only calls the identity of which is clearly established.

Appeal from District Court, Travis County; Chas. A. Wilcox, Judge.

Action by J. M. Lewright and others against Travis County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

James & Yelser, for appellants. John W. Brady, Co. Atty., D. W. Doom, and D. H. Doom, for appellee.

FISHER, C. J. This is an action of trespass to try title, brought by the appellants against Travis county to recover certain lands described in plaintiffs' petition.

The defendant answered, claiming title to a part of the land described in the plaintiffs' petition, and disclaimed as to other lands not contained within the boundaries of the Travis county school survey. The answer in this respect is as follows: "That the defendant disclaims all interest in or claim to any part of the land sued for by the plaintiffs, except that part included in all that certain tract of land lying and being situated in the county of Throckmorton (formerly in the county of Cooke), in the state of Texas, viz.: Four leagues of land, situated and described as follows: In Cooke county on the Salt fork of the Brazos about 28 miles north 60° west of Fort Belknap, by virtue of an act of Congress of the late republic of Texas, entitled an act appropriating certain lands for the establishment of a general system of education, approved January 26, 1839, beginning 1,944 varas north of the southwest corner of a one-third league survey No. 9, a stake from which a mesquite marked X bears south 44½° W., 28 varas, another forked marked X bears S. 12° W., 44 vrs., thence west 10,000 varas to a pile of stones, from which a mesquite marked X bears N. 64° W., 35 vrs., another marked X bears S. 73° W., 100 varas, a round mound bears S. 18½° E., 2,200 varas; thence south 10,000 varas to a stake in prairie, from which a mesquite marked X bears S. 40° E., 40 varas and another forked marked X bears S. 61½° W., 40 varas. Thence east 10,000 varas to a stake on the north boundary line of Colony survey. Thence north at 1,283 varas pass the southwest corner of survey No. 7 of 1,280 acres, 10,000 varas, to the place of beginning. That as to all of the said land sued for included in the said four leagues of land hereinbefore described, the said defendant denies all and singular the allegations contained in the said amended original petition, and says that it is not guilty of the said supposed wrongs, injuries, and trespasses, or any of them, laid to its charge in the said amended original petition, as therein stated, and of this it puts itself upon the country and prays judgment."

This survey is known as the Travis county school land, title to which is alleged and claimed by the defendant. This land was surveyed according to the field notes as stated in defendant's answer for Travis county in 1854, and a patent therefor, as described in the field notes, was issued on the 16th day of October, 1856. The lands claimed by the defendant were surveyed in 1888, and patent issued in that year. The plaintiffs' surveys called to commence at the southwest corner or the south line of the Travis county school land. It is conceded by both parties, and the case was so treated in the trial court, that the question in controversy, and the one to be determined, is the whereabouts of the true location of the south line of the Travis county school land. Plaintiffs contend that this south line should be located running east from the southwest corner of the Travis county school lands where this corner would be established by course and distance called for in the field notes from the northwest corner of the survey. There can be no question but what this northwest corner is well established, and its whereabouts can be ascertained from the round mound called for in the field notes. The defendant contends that the south line of the Travis county school land should be established to coincide with the calls in the field notes for the north boundary line of the Colony surveys. It is a fact well established, and about which there is no controversy, that the Colony lines called for are well established and can be found upon the ground. The verdict of the jury was general in favor of the defendant, and upon that verdict the court rendered judgment establishing the south line of the Travis county school land in accordance with the contention of the appellee. If the judgment of the court can be maintained in so establishing the south line, the appellee is entitled to recover all of the land sued for by the plaintiffs, except that to which the disclaimer applies.

The assignments of error raise a number of interesting questions which the view that we take of the case renders it unnecessary

ry that we should decide. We think the disposition of this case is controlled by article 4269 of the Revised Statutes of 1895 as construed and applied in Steward v. Coleman County, 95 Tex. 446, 67 S. W. 1016, which law was in force at the time the appellants' location and surveys were made. The case cited was before this court and will be found reported in 65 S. W. 384. It involved the location of the lines of a part of the Coleman county school lands. Our opinion, which is referred to as possibly stating the field notes more fully than the opinion of the Supreme Court, shows that the beginning corner of that survey was the northwest corner of the Samuel T. Belt, and called for course and distance for a certain point, and also for the north line of the Montez survey and of other surveys. The distance called for did not reach the lines of the other surveys called for and fell short about 400 varas. A strip of that width was subsequently located and claimed by the appellants Steward and others; he contending that the calls for course and distance should control over the lines of the other surveys called for. The only corner actually established on the ground was the beginning corner, and from that point the calls and surveys were made by projection. Steward recovered in the court below, but we reversed and rendered judgment in favor of Coleman county, holding to the effect that the calls for the other surveys would control the calls for course and distance, and that the south line of the Coleman surveys should be established on the north line of the surveys called for, thereby holding that there was no vacancy between the Coleman county surveys and that tier of surveys. Our judgment of rendition in favor of the county was based upon the superiority of the calls of the river surveys, and we determined the question as we would any ordinary case of boundary where county school lands were not involved. The Supreme Court granted a writ of error and affirmed the judgment of this court, but upon a different ground indicated in its opinion, wherein they applied the article of the statute referred to. So much of the opinion that relates to this question is as follows:

"As before stated, the writ of error was granted, because it was thought there was error in the holding of the Court of Civil Appeals that, upon the uncontradicted facts, the land in question was included in the plaintiff's survey, and in the rendition of judgment for plaintiff. We have concluded that the judgment was justified by the provisions of the statute (article 4269, Rev. St. 1895) which escaped our attention when we granted the writ; and we may add that, when the facts are fully understood, it is by no means clear that, without such a statute, the judgment would be wrong. The provision is as follows: 'Art. 4269. The surveys of all county school lands heretofore made, either actually on the ground or by protraction, and returned into the General Land Office according to law, and upon which patents have issued, are hereby declared valid surveys, and the titles to the lands included within the lines of said surveys, as returned to the General Land Office, are hereby vested in the counties for which the same were made; and in all such surveys the calls for distance shall have precedence and control calls for rivers or natural objects when the call for distance will give the quantity of land intended to be included in the survey and the calls for natural objects or rivers will not; provided, this law shall not divest any vested right.'

"To show its application a general statement of a rather complicated state of facts is necessary. Coleman county school survey No. 91, intended by the surveyor to embrace a league, was made upon a body of vacant land lying between two tiers of older surveys; those on the south bordering on the Colorado river and being separated from those on the north by the intervening vacancy. There was no actual survey of the lines of survey No. 91 beyond the finding of one of the corners of the northern tier of surveys. Beginning at this corner, the surveyor merely platted in between the older surveys the land which he intended to appropriate, calling for their lines and corners and giving the courses and distances which he believed would reach them. The field notes and a sketch, showing this action and representing the land taken up by him as occupying the whole of the space between the northern and southern surveys, he returned to the land office, and a patent was issued giving the field notes so returned. The evidence shows that the distances from the northern surveys to those on the south, as given in these field notes, do not reach the northern boundaries of the latter, and that, if these calls for distance are to control in locating the southern boundary of survey No. 91, it does not include most of the land in controversy; while, if the calls for the lines of the river surveys are to govern, all of the space between the older surveys is taken up. The evidence further shows that the surveyor before platting survey No. 91, in order to ascertain the distances between the northern and southern surveys, ran a line between two of them west of the point where he afterwards fixed the western boundary of the league in question. In so doing he started at a point which he supposed to be the northeast corner of one of the river surveys, but which was in fact 401 varas north of the true corner. In extending his line north from this point, he located, as he supposed, the northwest corner of that one of the southern surveys which at this place bordered on the vacant tract, and there erected a mound for the corner of the two. It thus resulted that this corner was fixed 401 varas too far north, and the vacant tract was thus assumed to be too narrow. The line thus run on the ground was not made one of the lines of survey No. 91, nor are any of the corners which the surveyor thus mistakenly established called for or referred to in the field notes of that survey, and his error is no way indicated in his return to the land office. The only influence which the running of this preliminary line had upon the subsequent work of platting survey No. 91 was to cause the surveyor to mistake the width of the vacancy and to include in the league survey an excess of about 1,500 acres, if his calls for the lines of the river surveys are regarded.

"We are relieved by the statute of the necessity of determining what, upon general principles, should be the proper construction of this office work. The language used in the statute vesting in the counties 'the titles to the lands included within the lines of said surveys,' as returned to the General Land Office,' applies exactly to the question before us. By the description returned to the land office, the lines of this survey are the same as the lines of the older grants. There is nothing in this description to raise any question as to the mistake of the surveyor or to suggest any other lines than those expressly given. The land included in these lines appears on the face of the field notes to be all that lies between the two tiers of surveys called for, and the express language of the statute governs. The fact that the rule laid down is made to apply to surveys made actually on the ground, as well as to those made by protraction, shows that the Legislature intended to prescribe one broad general rule to the construction of grants of school lands to counties, and that rule is that the land included in the patents shall be held to be that included in the lines returned to the land office, without regard to mistakes in surveying, such as that which occurred here. The case is a good example of the application of the statute. Lines are given which embrace all of the land between two sets of surveys, but the surveyor, by a mistake not shown by his return, has erroneously stated the distance, and the lines given in the land office are made to conclusively control, whether the distance and quantity are as the surveyor intended or not. No other application of the statute will give complete effect to its language. The final provision strengthens this construction, for it expressly makes the distances called for govern as against natural objects, where necessary to include the quantity, which is a precautionary provision against the effect the first part of the article would otherwise have. It will not do to say that the language, 'lands included within the lines as returned to the General Land Office,' means merely such lands as are found on a trial of the question of boundary to be so included, for that construction would make this provision wholly useless. The evident meaning is the lines as stated on the face of the description filed in the land office.

"No right which vested prior to the passage of the statute is shown by defendants, and the subject was entirely within the control of the Legislature. The judgment is correct."

This construction of the statute means that the boundaries of the survey will be determined by the field notes returned to the land office, and that the calls of the survey will not be affected by a mistake of the surveyor, and the ordinary rules of ascertaining and determining the effect of calls and establishing boundaries will not affect the right of the county to all of the lands embraced in any of the calls in the field notes which can be ascertained with any degree of certainty, although the survey so constructed will contain an excess. The object of the statute was to appropriate to the benefit of the county all of the lands included within those calls in the field notes so returned to the land office which were most favorable to the county, provided they could be ascertained and identified, although such calls might be inconsistent with some other calls, such, for instance, as was the case in the Coleman county lands, where the calls for distance were made to yield to the calls for lines of other surveys. In other words, in its final analysis, this decision means that, in ascertaining the boundaries of county school lands, such construction will be given to the field notes so returned to the land office as to give to the county the benefit of those calls that are most favorable to its interests, when they can be ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty, although by so doing some other call may be displaced which might, under the ordinary rules of determining the superiority of calls, be given effect and made to control in cases where the lines of county school lands were not involved.

There is enough similarity between the facts of this case and those stated in the opinion cited as to make the principle upon which that case is based applicable here. There the county relied upon the calls for the lines of other surveys over a call for course and distance from an established corner, although the effect would be to give the county a large excess, and in that case the field notes so returned contained the calls for the lines of other surveys and also the calls for course and distance from a known corner. This latter call did not reach the line of the surveys called for. This statement shows the similarity between the calls in the field notes set out in that case, and those set out in the Travis county survey. By force of the statute referred to, the court in the Coleman County Case held the boundaries of the survey would extend to the lines of the surveys called for. In this case it appears that the northwest corner of the Travis county school land is established a certain distance from the round mound called for in the field notes returned to the land office. The court below, as well as the parties to this appeal, treat that corner as ascertained by the surveyor Howerin to be well established and located where he fixed it, running course and distance from the round mound as called for. From that point the west line of the survey is constructed by course and distance south 10,000 varas for the southwest corner. Bearing trees are called for at this point, but none are found. From thence the call is for 10,000 varas east for the Colony line. This latter line is well established, and there is no controversy as to its location. From the southeast corner the call is north to the northeast corner 10,000 varas to the place of beginning. The northeast corner is not found on the ground.

The plaintiffs contend: That the survey should be constructed by running from the northwest corner south the course and distance called for, and then run east the course and distance called, so as to establish the south line of the survey, and claim that the call for the Colony line by the surveyor was a mistake; that in constructing the survey in this way Travis county will get the quantity of land she is entitled to; that to extend the survey to the Colony line will include a large excess. The judgment rendered by the trial court in establishing the south line of the Travis county school land ignored the call for distance, as claimed by the plaintiffs, and extended the survey to the line of the Colony surveys, where the judgment establishes the south line to be. While the Colony line does not extend west the full distance of the Travis county land, it does extend west some considerable distance from where the east line of the Travis county school land would intersect it, if extended to it, as called for; and where this point of intersection should be can be readily determined by commencing at the fixed and ascertained northwest corner of the survey and running east 10,000 varas for the northeast corner, thence south the course called for in order to reach the Colony line, and the point on the line so reached would be the southeast corner of the survey, thence west along the Colony line for its distance and therefrom extending the line the distance called for, and thence north to the northwest corner of the survey. This, it is true, would construct the survey by running a reverse course from that stated in the field notes, but a resort to this method would close the survey, and would be in recognition of the importance and controlling influence of the only two calls which cannot well be questioned, and the identity of which is clearly established. These calls for the northwest corner and the Colony line on the south, if adhered to, fix definite points of the survey which includes all of the land lying between them, and they fix the measure of the land the county is entitled to, although the result would be to displace a conflicting call for distance. Such is the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Coleman County Case.

We do not think that this case can be distinguished from the one cited on the ground merely that there is evidence in the record to the effect that the surveyor actually ran the west line and established the southwest corner the course and distance called for from the northwest corner. The discussion of the statute in the opinion in the case cited, and as we construed it, in effect disposes of this question, for there it is held that the county is to get the benefit of calls in the field notes that can be definitely ascertained, although to do so would be to ignore and disregard some other calls. Notwithstanding what has been said in Ayers v. Lancaster, 64 Tex. 312, and the suggestion in appellants' brief, we see no good reason why this survey could not be constructed by reversing the course from the northwest corner.

If we are correct in the views expressed, no other judgment was possible than the one rendered by the trial court. Therefore it is unnecessary to consider the errors assigned.

Judgment affirmed.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 19*)—FEDERAL QUESTION—JOINT DEFENDANTS.

An action brought against a corporation created under an act of Congress and an employé of such corporation to establish a joint liability for the same wrong is, as to such individual defendant as well as to the corporation, an action arising under the federal Constitution or laws, within Act Aug. 13, 1888, c. 860, 25 Stat. 433 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508), and is therefore removable to a federal court on petition of both defendants.

TALBOT, J. This suit was instituted August 23, 1907, by Mrs. M. M. Beckworth, for herself and minor son, John Beckworth, against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and T. M. Watts, jointly, to recover damages in the sum of $40,000 alleged to have been sustained on account of the negligent killing of J. P. Beckworth, husband of plaintiff and father of her said minor son, by said defendant in the operation of one of the railway company's passenger trains within the limits of the city of Grand Saline, Van Zandt county, Tex., on May 9, 1907. The petition avers that the plaintiff and her said son are resident citizens of said Van Zandt county and state of Texas; that the defendant the Texas & Pacific Railway Company is duly incorporated and has a local agent in said county, namely, W. P. Gibson; and that the defendant T. M. Watts resides in Harrison county, state of Texas, and was the engineer in charge of and operating the locomotive engine drawing the train that struck and killed the said J. P. Beckworth, deceased. The Texas & Pacific Railway Company, joined by the defendant T. M. Watts, in due time filed its petition and bond, which bond was approved by the court, for the removal of the cause to the federal court for the Eastern district of Texas, on the ground that it was chartered by an act of Congress. Upon the presentation of the petition for removal, it was refused, for the reason, as shown by the judgment of the court, that the court had jurisdiction of the defendant Watts, and the case was not therefore removable. The case was then tried on its merits, and judgment rendered in favor of appellees for the sum of $4,000, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

The first assignment of error questions the correctness of the court's action in refusing to grant appellant's application for removal. This assignment must be sustained. In the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the matter of the application of Mary Dunn et al. to that court for a writ of mandamus against the District Judge of the United States for the Northern District of Texas and the Circuit Court of the United States for that district, commanding said judge and said court to remand a certain action at law, wherein the said Mary Dunn et al. were plaintiffs and the Texas & Pacific Railway Company was defendant, to the state court (212 U. S. 374, 29 Sup. Ct. 290, 53 L. Ed. —), it is held that, where the individual defendant joined in the application for removal, an action brought against a corporation created by an act of Congress and against an employé of such corporation to establish a joint liability for the same wrong done by both, is as to such individual defendant, as well as to the corporation, a suit arising under the federal Constitution or laws, within the meaning of the removal provisions of Act Aug. 13, 1888, c. 866, 25

Stat. 483 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 506), and is therefore removable to the federal court. There were two employés of the railway company joined with it as defendants in the case sought to be remanded to the state court by Mrs. Dunn et al., and in passing upon their application for mandamus commanding such action to be taken the Supreme Court of the United States said: "A suit against the company would, as we have seen, be one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States; and as the individual defendants resided in the state of Texas (the same state as the plaintiffs) the ground of jurisdiction of the federal court as to them must be that, by joining all as defendants in a joint action for the same wrong done by all of them, the plaintiffs thereby made the suit against the individual defendants also one which arises under the Constitution or laws of the United States."

The Supreme Court of this state, in the cases of Eastin v. Texas & Pacific Railway Company, 99 Tex. 654, 92 S. W. 838, and Texas & Pacific Railway Company v. Huber, 100 Tex. 1, 92 S. W. 832, decided prior to the Dunn Case, seems to have reached a different conclusion upon the question; but, as the Supreme Court of the United States is the court of last resort in cases of this character, we presume the Supreme Court of Texas will follow its decision.

It becomes unnecessary to consider the other assignments of error presented by the appellant.

For the error in refusing to grant appellant's application to remove the cause to the federal court, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1013*)—VERDICT—EXCESSIVENESS.

Where, in an action for injuries to cattle by rough handling and delay, there was evidence on an issue of delay and loss of market, in addition to the loss from shrinkage, etc., that would have justified a finding for more than the court allowed, a judgment will not be set aside on appeal on the theory that the evidence failed to show any damage sustained, except on account of the stale appearance of the cattle and shrinkage.

S. R. Fisher, J. H. Tallichet, S. W. Fisher, and Terry, Cavin & Mills, for appellant. McLean & Spears, for appellee.

RICE, J. This suit was brought by appellee against the appellant and the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company to recover $250 damages, alleged to have been sustained by him on account of rough handling and delay to a shipment of 30 head of cattle from Llano to Ft. Worth on the 19th of February, 1907, over said lines of railway. Upon trial before the court without a jury, judgment was rendered in favor of the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company, but against appellant for the sum of $100, together with interest and costs of suit, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The only assignment of error presented urges that the judgment of the court is excessive and not warranted by the evidence. Appellant admits, however, that the judgment would have been properly rendered against it for $76.07½, with interest. The basis of its contention is that the evidence failed to show any damage sustained by plaintiff, except 25 cents per hundredweight decline in value on account of stale appearance of cattle and 25 pounds per head as shrinkage. It must be observed, however, that plaintiff also sued to recover the difference in value of this shipment on account of the delay, whereby it failed to reach Ft. Worth in time for the market of the 20th of February. The evidence shows that this shipment, if promptly forwarded, ought to have reached Ft. Worth in time for the market of the 20th, but on account of the negligence of appellant failed to do so. While there is a conflict in the testimony as to the market price between the 20th and 21st of February, still there is evidence showing that, if this shipment had reached Ft. Worth in time to have been sold on the market of the 20th, they would have brought 25 cents per hundredweight more than they did on the market of the 21st. Taking this as true, the trial court would have been justified in rendering judgment in favor of plaintiff for more than it did, and, the court having determined this issue in favor of appellee, we are not disposed to disturb its judgment.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Affirmed.

PARLIN & ORENDORFF CO. v. GLOVER et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 7, 1909.)

1. PLEADING (§ 380*) — ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE.

In an action to recover possession of wagons, obtained by defendants from a third person, defendants alleged that they were innocent purchasers, and had no notice of any fraud as between such third person and plaintiff. Plaintiff alleged that such third person was indebted to defendants for money loaned under an agreement that he should establish a mercantile business, in which defendants were to become part owners, and plaintiff also filed a general denial of defendants' plea of innocent purchasers. Held, that evidence was admissible to show that such third person and defendants were in fact partners in such mercantile business, and the evidence was not rendered inadmissible by plaintiff's allegation as to the contemplated partnership, as it is permitted by statute to file inconsistent pleas, without having those pleas limit each other, and the evidence was also admissible under the general denial.

2. TRIAL (§ 244*) — INSTRUCTIONS — UNDUE PROMINENCE OF PARTICULAR FACT.

In an action to recover possession of wagons, obtained by defendants from a third person, an instruction that, if defendants knew, before the purchase of the stock of such third person, that he owed plaintiff for the wagons in controversy, this knowledge alone is not sufficient to put defendants on notice as to any fraud of such third person in obtaining the wagons, is objectionable, as giving undue prominence to a particular fact.

3. TRIAL (§ 194*) — INSTRUCTIONS.

Action by the Parlin & Orendorff Company against F. D. Glover and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff prosecutes a writ of error. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 99 S. W. 592.

Will G. Barber and U. F. Short, for plaintiff in error. A. B. Storey and R. E. McKie, for defendants in error.

KEY, J. This is a suit for the recovery of 19 wagons of the value of $1,140, charged by the plaintiff to have been obtained from it by one H. A. McMeans by fraud, and under such circumstances as that the purported sale from the plaintiff to McMeans did not vest in the latter right to the property, and left the superior title in the plaintiff. The plaintiff charged that the defendants had attempted to purchase the wagons from McMeans, but had acquired no title thereto. At the instance of the plaintiff a writ of sequestration was issued, and the wagons seized by the sheriff under that writ, and delivered to the plaintiff under a replevin bond executed by it. The defendants filed separate answers presenting the same defenses and tendering similar issues, including a general denial, several special exceptions, and a special plea alleging that they were innocent purchasers, because they had bought from McMeans his entire stock of merchandise, including the wagons in controversy, and had paid for the same by canceling McMeans' indebtedness to them, amounting to $7,500, and by assuming and obligating themselves to pay, to other creditors of McMeans, certain debts amounting to $2,636.10, all of which they alleged was done in good faith, and without notice that the wagons had been obtained from the plaintiff by fraud. They also filed a cross-action, seeking to recover upon the replevin bond. Plaintiff filed a supplemental petition, containing, among other matters, a general denial of the defendants' plea of innocent purchasers. There was a jury trial, which resulted in a verdict and judgment against the plaintiff upon its suit, and in favor of the defendants against the plaintiff, and the sureties upon its indemnity bond, for $1,140, which sum the judgment divides equally between the two defendants. The plaintiff has brought the case to this court by writ of error, and has presented it upon several assignments of error, the most of which will be overruled without discussion.

We sustain the ninth and tenth assignments of error, which complain of the action of the court in excluding certain testimony offered by the plaintiffs, tending to show that McMeans and the defendants were in fact partners in the mercantile business conducted in the name of McMeans. The excluded evidence was pertinent and admissible upon the issue of innocent purchaser. In their answer the defendants averred that, even if McMeans had been guilty of such fraud as would, as between him and the plaintiff, vitiate his title to the wagons, still the defendants were innocent purchasers without notice, and had therefore acquired title to the property as against the plaintiff. The excluded testimony was pertinent upon the question of notice, because if, in fact, the defendants were partners with McMeans, then his knowledge of the fraud will be imputed to the defendants, and constitute notice to them. Palmo v. Slayden, 100 Tex. 13, 92 S. W. 798; Dockery v. Faulkner (Tex. Civ. App.) 101 S. W. 501; Kneisley Lumber Co. v. Stoddard & Co., 131 Mo. App. 15, 109 S. W. 840. Counsel for defendants contend that this evidence was not admissible, because the plaintiff alleged in its petition that McMeans was engaged in the mercantile business, and was indebted to the defendants in the sum of $7,500 for borrowed money, and also alleged that the money referred to was lent to McMeans upon an agreement that he should establish a mercantile business in the town of San Marcos, and, when the same was fully established and proven to be safe, then the defendants would become part owners of it, and would share in the profits and losses. We do not hold that the testimony was admissible in support of the plaintiff's case as set out in its petition, but it was admissible upon the issue of want of notice set up in the defendants' plea of purchase in good faith, all of which was denied by the plaintiff's supplemental petition. As a matter of fact it was not alleged in the plaintiff's petition that the defendants and McMeans were not partners at the time McMeans perpetrated the alleged fraud; but, even if it had been, such allegation would not have cut off plaintiff's right to prove that they were partners, in order to break down the plea of innocent purchasers asserted by the defendants. We have a statute which permits parties to file inconsistent pleas; and, when that course is pursued, such pleas do not limit or otherwise affect each other. Duncan v. Magette, 23 Tex. 245; Bauman v. Chambers, 91 Tex. 108, 41 S. W. 471. If, in response to the plea of innocent purchasers, the plaintiff had alleged that the defendants were in partnership with McMeans at the time he perpetrated the fraud upon the plaintiff, and therefore had notice of such fraud, such plea could not have been objected to because of its inconsistency with the former plea of the plaintiff. Now the only difference is that the defendants alleged that they bought the property from McMeans without notice of the fraud, and the plaintiff in replication filed a general denial. The general denial was all that was necessary to render admissible any testimony which would tend to show that the defendants had notice of the fraud. Such being the case, the excluded testimony was admissible, regardless of the averments contained in the plaintiff's petition.

At the request of the defendants the court instructed the jury as follows: "If you find from the evidence that Crews and Glover knew, before the purchase of McMeans' stock, that McMeans owed Parlin & Orendorff Company for the wagons in controversy, you are instructed that this knowledge alone is not such knowledge as would put them upon notice or inquiry as to any fraud upon the part of McMeans in obtaining these wagons." The giving of this charge is assigned as error, the contention being that in so doing the court gave undue prominence to a particular fact, which action of the court was calculated to mislead the jury. We sustain that contention, and also hold that the charge was argumentative and upon the weight of testimony. The court had already sufficiently instructed the jury as to the rules of law by which they were to be guided in their deliberations; and to single out any particular fact and tell the jury that it was, or was not, sufficient proof upon a particular issue was not only argumentative, but was giving undue prominence to that fact, and invading the province of the jury by indicating to them the judge's opinion as to the effect to be given certain testimony. Tested by the rules of logic and reason, it may be proper to say that knowledge by the defendants of McMeans' indebtedness for the wagons, considered alone, was not sufficient to put them upon notice or inquiry as to the fraud practiced by McMeans in obtaining the property; but rules of logic and reason are not necessarily rules of law that should be given in charge to a jury. In determining the question of notice it was the duty of the jury, after hearing argument in behalf of both parties, and without any aid or suggestion from the court other than had already been given in the charge, to weigh and determine the force of all the testimony bearing on that point; and the court had no more right to single out the particular fact referred to and comment upon it than it had to single out and comment upon any other fact bearing upon that issue. G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Harriett, 80 Tex. 73, 15 S. W. 556; Mitchell v. Mitchell, 80 Tex. 101, 15 S. W. 705; Medlin v. Wilkins, 60 Tex. 409; G., H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Kutac, 76 Tex. 473, 13 S. W. 327; Pan Handle National Bank v. Emery, 78 Tex. 498, 15 S. W. 23.

Error is addressed to the action of the court in overruling a special exception to the defendants' plea of innocent purchasers, wherein it was alleged that, as a consideration for the purchase of McMeans' stock of merchandise, including the wagons here in controversy, the defendants obligated themselves to pay debts owing by McMeans in excess of the value of the wagons; the basis of the exception being that the plea did not state the names of such other creditors, nor the amounts of their respective debts. The record shows that the omission complained of can be readily supplied; and, without making a distinct ruling on the question, we suggest that the defendants amend their answer in such manner as to obviate the objection.

On all the other assignments we rule in favor of defendants in error.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

QUINN v. GLENN LUMBER CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 20, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 22, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECTS.

An employé in a sawmill was injured while adjusting a guide pin of a circular saw, by the slipping of the wrench used to tighten the pin. The wrench was worn, and loosely fitted the head of the pin, which was also worn, both of which facts he knew. He was an experienced man, and was familiar with the tightening of the guide pin. He voluntarily continued to work with the defective appliances. Held, that he assumed the risk as a matter of law, precluding a recovery.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

An employé who, with actual knowledge of the defective condition of the appliances furnished him, and with experience, capacity, and opportunity to appreciate the danger, and who without protest voluntarily remains in the service, and attempts to use the appliances, assumes the risk, and cannot recover for an injury resulting therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 574-600; Dec. Dig. § 217.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 201*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

An employé in a sawmill was injured while adjusting a guide pin of a circular saw, by the slipping of the wrench used to tighten the pin. The wrench was worn, and loosely fitted the head of the pin, which was also worn. A co-employé had put cloth in the threads of the guide pin to hold it more securely, and the employé put a severer strain on the wrench than ordinary. Held, that the act of the co-employé was not the proximate cause of the injury.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 189*)—FELLOW SERVANTS—EVIDENCE.

Mere proof that an employé was a foreman, unaccompanied by any proof that he was deputed by the employer to perform the personal and nondelegable duties of the employer, did not show that the employé was a vice principal for whose acts the employer was liable.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 180*)—FELLOW SERVANTS—STATUTES.

The statute on the subject of fellow servants, relating to employes in the service of railway companies, does not apply to the case of an injury of a sawmill employé by the act of a co-employé.

Appeal from District Court, Marion County; P. A. Turner, Judge.

Action by B. C. Quinn against the Glenn Lumber Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Appellant was an employé of the appellee, engaged in the performance of his duties in operating a circular saw in its sawmill, when he received his injuries. The saw ran between two guide pins, which held it true to its course in its revolutions, so that the lumber would be cut into boards of uniform thickness. One of the guide pins was stationary, and the other, which is the one in controversy, was adjustable, and had to be tightened as occasion required, and was regulated by the application of a monkey-wrench to the corners of the head of the guide pin. It was appellant's duty to tighten the guide pin. The monkey-wrench furnished appellant for this purpose by the appellee was of one piece, and straight, and made of flat iron, was nonadjustable, and its inner jaws, at the time of the injury, were considerably worn and stretched, and, because of such present condition, "fit the head of the pin very loose." Appellant had used this wrench frequently before, and several times during the day he was injured, and fully knew its condition and defects, and fully knew, before the time of his injury, and at the time of his injury, that it, as he says, "fit the head of the pin very loose, very loose," and fully knew the danger to his hand before the saw if the monkey-wrench should slip from the bolt. The corners of the head of the guide pin, the object upon which the monkey-wrench was used, were, as appellant says, "worn considerably," and he knew of such defect in the corners of the head of the guide pin, and it was plainly open and exposed to his view. He says, speaking of the corners of the head of the guide pin, "I had tightened and adjusted it on this day, before this particular occasion." On the late afternoon of the day appellant was injured the guide pin needed tightening, and he undertook to do it, and, in attempting to turn the monkey-wrench, it slipped off the corners of the head of the guide pin, which threw his fingers in contact with the revolving saw, whereby he was injured. The guide pin did not move. Appellant was an experienced employé at sawmills, and was familiar with the tightening of the guide pin, and fully knew the dangers attending the work before the saw. He made no complaint or protest to the use of these worn tools, but voluntarily continued in their use. Appellant's right to recover was based upon the alleged negligence of the appellee in failing to provide him, for use about the saw, a reasonably safe wrench and guide pin. Appellee answered by general denial, contributory negligence, and assumed risk. After all the evidence was heard, and it being without conflict, the trial court gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to return a verdict for the appellee.

T. W. Davidson, for appellant. W. T. Armstead, for appellee.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is contended by the appellant that the court erred in directing a verdict against him. We do not think the court erred. There is no contrariety of proof as to the fact that appellant, before and at the time of the injury, actually and fully knew that the monkey-wrench, the slipping of which off the corners of the head of the guide pin caused his injury, was defective and worn and dangerous for use. All the evidence agrees that the wrench was defective and dangerous for use before the saw, because, by reason of its inner jaws being worn and stretched and nonadjustable, it would fail to securely grip, and would easily slip from the head of the guide pin, the object on which it was used, that object also being considerably worn. Appellant testified that the wrench was nonadjustable, its jaws worn and stretched, and "fit the head of the pin very loose, very loose." He had used the wrench several times during the day. All the evidence agrees, and appellant so says, that the threads of the guide pin were worn, and that its corners were "worn considerably" with respect to its squareness, and it was open and in full view to him, and he knew of its worn condition, and, as he says, "I had tightened and adjusted it on this day, before this particular occasion." All the evidence agrees that the cause of the injury to appellant was the slipping of the worn monkey-wrench off the considerably worn corners of the head of the guide pin. Appellant says: "When I got hurt, the wrench slipped over the corners of the pin." The guide pin did not move. There is not, and cannot be, any contention in the evidence that appellant was inexperienced in the use of a wrench in adjusting guide pins of the saw, for he testifies that he was an old and experienced employé at sawmills, and had worked at sawmills the same as the one in evidence, as an edgeman and extra sawyer, for 10 or 12 years, and was familiar with the tightening of the guide pin, and had been tightening the guide pin in this case, as was his duty, from November, 1906, to August, 1907. He says: "With proper tools the work is not very dangerous." The monkey-wrench and guide pin were each simple, and not complicated mechanical contrivances, and of the kind usually employed in sawmills, and in make were safe for use in the work to be performed. Their want of safety for use rested in the evidence alone of the present worn condition of the same, and such condition was actually known to him before, and at the time of, his injury. The evidence agrees that appellant made no protest to their use, knowing their condition, but, with his knowledge of their condition, and appreciating the danger of the use of them before the saw, voluntarily continued in their use. He did not, and was not required to, hurriedly use the same. The evidence being without conflict and clear, but one finding would be reasonably warranted therefrom; and, giving such finding its proper legal effect, it must be held in the case that appellant is precluded from a recovery, on the ground that, having full and actual knowledge of the worn condition of the monkey-wrench, the slipping of which caused the injury, and the corners of the head of the guide pin, on which object the wrench was used, and full opportunity and capacity to know, as he did, of their condition, and the danger of their use before the saw in such condition, before and at the time of his injury, he voluntarily assumed the risk of injury therefrom. It is a settled rule of law, not needing citation of authorities, that if the servant, after having actual knowledge of the worn and defective condition of the appliances for his use, and experience and capacity and opportunity to know and appreciate the danger without protest, and voluntarily, remains in the service, and attempts to use the same, and is injured thereby, he assumes the risk, and cannot recover for such injury. 4 Thompson on Neg. § 4808; 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 263; Ry. Co. v. Somers, 78 Tex. 439, 14 S. W. 779; Green v. Cross, 79 Tex. 130, 15 S. W. 220; Ry. Co. v. Larkin, 98 Tex. 225, 82 S. W. 1027, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 944.

If, as shown by the evidence, Burns, a co-employé with appellant, put cloth in the threads of the guide pin to hold it more securely, and appellant, on account thereof, put a severer strain upon the monkey-wrench than he formerly used, and this strain, in connection with the defective condition of the jaws of the wrench and its hold upon the guide pin, caused the wrench to slip, he could not recover in the case. Appellant says: "As to whether I knew that he (Burns) had changed the guide pin, I didn't know to what effect. I knew he had been working on it." It was appellant's duty to fix the guide pin. It is not material in the case whether appellant knew or did not know that Burns had more securely fixed the pin by means of the cloth, as the act of Burns, in law, must in this case be held to be the act of a fellow servant, for which the appellee would not be responsible. But in this connection we think it is conclusive that the wrapping of the pin was not the immediate nor the direct and proximate cause of the injury. To hold appellee liable for the act and knowledge of Burns it should appear that he was a vice principal. This the evidence does not show, nor does it warrant the assumption that he was. The evidence in the record contains the bare proof in the statement that Burns "was filer and foreman," and, while appellant was changing the saw for another sharper, saw Burns fix the guide pin. The evidence conclusively shows that Mr. Dodd, and not Burns, was the superintending agent of the corporation, and its general manager at the mill. The bare statement in the record that Burns was a "foreman," unaccompanied by any proof that he was deputed by appellee to perform the personal and nondelegable duties of the master, would not constitute him a vice principal of the appellee for whose acts and knowledge it would, in law, be held liable. See Mfg. Co. v. Femelat, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 36, 79 S. W. 869, and authorities cited; Coal Co. v. Manning, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 322, 78 S. W. 545; Fogarty v. Ry. Co., 180 Mo. 490, 79 S. W. 664.

Appellant was not a railway employé, and so the common law, and not the statute of fellow servants, would apply. See Oil Co. v. Jonte, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 18, 80 S. W. 847.

The case was ordered affirmed.

KRAMER v. LILLEY.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 19, 1909.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 73*)—PRIVILEGE OF DEFENDANT—CHANGE OF VENUE.

Under Rev. St. 1895, art. 1585, subd. 8, allowing suits against nonresidents of the state to be brought in the county and precinct where plaintiff resides, and Acts 1907, 30th Leg. p. 249, c. 133, art. 1194b, providing that on sustaining a plea of privilege to be sued in another county the cause shall be transferred to the proper court, and article 1194c, providing that whenever such a plea is sustained the court shall order the venue changed to the proper court, and the clerk shall transmit the papers in the case to such court, and Rev. St. 1895, art. 1677, providing that, whenever the mode of proceeding in any case before a justice is not prescribed, it shall be that governing district and county courts, a suit on a contract for the payment of money, which does not specify the place of payment, brought in a justice court in a precinct in which plaintiff was not a resident, against a nonresident of the state, should have been transferred to the county and precinct in which plaintiff resided, on a plea of privilege, and Rev. St. 1895, art. 1585, subd. 4, permitting suits on a written contract promising performance at any particular place may be brought in the county in which contract was to be performed, has no application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

2. ATTACHMENT (§ 324*)—AMENDMENT OF RETURN.

Where the return on an attachment is signed by the officer as deputy constable of a certain precinct and county, and it is shown that such officer was a deputy sheriff of the county at the time, and that there was no constable in the precinct named, and that there was no city in said precinct large enough to necessitate the appointment of a deputy constable, there was no error in allowing the sheriff, whose deputy signed the return, to correct the return so as to show that the writ was executed by the officer as deputy sheriff.

Appeal from Liberty County Court; J. B. Simmon, Judge.

Action by V. L. Lilley against H. Kramer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Stevens & Pickett, for appellant.

REESE, J. This suit was instituted in the justice court of precinct 6 of Liberty county by V. L. Lilley, a resident of San Jacinto county, against H. Kramer, a nonresident of the state of Texas, to recover the sum of $104.10 alleged to be owing by defendant to plaintiff. The suit was brought upon a written contract executed by defendant and plaintiff, whereby plaintiff agreed to haul for defendant and deliver at Cleveland, in Liberty county, Tex., certain staves at an agreed price for such services, which defendant agreed to pay. Cleveland is in the precinct in which the suit was instituted. No place of payment is specified in the contract. Defendant interposed a plea of privilege, alleging that he was a nonresident of the state of Texas, that plaintiff was not a resident of the precinct in which the suit was brought, but was a resident of San Jacinto county, and that the suit should have been brought in the precinct of plaintiff's residence. With the institution of the suit plaintiff sued out a writ of attachment, which was levied upon a lot of staves the property of defendant. The plea of privilege was overruled by the justice of the peace, and judgment rendered for plaintiff. The case was taken by appeal to the county court, where the plea of privilege supported by proof was again presented and overruled, and judgment rendered for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals. No briefs are on file for appellee.

By the first assignment of error appellant complains of the action of the court in overruling the plea of privilege. The facts on which it is based seem to be undisputed, and are as stated above. There is nothing in the contract providing for payment to be made by appellant in precinct 6, Liberty county. Nothing is said as to the place of payment of the money. That the service was to be performed by appellee in Liberty county and in that justice precinct does not affect the question; there being no contract by appellant to pay there. Subdivision 4, art. 1585, Rev. St. 1895, has no application. Lindheim v. Muschamp, 72 Tex. 33, 12 S. W. 125; Mann, Mauck & Stephens v. Clapp & Brown, 1 White & W. Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 503; Barker v. Foster, 3 Willson's Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 305; Little v. Woodbridge, 1 White & W. Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 152.

We think the case comes directly within subdivision 8 of article 1585, Rev. St. 1895, which requires suits against nonresidents of the state to be brought in the county and precinct of plaintiff's residence. The plea of privilege should have been sustained, and under the provisions of articles 1194b and 1194c, c. 133, p. 249, Acts 1907, 30th Leg., the cause should have been transferred for trial to the justice court of the justice precinct of San Jacinto county in which appellee resides. Although this act does not in terms apply to justice's court, we think it does apply by virtue of article 1677, Rev. St. 1895.

The attachment sued out by appellee was executed by one T. J. Lilley, who signed his return "Deputy Constable, Precinct No. 6, Liberty County, Texas." It was shown that he was a deputy sheriff of Liberty county at the time, and that there was no constable of precinct No. 6. It was further shown that there was no city of 8,000 inhabitants in said precinct; hence no authority for the appointment of a deputy constable. Appellant made a motion to quash the levy of the attachment for want of authority in the officer to levy it. It seems clear from the evidence that the officer was acting as deputy sheriff, and that his signature to the writ as deputy constable was a mistake. We think there was no error in allowing the sheriff, whose deputy Lilley was, to correct the return so as to show that the writ was executed by him as deputy sheriff. This, we think, the sheriff could do, and it was not essential that it be done by the deputy himself. This having been done, there was no error in overruling the motion to quash the attachment. There was some indefiniteness in the evidence as to whether Lilley was, at the time of this service deputy sheriff, but there was sufficient to authorize the court to find that he was. However, appellant having pleaded in limine his personal privilege to be sued elsewhere, which plea should have been sustained without proceeding further, on that account this action of the trial court will have to be set aside, and the case be tried de novo in the justice court to which it will be transferred.

For the error presented in the first assignment of error, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the county court, with instructions to sustain the plea of privilege of appellant and to transfer the cause for trial to the justice court of the precinct of appellee's residence, as provided by articles 1194b and 1194c, Acts 30th Leg., as found in chapter 133, p. 249, Acts 1907. The writ of attachment and other process are not affected by this reversal, but the same will stand as though issued out of the justice's court of the proper precinct.

Appeal from District Court, Travis County; Chas. A. Wilcox, Judge.

Action by the State of Texas against the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This suit was instituted by the state of Texas, through her Attorney General, R. V. Davidson, the said Attorney General acting by authority and under instructions from the Railroad Commission of Texas, against the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company for penalties for failure and refusal to comply with the following special orders, to wit:

"Office of Railroad Commission of Texas. Austin, Texas, July 31, 1907. Special Order: Under the authority conferred upon it by article 4571 of the Revised Statutes of Texas, it is hereby ordered by the Railroad Commission of Texas that the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company be and it is hereby ordered and required to compile and file with this commission, on or before September 15, 1909, a full and complete statement in the manner and form prescribed below and showing the following information, to wit: The total number of all freight cars handled at Houston, Waco, — during the months of October, 1906, and June, 1906. State separately the number of cars originating at and forwarded from above-named stations; the number of cars received and destined to above stations; the number of passing cars delivered to and received from connecting lines. Separate statements shall be made for each station and for each month. Allison Mayfield, Chairman, L. J. Storey, O. B. Colquitt, Commissioners. Attest: E. R. McLean, Secretary."

"Office of Railroad Commission of Texas. Austin, Texas, August 1, 1907. Special Order: Under the authority conferred upon it by article 4571 of the Revised Statutes of Texas, it is hereby ordered by the Railroad Commission of Texas that the — Company be and it is hereby ordered and required to file with this commission on or before September 15, 1907, a full and complete statement showing the amounts paid and charged to 'Legal Expenses' for each year for a period of five years ending with June 30, 1907, in the manner and form prescribed below, to wit: (1) Salaries of general attorney, assistants, clerks and office expenses. (2) Actual traveling expenses of general attorney, assistants and clerks. (3) Other expenses of general attorney, assistants and clerks, giving details of each item of such expense. (4) Amount paid as fees to attorneys other than general attorneys and assistants. (5) Amount paid for court costs and witness fees. (6) All other expenses incidental to the trial and settlement of law suits to be given in detail. (7) Amount of expenses of general attorney assistants and other employes in attendance on legislative bodies, state and national, to be stated separately, and each item of expenses to be shown in detail. (8) Amount paid as proportion of salaries of solicitors, attorneys and their assistants of owning system and holding company charged to or paid by Texas Company. (9) Amount paid as proportion of expenses of solicitors, attorneys and their assistants of owning system and holding company, to be itemized. (10) Amount paid for any other purpose, including expense of attendance on sessions of Texas Railroad Commission, sessions of Interstate Commerce Commission, donations and contributions of all kinds; these amounts to be shown in detail. Allison Mayfield, Chairman, L. J. Storey, O. B. Colquitt, Commissioners. Attest: E. R. McLean, Secretary."

"Office of the Railroad Commission of Texas. Austin, Texas, August 27, 1907. It is ordered by the Railroad Commission of Texas that the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company shall file with the commission not later than October 1, 1907, a statement, the correctness of which shall be sworn to by the auditor of said railway company, showing the earnings of said company on the cotton hauled by it for the year beginning July 1, 1906, and ending with June 30, 1906, as follows: (1) The gross earnings received by said company for hauling cotton. (2) The gross earnings received by said company for hauling cotton which had origin and destination in Texas and credited to intrastate earnings. (3) The gross earnings received by said company on all cotton hauled by it under interstate or foreign bills of lading and credited to interstate earnings. (4) The gross earnings on all cotton hauled by said railway company originating in Texas under bills of lading which did not name an interstate or foreign destination, but did name destination at a point in Texas, and which earnings were credited to interstate traffic. Explanation: The amount of earnings on concentrated cotton to be included in gross earnings shall be that remaining after concentration charge adjustments have been made. Allison Mayfield, Chairman, L. J. Storey, O. B. Colquitt, Commissioners. Attest: E. R. McLean, Secretary."

In the petition of the plaintiff it was alleged that the said orders were duly and legally made and entered under the provisions of article 4571 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, and that notices thereof were duly and legally served on the defendant, but that the defendant failed and refused to comply with the terms and provisions of said orders, and failed and refused to furnish the information requested in said orders. The defendant, the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company, answered by a general and special exception and also by a general denial. The defendant specially excepted to the plaintiff's petition, because it was not alleged therein that the Railroad Commission ever forwarded to the defendant any blanks to be filled under the provisions of said article 4571, and because it was not alleged that the defendant ever failed or refused to fill up any blanks sent it by the Railroad Commission of Texas under the authority of said article 4571. Upon the trial of the cause, the defendant's general and special exceptions were sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, the court rendered judgment dismissing the cause of action, to which judgment the plaintiff in open court excepted and gave notice of appeal to this court.

R. V. Davidson, Atty. Gen., and Jas. D. Walthall, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

FISHER, J. (after stating the facts as above). Article 4571 of the statute (Rev. St. 1895), under which this suit was brought, provides that the Railroad Commission shall cause to be prepared suitable blanks, with questions calculated to elicit all information concerning railroads, and, as often as may be necessary, furnish said blanks to the railroad companies. Any railroad company receiving from the commission any such blanks shall cause said blanks to be properly filled out, so as to answer fully and correctly each question therein propounded, and in case they are unable to answer any question they shall give a satisfactory reason for their failure; and the said answers, duly sworn to by the proper officer of said company, shall be returned to said commission at its office in the city of Austin within 30 days from the receipt thereof. Subdivision 1 of this article also provides that if any officer or employé of the railway company shall fail or refuse to fill out and return any blanks, as above required, or refuse to answer any question therein propounded, etc., he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall on conviction be fined, each day he shall refuse to perform such duty after the expiration of the time aforesaid, a penalty of $500, and the commission shall cause the prosecution thereof in the proper court; and a penalty of like amount shall be recovered from the company, when it appears that such person acted in obedience to its direction, permission, or request in his failure, or evasion or refusal.

This statute in its character is highly penal, and must be strictly construed. Schlöss v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Co., 85 Tex. 602, 22 S. W. 1014. The appellant seeks a recovery against appellee on the ground that it failed and refused to comply with the terms and provisions of the orders above mentioned and to furnish the information as therein requested. The statute imposes a penalty when the railway company or its officers fail or refuse to answer the questions propounded in the blanks to be furnished by the Railroad Commission. It is not alleged that such blanks were furnished, and, of course, it follows that there was no refusal to fill out the blanks and answer the questions therein propounded or furnish the information therein requested. The statute requires of the commission the duty to furnish the railway companies blanks embracing questions concerning which it desires information, and only imposes a penalty when the questions propounded and the information requested on the face of the blanks are not answered and furnished. The orders passed by the commission which required the railways to furnish the desired information could not be regarded as blanks required by the article in question. The rule of strict construction applying, there was no error in the trial court's sustaining the demurrers.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. OF TEXAS et al. v. ROGERS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 7, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 228*) — TRANSPORTATION OF LIVE STOCK—NEGLIGENT DELAY—EVIDENCE.

Proof that a carrier, carrying live stock under a contract containing no reference to the time of transportation nor requiring a special train, delayed the train at a station an hour and a half, and that the delay was longer than usual or necessary, does not show injury to the stock; it not being claimed that the stock remained in the cars a longer time by reason of the delay, or that there was any intention to remove the stock from the cars to feed, water, and rest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1151*)—DETERMINATION—MODIFICATION—ENTRY OF PROPER JUDGMENT.

Where the evidence of the amount of damages to a shipment of live stock is uncertain, and the carrier appealing from the judgment states in its brief that the amount of damages cannot be ascertained to be more than a specified sum, the court on appeal will reform and render judgment for that amount on the shipper remitting the excess thereof.

Appeal from Llano County Court; A. H. Wilbern, Judge.

Action by W. J. Rogers against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and rendered in part, and conditionally affirmed in part.

See, also, 116 S. W. 624.

S. R. Fisher, J. H. Tallichet, S. W. Fisher, Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood, and Fiset & McClendon, for appellants. McLean & Spears, for appellee.

FISHER, C. J. This is a suit by appellee, Rogers, against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas, and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, to recover damages in the sum of $445, alleged to have been sustained to a shipment of two car loads of cattle from Llano to Kansas City on July 18, 1907. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment rendered in plaintiff's favor against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company for $50, with 6 per cent. interest from date of delivery of cattle and against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Companies jointly for $300.

There is no evidence whatever in the record that would justify the judgment against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company. The cattle were transported by this company from Llano, Tex., to Elgin, Tex., and there delivered to its connecting carrier, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas. It is not claimed by the appellee that there was any special contract with reference to the time of transportation of this shipment, nor that any special train was to be furnished to carry these two cars of cattle. It appears from the appellee's evidence that he understood that the cattle were to be shipped on the regular freight train that left Llano in the morning, and he knew of the run of that train, and knew that it was laid over in Austin, and knew about the time that it would reach Elgin; and it is admitted by his witness who accompanied the shipment that there was no rough handling of the cattle between those points. There was no unreasonable delay shown at Llano. It left there at the usual time in the morning, and reached Austin at the usual time in the evening, and left Austin at the usual time at night, and arrived at Elgin at the usual time, and was there delivered to its connecting line, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas. No unreasonable delay was shown in making this run. It is true, the train remained at Burnet an hour and a half, but no injury is shown from that delay. Whether it remained there longer than usual or longer than was necessary is not made to appear; but, assuming that the train did remain there a longer time than necessary, no injury is shown from this fact, because it is not claimed that the cattle remained in the cars a longer time by reason of that fact, or that there was any expectation or intention to remove the cattle from the cars and to give them feed, water, and rest before the same were delivered to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas at Elgin.

There is evidence in the record which would justify the judgment against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas for some amount, but we are not able from the facts stated in the record to determine that this amount is the sum found by the judgment of the trial court. The evidence upon this subject is uncertain, and there is a statement in appellants' brief that this amount cannot be ascertained to be more than $208.39, and in view of this statement we will say that, if the appellee will remit his judgment against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas to this sum, we will here reform and render for that amount, but otherwise the judgment will be reversed on account of the assignment that the evidence does not sustain the judgment for the amount determined in appellee's favor.

The conclusion reached by this court with reference to the Houston & Texas Central being based in the main upon the evidence of appellee and his witness, and it appearing that the testimony upon this subject is fully developed, the judgment as to that road is reversed and here rendered to the effect that as against it plaintiff take nothing, and that that appellant go hence with its costs.

The judgment as to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas, and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company will be reversed, with the privilege of the appellee within 15 days, if he so desired, to remit to the amount of $208.39, and if so done it will be affirmed at appellee's costs; otherwise the judgment as to these two roads will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 111*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—APPLIANCES—DUTY TO INSPECT.

Where it was customary for brakemen and switchmen to use the oil boxes on freight cars as a step in mounting the cars when the ground along the track is so much lower than the rail that the ladder on the car is inadequate, and the railroad company has never forbidden such use, the company is liable to a switchman for injuries resulting from the failure of the company to keep in repair an oil box which the switchman attempted to so use.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 219*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Where it was customary for brakemen and switchmen to use oil boxes on freight cars as steps in mounting cars, and the railroad company has never forbidden such use, a switchman in so using an oil box did not assume the risk of injury from its defective condition which was not obvious to him while engaged in his work.

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; Irby Dunklin, Judge.

Action by E. B. Day against the Ft. Worth & Rio Grande Railway Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Andrews, Ball & Streetman, and H. M. Chapman, for appellants. McLean & Carlock, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. The appeal is from a judgment against appellants in favor of appellee for the sum of $4,000 as damages for personal injuries suffered by him as the result, as alleged, of negligence on the part of appellants.

From the record it appears that appellee received the injuries complained of while in appellants' service as a switchman in their yards in Ft. Worth at about 10 o'clock of the morning of April 19, 1908. At the time he was injured, in the discharge of his duties as appellants' switchman, he was attempting to mount a box car moving at a speed of six or eight miles an hour. The car was a "foreign car"; that is, it did not belong to appellants. It had been in their charge only about two days. It had a ladder or steps on its side and near one of its ends. The bottom round of the ladder, called the "sill step," extended 12 or 14 inches below the sill of the car, or about 14 inches above and 12 inches towards the end of the car from the oil box of the axle of the car. The oil box referred to was about 18 inches above the top of the rail of the track. It was provided with a wooden lid. At the point where the accident occurred the ground on the side of the car where appellee attempted to mount it was about 14 inches lower than the top of the rail. In attempting to mount the car, appellee grasped the lower round of the ladder with his hands, and placed his left foot against the lid of the oil box, intending to throw his right foot onto the "sill step." Because the wooden lid of the oil box was rotten, and therefore broke or slipped in its place when appellee threw his foot against it, his foot slipped from it, causing his right foot to miss the sill step and go under and in front of the wheel of the car, which ran over and crushed it. It further appears from the record that appellee had had about nine years' experience as a switchman, and that as such he had been in appellants' employ about five years, and in their Ft. Worth yards about three months; that oil boxes like the one he put his foot against in the effort to mount the car usually, though not always, were provided with iron lids; that, while the oil box was not primarily designed or intended to be so used, it was and long had been a custom, almost universal among switchmen, to use the oil box in mounting such cars at places where the ground was lower than the track, and that, where the ground was as much as 14 inches lower than the track, brakemen could not mount such a car while moving six or eight miles an hour by means of the ladder alone. It further appeared that if appellee at the time he attempted to mount the car knew the lid of the oil box was a wooden instead of an iron one, he did not know it was unsound.

Appellants insist that the evidence established that they had discharged their duty to appellee by providing the ladder for his use in mounting the car; that they owed him no duty to inspect the lid of the oil box and have it in proper repair for the use he attempted to make of it; and that, therefore, an issue as to negligence on their part was not made by the evidence, and should not have been submitted to the jury. In the application of the rule imposing upon the master the duty to his servant "to use ordinary care and diligence to provide such sound and sufficient appliances or instrumentalities as are reasonably calculated to insure the safety of the servant in performing the service, to discover and repair any defect therein, and to provide a reasonably safe place in which to perform the service" (4 Thompson on Negligence, § 3987), it has been uniformly held that, when the master has discharged the duty, he is not liable on account of an injury suffered by the servant as a result of his using such appliances or instrumentalities for a purpose not required, nor contemplated or intended by the master. But it not infrequently happens that an appliance or instrumentality designed and intended by the master for a specific purpose alone is found to be convenient and effective for another or other purposes. There can be no doubt, if the master, discovering the new purpose to which the instrumentality advantageously could be applied, should direct its use for such purpose, the duty would at once devolve upon him to use ordinary care and diligence to discover and repair defects in it with reference to such new use. Should the rule be different if the master's servants, themselves discovering the new use to which such instrumentality could be put in discharging their duties, apply it to such use, in the absence of the master's instruction to do so, but without objection and with knowledge on his part that it would be so used? In considering the question, it will be instructive to refer to some of the cases where it has been presented and determined with more or less directness.

In Lauter v. Duckworth, 19 Ind. App. 535, 48 N. E. 867, the defendant had constructed a "dry well" of loose bricks for the purpose of receiving waste water from a factory, which entered the well through pipes at the bottom, along with a little steam. Afterward the well was used to receive waste steam, which was let into it by a pipe in the top. The pipes in the bottom becoming stopped up by sediment, the steam forced its way through them, and through the walls of the well into the surrounding earth, where it formed a hole underneath the surface filled with steam, hot water, and hot mud. While the plaintiff was passing over the spot in the discharge of his duties, the earth gave way beneath him, precipitating him three or four feet into the hole, and scalding him. With reference to a contention made by the defendant that the evidence did not show the well to have been constructed for uses made of it, resulting in the injuries to the plaintiff, the court said: "Appellant must be held to know the manner of construction, and the use to which it was put; and, if this improper use was permitted by him, it was equivalent to its construction for such use, so far as his liability might be affected for damages resulting from such use." In Dupree, Receiver, v. Tamborilla, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 603, 66 S. W. 595, the plaintiff, while in the service of Dupree as receiver of the Citizens' Electric Light & Power Company of Houston, had gone to the top of one of the company's poles to trim an electric lamp supported then by iron rods extending over the top of the pole from the arms of an iron casting fitted over the top of the pole. Plaintiff thought the rods were solid, and could not have ascertained that they were otherwise by the exercise of ordinary care in the discharge of his duties as a trimmer. As a matter of fact the rods were hollow and weakened by rust, and broke when plaintiff, in reaching a point from which to trim the lamp, rested his weight on them. As a result of the breaking of the rods plaintiff fell to the ground, and was injured. The receiver contended that the evidence showed that the rods were designed alone to support the lamp and its hood, and were never intended to be used as a means of climbing to a position necessary to be assumed by a trimmer in order to trim the lamp. The court said: "It should be borne in mind that the lamp was at a considerable and dangerous height from the ground; that the trimming of the lamp required the use of both hands. The position necessarily assumed in performing this task placed practically the entire body higher than the top of the pole and the metal casting or cross-arm thus leaving nothing by which the operator could steady or support himself save the rods supporting the lamp and hood. The consensus of the testimony shows that even the most careful and prudent and experienced trimmers, and those who knew the rods were not solid iron, placed some weight on these upright supports while adjusting the carbons, and this is true in the very nature of things. The defendant must have known from the character of the structure that the rods would be used by trimmers in reaching and maintaining their perilous position." And in another part of the opinion, referring to the rods, the court said: "It was the master's duty to construct against the use to which he might reasonably expect they would be subjected."

In Dunn v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Ry. Co., 107 Fed. 666, 46 C. C. A. 546, Dunn, in the service of the railway company as a brakeman, was injured while engaged in uncoupling cars from the front end of a locomotive. To steady himself, with one hand he grasped the round plate fastened in the middle of the front end of the boiler, known as the "figure plate," while with the other he pulled the coupling pin. The plate was loose, turned when he grasped it, and as a result he was thrown under the pilot of the locomotive, and thereby was injured. The railway company insisted it was under no obligation to inspect and keep properly secured the plate referred to. The Circuit Court of Appeals in overruling the contention, after discussing the manner in which the uncoupling was to be made and the means provided by the railway company to protect the brakeman while making it, said: "It appears, then, that the defendant set this engine to work switching, and put plaintiff to work on it at a place where defendant knew he must hold on to something. If provided no special handhold. It directed no particular projection to be used as such. It forbade no such use. It maintained on its engine a figure plate, adapted for use as a handhold, and so located that a man of plaintiff's size would find it the most convenient thing to take hold of. * * * Knowing it would be so used, if for any reason it was difficult to maintain it firmly in position or to inspect it, the defendant might have prohibited its use for that purpose. Not having done so, it owed a duty of inspection commensurate with the purpose which it must be assumed that defendant knew it was subserving."

In Coates v. Boston & Maine Ry. Co., 153 Mass. 297, 26 N. E. 864, 10 L. R. A. 769, decided by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, Coates, a brakeman, was directed by the conductor of a freight train to ride upon a coal car for the purpose of pulling out the coupling pin and separating it from other cars. He started to get on the rear of the coal car, put one hand on the top thereof, and tried to put his left foot on the jaw strap, an iron bar running below and between the ends of the axles, out of sight under the body of the car. The jaw strap was not where it should have been, and his foot went on the rail, and was crushed. The jaw strap was intended only to strengthen the car, but such cars were not provided with other means for getting upon them, and in getting upon them it was the custom of brakemen to use the jaw strap as Coates attempted to use it. There was evidence that the jaw strap had been gone for some time, and from this evidence the court said the jury might have inferred that the railway company knew of its absence. The court also thought the evidence sufficient to support a finding that the company reasonably should have anticipated that brakemen ignorant of the absence of the jaw strap might be, as Coates was, ordered to and might go upon the car to uncouple it, and that such a finding would be sufficient as a basis for the further finding that the defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to warn Coates of the fact that the jaw strap was absent. The court declined to consider as a question made by the record in that case the question made by the record in this one, saying: "We do not consider whether in view of the constant use of the jaw strap as a means of getting upon the car, and the fact that we cannot pronounce it to be a negligent use, the company might not properly be taken to have notice of it, and if it did not prohibit such use, which probably would have seemed absurd to all concerned, then be bound to see that the jaw strap was reasonably safe for this secondary use, although not that for which it was designed." In Prosser v. Montana Central Ry. Co., 17 Mont. 372, 43 Pac. 81, 30 L. R. A. 814, a road engine, instead of a switch engine, had been used in switching cars. Because the road engine had a pilot and no footboard in front to aid in the switching, a flat car had been placed in front of the engine. The flat car was provided with a brake beam and staff. Plaintiff in the discharge of his duty as a brakeman stepped upon the brake beam and grasped the brake staff. It was bent, turned with him, and he fell, and thereby was injured. It appeared that the brake beam and staff were used by brakemen for the purpose plaintiff was attempting to use same. The court said: "The brake beam and staff being used for the purpose of mounting the car by the brakemen and switchmen, we do not hesitate to say that to allow the apparatus to remain in the condition it was, was a showing of negligence sufficient to go to the jury."

In Donk Bros. Coal & Coke Co. v. Retzliff, 229 Ill. 194, 82 N. E. 214, Retzliff while in the coke company's service had been injured as the result of the latter's failure to have in proper repair bumpers on cars used in its mine which it became Retzliff's duty to couple. It was argued by the coke company that the proof showed that the bumpers were not placed on the cars for the protection of employes engaged in coupling them, but were placed there to prevent the bodies of the cars from striking against each other when the cars came together. In disposing of the contention, the court said: "It is apparent from the evidence that the bumpers were of material assistance in enabling employes to make couplings, and, whether the primary purpose of placing them on the cars was to enable couplings to be made by employes and to protect them while being made or not, they did serve that purpose, which appellant was bound to know, and it became its duty, therefore, to exercise reasonable diligence in keeping them in a reasonably safe condition for use."

On the authority of some of the cases to which we have referred and others to which we have not referred, in his excellent work on Master and Servant (volume 1, § 28), Mr. Labatt states as the qualification of the rule indicated by them: "If new functions are imposed upon an instrumentality by the master himself or his representative, and the servant is thereby exposed to undue risks, the master must answer for any injury resulting from those risks, and cannot excuse himself by showing that the instrumentality was a suitable one for the performance of the work for which it was originally supplied. The master's acquiescence in the use of an appliance for some purpose other than that for which it was intended puts him in the same position as if the appliance had been originally furnished for that purpose. Accordingly a qualification of this rule that a servant cannot recover in the absence of evidence showing that the appliance in question was constructed with reference to the use to which it was being put when the accident occurred is admitted in cases where it appears that it was customary for employes to put it to that use, and that the master knew of this custom." And see 4 Thompson on Negligence, § 4000.

Keeping in mind the qualification which seems to be established by the authorities referred to of the general rule measuring the master's duty with regard to instrumentalities furnished to the servant, and looking to the evidence in the record before us, we are not prepared to say that the evidence was not sufficient to make an issue as to negligence vel non on the part of appellants in failing to inspect the lid of the oil box and have it in proper repair for the use appellee attempted to make of it. While the lid primarily was intended for another use, the evidence overwhelmingly established that it was commonly—almost universally—used by appellants' brakemen as appellee was attempting to use it when he was injured. It is not contended, and reasonably it could not be, that appellants were ignorant of the use their switchmen had made and were making of such ladders in discharging their duties. Yet they had in no way indicated that they did not approve of the use being made of them by the switchmen. Furthermore, it appeared that the ladders provided on such cars for mounting same, while sufficient for the purpose where the ground was not lower than the track, were not sufficient for the purpose at places along its track where the ground was as much as 14 inches lower than the track. Appellants should be held to have had knowledge of the limit to the effective use which could be made of the ladders. The case, then, is one where the instrumentalities provided under all circumstances were not sufficient to enable the employé to discharge his duties; where, in accordance with a custom known to the master to exist, the employé attempted, under circumstances which the master knew might arise rendering it necessary for the employé to do so, to make use of an appliance primarily designed and intended to be used for another purpose to supplement the insufficient appliances furnished to enable him to perform his duties; and where the employé was injured in his attempt to so perform his duties, as the direct result of the master's failure to inspect and properly repair for such use the instrumentality he had, to say the least of it, before commonly permitted to be used to supplement and render effective those he had provided for the purpose. It is but fair, it seems to us, to assume that appellants permitted the use of the ladder because they thereby derived benefit, either in being relieved of the necessity of providing means in addition to the ladders of mounting such cars under such circumstances, or in having the switching done more expeditiously than it could be done in the absence of additional means, if such use should not be made of the ladder. Such permission, we think, should be construed as having the effect a direction by appellants to their switchmen to so use the ladder would have. Had such direction been given by appellants, it is clear that it would have become their duty to exercise ordinary care in discovering and repairing defects in the ladder which might render it unsafe for such use. And it is equally clear, it seems to us, that it should not be held to be an answer to a claim for damages for injuries resulting to its employé from its failure to exercise such care that the ladder was sufficient for another and primary use for which it had been designed. As we understand them, the authorities cited by appellants in support of their contention are not in conflict with those we have cited, but are only illustrative of the general rule which holds the servant to have assumed the risk of dangers ordinarily incident to his service, or obvious to his senses. In Williams v. Railway Co., 149 Fed. 104, 79 C. C. A. 146, the foreman of a switching crew had slipped and fallen from the footboard on the rear of the tender of the locomotive while it was moving. The board was slanting when it should have been level, and water from a leak had fallen and then frozen on it, rendering it slick and dangerous for use. The court held the defect to be an open and obvious one. Here the testimony tends to show that while the car was moving six or eight miles an hour the fact that the oil box lid was a wooden one and rotten was not obvious to appellee. He testified: "In mounting a car, we usually take observations to see practically how fast the car is going. In mounting a car where you are going to use the oil box, you make a casual glance as to the condition of the box before you put your foot on it. At a slight observation, I could not swear whether I could tell whether the lid was wood or iron. If it was off entirely, I might discover it, or if it was down three or four inches below flush I might discover it. If it had a crack in it, split right in two like the one now shown me, I don't think I would notice it. From practical experience we don't look at all those things. It is owing to the speed of the train whether we make casual examinations to see whether the oil box is there or not, or whether there is the lid on it or not. * * * I believe in my experience you take the entire thing in in a glance—the movement of the train, the position of the handholds—and you will throw your body and catch the oil box and the stirrup. * * * If a wooden lid was the same color as the iron lid, perhaps he would not notice that part. You first take them at a glance, the speed of the car, the handhold, and all that is taken in one glance. * * * These cars moving along, you have not got time to look at them to tell whether it is a wooden lid or not. They look after they get greasy like a black piece of iron, and just as you put your foot on it probably you glance at it and know it is a wooden lid then." In Cawood v. Lumber Co., 128 Ga. 159, 54 S. E. 944, the plaintiff, while operating a machine for sawing shingles, was injured as a result of his hand slipping while pressing against a block of wood which should have been but was not square in shape, and which for that reason failed to respond to the automatic action of the machine. He testified he knew it was dangerous to place his hand on the block as he did, and did so because it was customary with others to do so and saved time. He further testified that he could have stopped the machine, and thereby safely have unfastened and removed the block. Having chosen a dangerous when he might have chosen a safe way to do the work, it was held he was not entitled to recover; his choice of the dangerous way not being excused by the fact that others were accustomed to use it. To about the same effect are Railway Co. v. Hamlin (Ind.) 83 N. E. 343, and Hutchison v. Mfg. Co. (Ky.) 112 S. W. 900, the other cases cited by appellants.

The judgment is also attacked upon the ground, as stated in the fifth assignment of error, that the evidence conclusively showed that appellee "was guilty of negligence in using the oil box as a step and placing his foot against the lid or covering of the oil box, which negligence was the direct cause of his injuries." In a proposition under said assignment appellants insist that the evidence disclosed two ways by which appellee could have discharged the duty he owed to them: A safe one, by using the ladder alone in attempting to mount the car; and an unsafe one, in using the lid in connection with the ladder in attempting to mount it. Having chosen the latter way, they insist he was not entitled to recover. In another proposition under the same assignment appellants further insist that appellee was not entitled to a judgment because it appeared from the evidence that, in using the oil box in attempting to mount the car, he placed his foot against the face of the lid thereof, when he should have placed it on top of the box. There was evidence tending to show that, on account of the speed with which the car was moving and the low ground at the point where he attempted to mount the car, appellee could not have mounted it by means of the ladder alone, and therefore that he did not have a choice of ways to mount it in the discharge of his duty. Appellants in their brief refer to no evidence, and we have found none in the record, showing it would have been unsafe for appellee to attempt, as he did, to use the oil box in mounting the car, had the lid thereof been in proper repair for the use we think he was authorized to believe appellants had permitted to be made of it. As to appellants' contention that in using the oil box appellee should have placed his foot on top of it instead of against its lid, it is sufficient to say that the evidence was conflicting as to whether the one or the other way was safest. In fact, the evidence tends to show that the position in which he should place his foot on the box was not always a matter of choice to the switchman, as on account of the movement of the car, etc., he could not always reach with his foot the particular part of the box he might prefer to rest his foot against. There also was evidence tending to show that no one part of the box was preferable to another in using it as an aid in mounting the car. The witness Conway, for instance, testified: "I don't understand that there is any proper position to put the foot, whether on top of the oil box or against the face of the box. I think it is up to the man himself."

The judgment is affirmed.

TEXAS & P. RY. CO. v. BROOKS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 27, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 17, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 275*)—INJURIES TO LICENSEES—OPERATION OF CARS.

Where plaintiff and his fellow servant were endeavoring to move a car down an incline to be loaded, and plaintiff, on being warned by his fellow servant on the car that the brake was broken and would not stop the car, jumped in front of it, fell, and was injured, plaintiff could not recover, unless he did so to rescue his fellow servant, and not merely to stop the car.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 275.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 282*)—INJURIES TO LICENSEES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff in jumping onto a track in front of a car which he knew could not be stopped by his fellow servant riding on the car, because of a defective brake, evidence held insufficient to sustain a recovery on the theory that plaintiff's act was done in trying to rescue his fellow servant from danger.

Appeal from District Court, Van Zandt County; R. W. Simpson, Judge.

Action by E. E. Brooks against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and others. From a judgment against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company alone, it appeals. Reversed and remanded.

This was a suit by E. E. Brooks against E. F. Hopkins, the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and B. W. Carrington to recover damages for personal injuries. The pleadings alleged: That plaintiff was an employé of B. W. Carrington & Co., and his duties were to load salt out of B. W. Carrington & Co.'s wareroom into cars placed upon the spur track of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, running beside the platform at Carrington & Co.'s wareroom. That it was the custom for the employés of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company to place cars between the main line of the railway and B. W. Carrington & Co.'s plant, and that, when Carrington's employés needed a car to load, they went to where the cars were stopped, which was on slightly higher ground, and would plinch the cars down to the point where they wanted to load them. That it was the custom of the railway employés to notify Carrington's employés in the event a car was defective. On the occasion in question, the car so plaintiff and collaborator went up the track and pinched the car down, and, when it was nearing the point where it was desired to be stopped, his collaborator upon the top of the car hallooed there was no brake on the car and he could not stop it. Plaintiff ran around the car upon the platform of Carrington & Co. and jumped off in front of the moving car, fell, and was injured. That defendant Carrington is a manufacturer of salt and had an agreement with the appellant railway company to place the cars upon its switch tracks as aforesaid, and that defendant Carrington knew the customs and methods of handling the cars, and that the brakes on said cars would be applied and blocks would be used by placing same in front of the car to stop the car. That defendant Hopkins was conductor on what is known as the "dodger," which operates at Grand Saline, which is a switch engine, and that defendant Hopkins knew the methods of handling cars, and that, while acting within the scope of his authority and in the discharge of his duty to the railway company in carrying out its agreement and understanding with Carrington & Co., caused to be placed on said spur track a string of cars to be used by Carrington, acting through his employees in loading salt, and Hopkins knew that one of the cars had a bad brake, and that the same could not be handled in its broken condition by the employees of defendant Carrington, of whom plaintiff was the boss. The appellant, railway company, filed a general denial and specially denied that the track complained of was in bad repair, and that the rough condition was open and obvious to the plaintiff, and also pleading contributory negligence by jumping in front of the car when he knew it could not be stopped by the man riding thereon, and also adopting the answer of defendant Carrington as to all allegations as to details of the accident. The case was tried by jury and resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiff against the appellant, Texas & Pacific Railway Company, for $1,000. The appellant's motion for new trial having been overruled, an appeal was perfected.

Appellant's first assignment of error is as follows: "The court erred in submitting the case to the jury, because the evidence shows that the plaintiff knew the defective condition of the car, and that the car could not be stopped by the man on top thereof, the condition of the ground and track in front of the car, that it was the custom to block cars in order to stop them at the place where it was desired to load them, that plaintiff jumped off of the platform, and it was the plaintiff's motive when he jumped off of the platform in front of the car to stop it. The evidence shows he had no intention of jumping to save Alexander from injury when he jumped off of the platform in front of the car." The propdence must be clear that plaintiff saw and realized the peril of such third party, and that he (plaintiff) placed himself in a perilous position for the sole purpose of protecting said third party.

Appellee's testimony bearing on this proposition was as follows: "At the time of the accident, I had been working at that salt plant two years, lacking six weeks. In getting cars to the plant, they were placed on a spur up above the plant, and when we wanted a car we went up there with a pinch bar and uncoupled a car, and one man got on top of the car, and the other man hallooed to him and asked him if he was ready, and then he uncoupled the car and pinched it down. It was downgrade from where the cars were left to the platform. The platform was on the east side of the spur track. * * * The track runs up close to the platform. A man could not perform any work between the car and platform. On this occasion Mr. Alexander went on top of the car. He was one of the men working under me. I uncoupled the car and asked Alexander if he was ready and then pinched the car down. When the car started it must have been 50 yards from the edge of the platform. The platform was about 200 or 210 feet long. When the car started down the platform, I got on the side of the car and rode down to the edge of the platform. When I got to the platform, I jumped off on the edge of the gallery. The ladder (on the car) where I was standing was right even with the platform. * * * I jumped off on that (platform) and trotted along right even with the door of the car. The first notice I had that there was any defect in the car was when Mr. Alexander hallooed that there was 'No brake! No brake! I can't stop the car!' or something to that effect. * * * When I heard Alexander halloo that there was no brake on the car, he hallooed it once or twice and attracted my attention, and it seemed to excite me, and on the impulse of the moment I ran and jumped off to stop the car. I could not say definitely how far ahead of the car I got when I jumped off, but it must have been in the neighborhood of 20 feet. The track where I jumped off was rough. * * * When the man on top of the car hallooed he could not work the brake, I jumped off impulsively ahead of the car to stop it. The reason I tried to cross the track was to stop the car. If there had been nobody on the car, and it was just rolling down there, I would not have jumped off in front of it to try to stop it. In my judgment the car was about 20 feet behind me when I jumped off. I could not say definitely what rate of speed it was traveling, as I never had any way of judging such business; but I think it was going 6 or 7 miles an hour. * * * As best I know, when I jumped off, as to the reason for my falling when I went to make the step, I stumbled over something I could not tell what and fell. As I went to make the first step, I stumbled over something and fell. I fell between the tracks, kind of oblong down the track. I mean I fell between the rails. I did not have time to extricate myself before the car came. * * * The next thing I remember after seeing the car was right on me, was to try to make myself just as small as possible to see if the car would go over me."

On cross-examination he testified: That the condition of the track at the time of the accident was the same that it had always been. That they had blocked cars with pieces of wood prior to this. That they would have to get on the side of the track away from the platform, because there was not room between the car and platform. That there were a few pieces of wood scattered along the track to scotch with. "We had been accustomed to using them for that purpose. I started it down and then got on the car and rode down as far as the platform. There were steps at the end of the platform to ascend it. I got off of the car right on the platform and did not go on the steps. As soon as I struck the platform, I swung off of the platform and trotted along beside the car. I don't know that I had told Alexander where to stop the car. He knew where I wanted to stop it, because I had told him where I was going to load it that morning. Shortly before the car got to the place where I wanted to stop it, Alexander hallooed out, 'No brakes!' * * * When he hallooed out that the brakes would not work, of course, that just kind of excited me. I was not thinking about it, but when he hallooed that out, impulsively, the first thing was to stop the car. I had scotched cars before that, when the brakes would not work sufficiently to stop them. I had never prior to this morning jumped off of the platform in front of a car to scotch it. When Alexander hallooed out the brake would not work, I was ahead of the car. I generally ran along about even with it, or a little ahead of the door. * * * When I jumped, I checked up running; but I did not stop when I jumped. I stopped enough to balance myself to jump and then jumped. As I went to make my first step after I hit the ground, I fell. * * * I was going to step across the track to get a scotch. I saw one to get. As to whether I saw the scotch before I started to jump, I don't know, just the second I did see it. That piece of wood across the track was a trestle bench, or what is commonly known as a 'wooden horse,' was across the track from where I jumped. If I had not seen that thing over there, I cannot say whether it is a fact or not, I would not have jumped. I jumped to stop the car."

On redirect examination he testified: "I knew he could not control the car; that is, I supposed he could not, from his hallooing. At the time I jumped in front of the car, I realized the condition Mr. Alexander was in. I realized the condition and circumstances Mr. Alexander was placed in by being on top of a loose car. I tried to stop the car on the impulse of the moment. If it was not for that fact that influenced my action in jumping to stop the car, I don't know what it was. His hallooing attracted my attention that way. If it was not that, I don't know what it was that attracted me."

On recross examination, he said: "In jumping in front of the car, I acted on the impulse of the moment. If I did not realize the condition of Mr. Alexander, I don't know what gave me the impulse. His hallooing up there gave me the impulse. I cannot say my impulse was to stop that car where I wanted it. I cannot say what my idea was right then, as to whether it was the car was going by the place where I wanted it stopped and wanted to stop it there. I never took time to reason out my ideas. I did this on the impulse of the moment, and Mr. Alexander hallooing caused me to do it. * * * I knew Mr. Alexander was up there on the car without any brakes, and I have reasoned this thing out myself, and thought about it, and asked myself these questions time and again, and I have come to the conclusion that it must have been my impulse to stop the car, because Alexander was on it; but definitely at this time I can't say that because I can't remember it. I started that course of reasoning when I was laying there in bed. I do not know who I told about that course of reasoning first. * * * It is a fact that my purpose in jumping from the platform and crossing the track was to get that sawhorse and stop that car. I could not say whether it is a fact or not that right at that time Alexander's condition ever entered my mind. Since the accident I have reasoned it out, and it must have been that Alexander's situation had something to do with me jumping in front of the car."

On redirect examination he testified: "My motive when I jumped down was to stop the car. That was my purpose. I knew somewhere in the neighborhood of the speed the car was going, but, of course, I didn't reckon out the speed of the car. When I jumped in front of the car to stop it, I would not have done so if it had been a loose car. As to whether or not I jumped in front of the car, I realized that Mr. Alexander was in a position of danger. I will be frank with you and say that his hallooing there attracted my attention to stop the car, and caused me to stop the car, but whether right at that moment I stopped to reason out Mr. Alexander's condition or not, I don't remember. I don't remember right at that moment whether I did or not. If I gave Mr. Alexander a thought at all, I knew he was in danger."

W. L. Hall and J. A. Germany, for appellant. Wynne & Collins and Davidson & Davidson, for appellee.

BOOKHOUT, J. (after stating the facts as above). It seems to be conceded that if Alexander, who was riding on top of the car, was in peril by reason of the brake failing to work, and if appellee was induced to jump in front of the moving car to rescue him from such peril, he could recover. The contention of appellant is that the evidence fails to show that appellee was induced to jump on the track in front of the moving car to save Alexander from peril. Appellee testified that "if there had been nobody on the car, and it was just rolling down there, I would not have jumped off in front of it to try to stop it." He also says that when Alexander hallooed it seemed to excite him, and on the impulse of the moment he ran and jumped off to stop the car. He further testified that Alexander hallooed out impulsively. But appellee would not testify that he was induced to jump off the platform in front of the moving car to rescue Alexander from peril or from what appeared to him to be a position of peril. His testimony leaves it in doubt whether his purpose was to rescue Alexander from a position of apparent peril, or whether his purpose was to stop the car at the place where he desired to load it. He says: "Whether or not, at the time I jumped in front of the car, I realized that Mr. Alexander was in a position of danger, I will be frank with you and say that his hallooing there attracted my attention to stop the car, and caused me to stop the car; but whether right at that moment I stopped to reason out Mr. Alexander's condition or not, I don't remember. I don't remember right at that moment whether I did or not. If I gave Mr. Alexander a thought at all, I knew he was in danger." Again on cross-examination he testified: "I have never told anybody that my motive in jumping in front of that car was because I thought Alexander was in danger. I just said that my course of reasoning brought me to that conclusion; that it must have been that, and you are the first man I have told it to. This is the first time I have said that my motive in jumping off that platform was the position of danger Alexander was in." And again: "I jumped in front of the car on the impulse of the moment. It is just like I told you a while ago, I don't know right now why I jumped off."

The burden was on appellee to show that his purpose in jumping in front of the moving car was to rescue Alexander from what to him appeared a position of danger. He would not testify that he jumped in front of the moving car to rescue Alexander. He says that he jumped to stop the car, but he only concludes from his course of reasoning that his purpose in jumping was to rescue Alexander from a position of peril. If his purpose in jumping was to stop the car because it had arrived at the place where he desired to load it, then he was not entitled to recover. The testimony was as strong that he jumped because the car had reached the place for loading, as it was that his intention was to rescue Alexander. We are unwilling to sustain a verdict resting on such testimony. The judgment of the trial court against appellant is reversed, and the cause as between appellant and appellee is remanded. As tending to support these conclusions, see Seale v. Railway Co., 65 Tex. 274, 57 Am. Rep. 602; Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Doherty et al. (Tex. App.) 15 S. W. 44; Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Bigham, 90 Tex. 223, 38 S. W. 162.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 8, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 64*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—AMOUNT OF JUDGMENT—"INTEREST."

Where, in an action for $93.65 damages, plaintiff recovered judgment for that sum on appeal to the county court, with interest thereon, which made the total amount recovered $100.45, the additional amount over the sum sued for was an element of the damages recoverable, and not "interest" within Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 998, subd. 3, giving the Court of Civil Appeals appellate jurisdiction of cases of which the county court had appellate jurisdiction when the judgment shall exceed $100 exclusive of interest, etc., so that the Court of Civil Appeals would have jurisdiction of the appeal.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 143*)—DEFAULT—VACATING—EQUITABLE GROUNDS—EXCUSES—FAILURE TO REACH COURTHOUSE.

The case was set for trial April 20th, and defendant's attorneys, who resided about 76 miles away, went to the depot at their home on the 19th in time to take the train which for the past six months had been scheduled to leave at 2:50 p. m.; but the schedule had been changed on April 12th without their knowledge, and the train then left 20 minutes earlier, so that they missed it. The roads were impassable from excessive rains, and they were unsuccessful in repeated efforts to get plaintiff's attorney or the trial judge over the telephone, after missing the train, in order to secure a postponement. Judgment was entered against defendant by default before his attorneys reached the place of trial, after leaving home on the train leaving April 20th. Held that as defendant was prevented from defending, without his own fault, and had used due diligence in moving to set aside the default, the court abused its discretion in refusing to vacate the default.

Appeal from Hale County Court; George L. Mayfield, Judge.

Action by L. M. Faulkner against Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company and another. From a default judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Madden & Truelove and Ben. H. Stone, for appellants. Mathes & Williams, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. The suit was commenced in a justice court to recover the sum of $98.65 as damages appellee alleged he had suffered to a shipment of hogs, as the result of negligence on the part of appellants. From a judgment rendered by that court in appellee's favor for said sum of $98.65, against both the appellants, the latter prosecuted an appeal to the county court, and from a judgment by default rendered by the latter court in favor of appellee for a like sum and 6 per cent. interest thereon from December 30, 1907, to April 20, 1908, against both the appellants, they prosecute this appeal.

The first question to be considered is the one made by appellee in his motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that this court is without jurisdiction to hear and determine it, because, he insists, the judgment rendered by the county court on the appeal to it from the justice court was for less than $100, exclusive of interest and costs. Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 996, subd. 3. In Baker v. Smelser, 88 Tex. 28, 29 S. W. 378, 33 L. R. A. 163, in construing the provision of the Constitution conferring upon county courts "concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts when the matter in controversy shall exceed $500 and not exceed $1,000 exclusive of interest," the Supreme Court held the "interest" referred to to mean interest eo nomine given by a statute, and not to mean interest recoverable as an element of damages for a tort. In Railway Co. v. Fromme, 98 Tex. 459, 84 S. W. 1055, the plaintiff had sought a recovery of the sum of $95 and interest thereon as damages suffered by him as the result of a negligent delay on the part of the defendant to furnish cars in which to load and ship certain horses. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for the sum of $28.04, from which the defendant prosecuted an appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals, when that court certified to the Supreme Court, with others, the following question: "Does the pleading of plaintiff state an amount within the appellate jurisdiction of this court?" The question was answered as follows: "The statement which accompanies the certified questions in this case fails to show when the cause of action accrued, or the date of the trial in the county court. Hence we are unable to answer the first question categorically, but reply thereto that if, at the date of the trial in the county court, 6 per cent. per annum added to the $95, stated as damages, would have amounted to more than $100, then either party had a right to appeal from that judgment, because the amount in controversy was the full sum that the plaintiff could recover under the allegations of his petition." The ruling of the Supreme Court in the two cases referred to we think is conclusive of the question made by appellee in his motion to dismiss this appeal. While by his pleadings in the court below he sought a recovery of the sum of $98.65 only, and did not seek a recovery of interest thereon, the judgment in his favor was for interest as well, which, added to the principal sum, made a total of $100.45 for which the judgment was rendered. Treating the sum adjudged as interest as an element of damages recoverable, in a sense different from that meant by the word "interest" as used in the provisions of the Constitution and laws conferring jurisdiction on the courts of this state, the appeal is from a judgment for a sum exclusive of "interest" in excess of $100, and this court therefore has jurisdiction to hear and determine it. Railway Co. v. Hunt, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 460, 85 S. W. 1168; Railway Co. v. Everett (Tex. Civ. App.) 95 S. W. 1085; Railway Co. v. Addison, 96 Tex. 61, 70 S. W. 200.

The record on this appeal shows: That both the appellants appeared at the trial in the justice court and there urged defenses relied upon by them to defeat a recovery by plaintiff; that the pleadings setting up the defenses relied upon were noted on the justice's docket, a transcript of which was made a part of the record on the appeal to the county court; and that in said justice court the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company, in the event of a recovery by appellee against it, by its pleadings sought a recovery over against its codefendant there and coappellant here, the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company. It further appears: That the judgment in the county court was by default against both the appellants; that no disposition was made by that judgment of the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company's claim for a recovery over against its codefendant; and that on the next day after the judgment was rendered by the county court, and during the term of the court at which it was rendered, appellants presented and urged motions to set aside the judgment, on the grounds, among others, that it was by default when they had answers on file, and was rendered at a time when without fault on their part the attorneys representing them in the defense of the suit were unable to be in the court to present and urge meritorious defenses set out in the motions. The facts relied upon to excuse the failure of the attorneys representing the respective appellants to be present in the court when the case was reached for disposition are set out fully in the motions, and, briefly stated, were: That the cause was pending for trial in the county court of Hale county, sitting at Plainview; that by an agreement between all the parties concerned said cause had been set down for trial in said court on Monday, April 20, 1908; that appellants' attorneys resided in Amarillo, distant about 76 miles from Plainview; that only one train a day was operated over the only line of railroad between Amarillo and Plainview; that for five months prior to April 12, 1908, the schedule time of the departure of said train from Amarillo for Plainview had been 2:50 p. m.; that said attorneys were accustomed to said schedule, having frequently had occasion to travel on the train so scheduled to leave Amarillo; that on said April 12, 1908, the time of the departure of said train from Amarillo for Plainview was changed from 2:50 p. m. to 2:30 p. m.; that by taking passage on the train out from Amarillo on the afternoon of April 19, 1908, said attorneys could have reached Plainview before the convening of the court on April 20, 1908, and, had they not been ignorant of the fact that the time of the departure of said train from Amarillo had been changed, they would have taken passage on the same and would have been present when said cause was reached for trial on said April 20, 1908; that said attorneys, under the mistaken belief that no change had been made in the time of the departure of said train, with the intention and for the purpose of taking passage thereon to Plainview there to represent appellants in the defense of said cause when the same should be reached on said April 20, 1908, on April 19, 1908, went to the depot of said railroad in Amarillo, reaching said depot at about 2:40 p. m., in ample time to have taken said train if the time of its departure had not been changed; that on their arrival at said depot said attorneys learned that said train had already departed for Plainview and then for the first time learned that the time for its departure had been changed, as stated; that on said afternoon of April 19, 1908, it was raining at Amarillo, and for several days prior thereto it had been raining in the section of the country lying between Amarillo and Plainview; that said rains so affected the dirt roads between the two places as to render it impossible, after they learned that said train had left for Plainview, for said attorneys by traveling over them to have reached said court in time to be present when said cause was disposed of; that repeated efforts by telephone and telegraph were made by said attorneys during the afternoon of April 19th, after they learned said train had gone, and on the morning of April 20th, to explain to the attorneys at Plainview representing appellee and to the court the circumstances which had prevented appellants' said attorneys from taking passage on said train and to arrange for a postponement of action in said cause until they could reach Plainview on the train due to leave Amarillo on the afternoon of April 20th; and that said attorneys did take passage on said train due to leave Amarillo on the afternoon of April 20th, reaching Plainview at about 7 p. m. of that day, when they learned that the judgment by default had been rendered.

From the foregoing statement we think it must be apparent that without fault on their part appellants were deprived of an opportunity to present their defenses and to have the cause disposed of by a judgment on its merits. It must also be apparent that they used proper diligence in presenting their motions to have the judgment by default against them set aside. It is not apparent from anything in the record that it would have been unjust to appellee to have granted the motions. Therefore it appears that, independent of any strict legal right appellants may have had to have the judgment vacated (Sevier v. Turner [Tex. Civ. App.] 33 S. W. 294), they had shown an equitable right which should, we think, have been recognized by the court. In refusing to recognize it we think the court failed properly to exercise the discretion belonging to it as such. Springer v. Gillespie (Tex. Civ. App.) 56 S. W. 369; Dowell v. Winters, 20 Tex. 797; Sedberry v. Jones, 42 Tex. 10; 6 Enc. Plead. & Prac. p. 201.

The judgment therefore will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded for a new trial.

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 596*)—DISSOLUTION—FORFEITURE OF CHARTER.

Rev. St. 1895, tit. 21, art. 680, provides that a corporation is dissolved, first, by the expiration of the time limited in its charter; and, second, by a judgment of dissolution rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction. Article 681 provides that every corporation shall commence active operations within three years after filing its charter, and in default thereof it shall be dissolved, and its charter become void. Held, that article 681 was not self-executing, and that the failure of a corporation to commence active operation within three years did not ipso facto dissolve it.

Appeal from District Court, Travis County; Geo. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by M. H. Reed against Mrs. M. G. Sampson and others. From a judgment dismissing the case, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Cochran & Penn, for appellant. Gregory & Batts and Geo. S. Wright, for appellees.

RICE, J. Appellant brought this suit against Mrs. M. G. Sampson, a feme sole, Ernest Nalle, Joseph Nalle, and W. H. Badger for the partition of certain lands described in his petition, alleging that plaintiff and defendants were all stockholders in the West Texas Ranch & Cattle Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of this state; the right to so partition being predicated upon the ground that said corporation had failed to commence active operations within three years after filing its charter, whereby it had become dissolved. All of the defendants, except Mrs. Sampson, made default. She answered by demurrers and exceptions to appellant's petition, and the suit was dismissed on the ground that the petition failed to show a cause of action against her, or any of the defendants. The said petition specifically alleged that appellees Ernest Nalle and Joseph Nalle, with the other defendants, on the 23d of July, 1900, filed in the office of the Secretary of State a charter, under the provisions of title 21, Rev. St. 1895, of this state, for the purpose of creating a corporation to be known as the West Texas Ranch & Cattle Company, the object of which, as stated in its charter, was the raising, buying, and selling of live stock, and whose authorized capital stock was $43,100, divided into shares of $100 each. Said corporation was to continue for a period of 50 years, its principal office being in Austin, Tex. It was further alleged that all of the incorporators, together with the said Badger, were, at the time of filing said charter, the owners of all the stock of a Kentucky corporation, which had theretofore obtained a permit to do business in the state of Texas, and had acquired, and was then the owner of, the land sought to be partitioned, and that said West Texas Ranch & Cattle Company was formed for the purpose of acquiring and holding the lands so owned by said Kentucky corporation, which were taken over at an agreed valuation of $43,100, and that the incorporators of the Texas company took stock in it in the same proportion as their prior holdings in the Kentucky corporation, and that the stock in the new company was held at the time of trial as follows, to wit: Mrs. M. G. Sampson, 219 shares, Ernest Nalle, 100 shares, Joseph Nalle, 1 share, M. H. Reed, 110 shares, and that 1 share had never been issued, but belonged equally to Ernest Nalle and W. H. Badger. It was further alleged that, notwithstanding the new company was formed for the purpose of raising, buying, and selling live stock, it had not, at any time since the filing of its charter, been so engaged, but upon the contrary, had simply held its lands and rented the same out from time to time, except that it made sales of a few small parcels thereof. It was further alleged that said company was not indebted. The appellee Mrs. Sampson challenged the sufficiency of said petition generally and specially, on the ground that it did not appear therefrom that the plaintiff and defendants were tenants in common of the land, but it did appear that they were merely the owners of stock in an existing corporation, which owned lands, and were therefore not entitled to partition. The demurrers of Mrs. Sampson were sustained, and, the plaintiff having elected to stand on his petition, the case was dismissed, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. The foregoing statement is substantially taken from appellant's brief.

Appellant challenges the correctness of the judgment of the court below, first, on the ground that it erred in holding that plaintiff's petition showed no cause of action against Mrs. Sampson, or any of the other defendants; second, that said court erred in not holding that the facts set out in said petition showed that the failure of the West Texas Ranch & Cattle Company to commence active operations within three years after the filing of its charter with the Secretary of State had the effect of dissolving said corporation, and of rendering its charter void, and in not holding that, by reason of such failure to commence active operations, the property belonging to said corporation devolved upon plaintiff and its other stockholders, as tenants in common, entitling plaintiff to partition as prayed. Appellant relies upon article 681, tit. 21, Rev. St. 1895, as sustaining his contention, which reads as follows: "Every corporation created under this title or any general law of this state, shall commence active operations within three years after filing its charter with the Secretary of State, and in default thereof said corporation shall be dissolved, and its charter become void." Appellees by their first proposition insist that said provision of the statute is not self-executing, but that the corporation in question continues to exist until the expiration of the time limited in its charter, or until dissolved in a direct proceeding brought by the state for said purpose.

It is confessed by counsel for appellant that they have been unable to find any construction of this statute by our courts. Therefore the question presented is an open one in this state; but they contend that a somewhat similar provision of the Revised Statutes has been construed in the case of Bywaters v. Railway Co., 73 Tex. 624, 11 S. W. 866, and seek to apply the principle therein announced by analogy to the question here involved. In that case it was held that the following language, embraced in article 4278, Rev. St. 1879, was self-executing, to wit: "If any railway corporation organized under this title shall not, within two years after its articles of association have been filed and recorded as provided by this title, begin the construction of its road, and construct, equip and put in good running order at least ten miles of its proposed road, and if any such railroad corporation, after the first two years from the date of its organization, shall fail to construct, equip and put in good running order at least twenty additional miles of its road each and every succeeding year until the entire completion of its line, such corporation shall in either of such cases forfeit its corporate existence, and its powers shall cease as far as it relates to that portion of said road then unfinished and shall be incapable of resumption by any subsequent act of incorporation." Under this statute it was held that a failure to begin the construction of its road within two years after the filing of its articles of association worked a forfeiture, and thereby, ipso facto, determined its corporate existence, and that said failure on its part was a defense that could be urged by a stockholder to a suit brought by it for the enforcement of an unpaid balance due on his shares of stock. It will be noted that the expression "that upon the failure on the part of the corporation to do the acts therein named, that it should forfeit its corporate existence, and its powers shall cease as far as it relates to that portion of said road then unfinished, and shall be incapable of resumption, etc., by any subsequent act of incorporation," differs materially from the language used in article 681, because the words used in said article 4278, in themselves, denote a termination of the existence of said corporation for a failure to perform, while in the present statute it seems only to furnish ground for dissolution in the event of such failure. And from the language used in the said statute, as construed in Bywaters v. Railway, supra, it must have been the intention of the Legislature to make the failure on the part of the company to operate as a limitation to the period of its existence. But the language of the statute now under consideration differs from that construed in the case of Bywaters v. Railway Co., supra, in that respect, in that it only declares that, in the event of default on the part of said corporation in commencing active operations within three years from the filing of its charter, the same shall be dissolved and its charter become void. This language does not indicate to our minds that it was intended to be considered as anything more than a cause for dissolution of the corporation, and that the Legislature did not intend, on account of default on the part of said corporation, to thereby, ipso facto, dissolve the same. Article 680, Rev. St. 1895, provides that a corporation is dissolved, first, by the expiration of the time limited in its charter; and, second, by a judgment of dissolution rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction.

We are strengthened in this conclusion by the opinion of our Supreme Court in G. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. State, 81 Tex. 572, 17 S. W. 67, wherein it was held that in an act of the Legislature, which provided for the forfeiture of the charter of said railroad company in the event it should fail to build to the city of San Antonio by a certain time, said words provided a ground of forfeiture, but that the manner must be by judicial proceeding instituted directly for that purpose; and, while approving the doctrine announced in Bywaters v. Railway, supra, it held that it had no application to the case then before the court, and distinguished said cases, saying that: "We doubt if any case can be found in which the words 'shall forfeit its charter,' or 'its charter shall be forfeited,' have been construed to provide a forfeiture which is to take effect by the mere happening of a contingency. In that connection the term 'forfeit' has been imbued with a technical signification, and is the word universally used in charters for prescribing the grounds upon which a judicial forfeiture may be claimed. This is illustrated by the article of the Revised Statutes above cited (article 4278), and article 4280 in the same chapter. Article 4278 provides that upon the failure of the railways organized under that title to build certain sections of the road as therein provided, the corporation shall 'forfeit its corporate existence and its powers shall cease so far as it relates to that portion of said road then unfinished, and shall be incapable of resumption by any subsequent act of incorporation.' Article 4280 provides that any railway corporation that shall neglect to make its annual report as required by law, after being notified by the comptroller, 'shall forfeit its charter.' The change in the language clearly shows the intention of the Legislature. By the former article it intended to provide a forfeiture, without judicial action, for a failure to complete so many miles of railway within stated periods. By the latter the intention was to prescribe merely a ground of forfeiture, which the state could enforce, should it so elect, by a direct proceeding in a court of justice."

In discussing this subject Mr. Cook, in his work on Corporations (volume 2 [6th Ed.] § 688), says: "Frequently the charter of a railroad corporation requires it to complete its road, or a certain number of miles of road, within a certain time, when the charter expressly declares that for the failure to comply with this requisite the corporate powers and existence shall cease. There is a strong line of decisions to the effect that such a provision as this forfeits the charter absolutely upon noncompliance, and that no decree of the court is necessary to effect that forfeiture. But this drastic and dangerous construction of charters does not commend itself to law and justice. It adds one more to the perils which are attached to all great corporate enterprises. Even in New York, where the above doctrine seems to have had its origin, the courts are inclined to limit its application. The New York courts have held that a provision in a charter that, unless certain things are done within a certain time, the company shall forfeit the rights acquired does not work a forfeiture ipso facto, and that a provision in the charter that, unless work shall be commenced within two years, 'all rights and privileges granted hereby shall be null and void' is not self-executing, and a judgment of the court is necessary before forfeiture takes place; and the weight of authority, as well as logic and public policy, favor such a rule. It is no defense to condemnation proceedings that the railway company had not commenced work within the time fixed by statute, nor expended the capital required by statute. A statute that, after a year's suspension of business, the franchise shall be deemed surrendered, and the corporation adjudged dissolved, is not self-executory, but requires the judgment of the court." This text is supported by many authorities of American courts.

In Morawetz on Private Corporations (volume 2, § 1015) it is said: "The charter of a corporation does not expire by reason of the omission or commission of acts on the part of the company constituting sufficient ground for declaring a forfeiture, but the franchises continue in full force until the penalty of forfeiture is claimed by the state granting the franchise, and this can be done only through a proper legal proceeding, by which the cause of forfeiture is judicially ascertained. Thus it was held by the Court of Appeals of New York that the failure on the part of a railroad company to comply with the provisions of the law requiring the company to build a portion of its road in a certain time would not, of itself, put an end to its legal existence. Earle, J., in delivering the opinion, said: 'These conditions were probably not complied with. They were conditions for the noncompliance with which the sovereign power could claim a forfeiture of the company's charter, but a cause of forfeiture cannot be taken advantage of, or enforced, against a corporation collaterally or incidentally, or in any other mode than by a direct proceeding for that purpose against the corporation, and the government creating the corporation can alone institute the proceedings, and it can waive a forfeiture; and this it can do expressly, or by legislative acts recognizing the continued existence of the corporation.'" The same author further says in section 1023: "A charter of incorporation may be granted upon the express condition that the corporation formed under it shall perform some act within a prescribed time after having become incorporated; and a failure to comply with the prescribed condition may cause a cessation of the company's franchise, and subject it to a judgment of dissolution. Thus, if the charter of a corporation provides that its capital must be paid in, or that its work must be constructed, within a certain time after the time of incorporation, a failure to comply with the prescribed condition will be a sufficient ground for declaring a forfeiture." In the notes to the case of the State v. Atchison R. R. Co., 8 Am. St. Rep. 165, may be found an interesting collection of cases supporting the proposition above announced.

In the case of Utah N. & C. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 110 Fed. 879, wherein a statute of Nevada somewhat similar to the one under consideration was before the court, it is said: "It is argued by defendants that because of the failure on behalf of this corporation to do the acts therein required within the time therein specified, its right became ipso facto void, that by the terms of the statute the forfeiture clause was self-operative, and became of full force by the lapse of the time mentioned; and that no steps or proceedings on the part of the sovereign power to make it complete or effective were at all essential. There are numerous cases where, upon the particular facts thereof, it has been held that a statute, creating a corporation which declares that, unless the corporation performs certain acts within a prescribed time, its corporate existence and powers shall cease, or its powers and franchises shall terminate, executes itself. But the fact is that this question is always made dependent upon the special facts, the character of the corporation, and the legal construction to be given to the particular statute. The general rule is that the question whether a railroad corporation authorized by the state has forfeited its corporate rights and franchises cannot be raised in any collateral proceeding, and can only be taken advantage of by the sovereign power which created the corporation, because it is its privilege alone to question the right of the corporation to act under its franchise. The state may waive the conditions, or enforce them, if it sees fit to do so. When the continued life of the corporation is made by the charter or governing statute to depend upon the performance of a condition subsequent, the nonperformance of the condition is not an ipso facto forfeiture, but is a mere ground of forfeiture, of which the state can avail itself, or which it can waive at its pleasure. So that, unless the state takes advantage of the ground of forfeiture in a proceeding by quo warranto, or otherwise, to oust the corporation of its franchise, the existence of the corporation upon such a ground cannot be collaterally called in question. The Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly held, in construing various acts of Congress containing similar provisions to the act of 1875, that the failure to complete the road within the time limited is treated as a condition subsequent, not operating, ipso facto, as a revocation of the grant, but as authorizing the government itself to take advantage of it and forfeit the grant by judicial proceeding, or by an act of Congress resuming title to the lands."

In the case of Bybee v. Oregon & California R. R. Co., 139 U. S. 663, 11 Sup. Ct. 641, 35 L. Ed. 305, will be found a full discussion of the doctrine under consideration, and which supports the views here announced; and in this case the court, in discussing the New York cases which seem to hold a contrary doctrine to the view above expressed, said: "In these cases the legislative act did not avoid the grant upon the nonperformance of the condition subsequent, but declared that the corporate existence and powers of the company to act were at an end. In other words, it fixed a time for the expiration of the charter, and when that time arrived the corporation lost its power to act, or to do any business beyond such as was necessary in the process of winding up. It is not so much a cause of forfeiture as a loss of legal entity; or, as expressed in the language of the Court of Appeals in the case of Transit Co. v. City of Brooklyn, 78 N. Y. 524: 'In case of noncompliance the act itself ceases to have any operation, and all the powers, rights, and franchises thereby granted were deemed forfeited. There was to be, not merely a cause of forfeiture, which could be enforced by an action instituted by the Attorney General, but the powers, rights, and franchises were to be taken and treated as forfeited and determined. At the end of the time limited the corporation was to come to an end, as if that were the time limited in its charter for its corporate existence.' More directly in point is the case of Oakland Railroad Company v. Oakland, 45 Cal. 365, 13 Am. Rep. 181. In this case an act of the Legislature granting a corporation the right of way to lay a street railroad track provided 'that if the provisions of this act are not complied with, then the franchises and privileges herein granted shall utterly cease and be forfeited.' A breach of this condition was held, ipso facto, to forfeit the franchises of the corporation. A distinction is drawn in this case between forfeiture at common law, which did not operate to divest the title of the owner until by proper judgment, in a suit instituted for that purpose, the rights of the state had been established and a forfeiture declared by statute, in which case the title to the thing forfeited vests immediately in the state upon the happening of the event for which the forfeiture is declared. The doctrine of these cases has not been universally accepted, however, and in several states, notably Massachusetts, it has been distinctly repudiated. Thus, in Briggs v. Canal Company, 137 Mass. 71, the act of incorporation of a canal company provided that, if a certain amount were not expended in the actual construction of the canal within four months from the passage of the act, the 'corporation shall thereupon cease to exist,' and, further, that if a certain other amount were not deposited by the company with the treasurer of the commonwealth within the same time, the corporation should thereupon cease to exist. It was declared in the opinion of the court to be 'too well settled to admit of discussion that a corporation can be judicially determined to have ceased to exist only in a suit to which the commonwealth is a party. The act of incorporation is a contract between the commonwealth and the corporation. Whether the corporation has complied with the conditions is a question of fact to be judicially determined. The commonwealth may waive a strict compliance with the terms of the act, and may elect whether it will insist upon a forfeiture, if there has been a breach of condition.'"

In the case of City Council v. Railroad Co., 51 S. C. 129, 28 S. E. 145, it is held that a corporation is not ipso facto dissolved by an act of nonuse or misuse, which is a cause of forfeiture; but in such case the forfeiture of its corporate franchise must be judicially determined. In the case of New York & Long Island Bridge Co. v. Lennox, 148 N. Y. 540, 42 N. E. 1088, it is said that the question of whether a forfeiture clause in an act of incorporation is or is not self-executing depends wholly on the language employed by the Legislature, but that "it requires strong and unmistakable language to authorize the courts to hold that the Legislature intended that the forfeiture of a corporate existence should be effected without judicial proceedings on the intervention of the Attorney General." See the following cases in support of the same doctrine: Morrison v. Forman, 177 Ill. 427, 53 N. E. 73; Day v. O. & L. C. R. R. Co., 107 N. Y. 129, 13 N. E. 765; Brown v. Wyandotte & Southeastern Ry. Co., 68 Ark. 134, 56 S. W. 862.

Appellee suggests that this construction was acquiesced in by the Legislature, because by Act April 23, 1907, p. 311, c. 164, § 4, they made certain changes in articles 680 and 681, and, instead of providing two methods of dissolving a corporation, as theretofore existed, four others were added, and in lieu of article 681 it substituted subdivision 5, reading as follows: "Where a corporation created under title 21 of a general law of this state, shall fail to commence active operations within three years after filing its charter with the Secretary of State, its charter is hereby forfeited and it is hereby dissolved." By contrasting the two provisions it clearly appears that the Legislature intended to make the failure to commence active operations within three years, of itself, effect a forfeiture, and apt words were used to declare such purpose; and, since no judicial construction has been given to this article, this legislative construction is highly persuasive. In Rich v. Kyser, 54 Pa. 89, it was held that the fact that words in a statute differ from those in a prior statute on the same subject is an intimation that they are to have a different, and not the same, construction. So it would seem that the Legislature, by the change in the statute, recognized that the same was not self-executing, but by its amendment made it so, and must have deemed said amendment as necessary for the accomplishment of said purpose. We, therefore, from a review of these cases, and the doctrine established by them, conclude that the language used in article 681, Rev. St. 1895, and relied upon by appellant, was a condition subsequent, and was only a ground for the forfeiture, but was not self-executing, and did not, on account of the failure of said corporation to commence active operations within a period of three years, ipso facto, dissolve the same, but that a judicial determination of such failure must be had in order to have that effect, and therefore the demurrer was properly sustained.

Appellant in this case pleaded the act of April 23, 1907, which provided for additional grounds of forfeiture, and which used language which would seem to imply that a failure to commence business within a period of three years would, ipso facto, forfeit the charter of such corporation. With reference to this act we are inclined to believe that the same must be construed to reach future omission alone, and cannot be relied upon as a basis for forfeiture for past omissions on the part of the company.

Believing that no error has been shown in the proceedings of the court below, its judgment is affirmed.

BAUM v. DANIELS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 15, 1909.)

1. USURY (§ 146*)—"USURIOUS INTEREST"—RECOVERY—STATUTES—"UNLAWFUL INTEREST."

Rev. St. 1895, art. 3104, provides for forfeiture of all interest stipulated in written contracts, where the rate exceeds that permitted by law, and Rev. St. 1895, art. 3106, as amended by Acts 1907, p. 277, c. 143, declares that, if usurious interest shall be received or collected on any contract, the person paying the same may recover from the person receiving it double the amount of such usurious interest, in any court having jurisdiction thereof in the county of defendant's residence, or in the county where such usurious interest shall have been received or collected, etc. Held, that under Const. art. 16, § 11, as amended in 1891, declaring that all contracts for a greater rate of interest than 10 per cent. per annum shall be deemed usurious, etc., the term "usurious interest" should be construed to mean "unlawful interest," and hence was not limited to the excess over the lawful rate, but included all the interest received and collected under a contract providing for more than 10 per cent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. § 437; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

2. USURY (§ 100*)—APPLICATION OF USURIOUS PAYMENTS.

Where a contract stipulates for interest in excess of 10 per cent. per annum, all interest payments on final settlement will be applied to extinguish the principal debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

3. USURY (§ 117*)—NATURE OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to warrant a finding that plaintiff gave his note for 18 per cent. more than he actually received in money when the loan was made, the stipulation for interest at 10 per cent. being from the maturity of the notes only, and that the transaction was usurious.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

4. USURY (§ 138*)—PENALTIES—INTEREST.

Under Rev. St. 1895, art. 3106, authorizing a recovery of double the amount of usurious interest paid, plaintiff cannot recover interest on the usurious payments until after judgment rendered, when interest is authorized by article 3105, under the rule that no interest can be recovered on penalties in the absence of statutory authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Dec. Dig. § 138.*]

5. USURY (§ 142*)—ACTION FOR USURY—NATURE.

An action to recover double the amount of usurious payments of interest authorized by Rev. St. 1895, art. 3106, is a civil action; the judgment rendered being a civil recovery, and not a conviction of a crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

6. USURY (§ 102*)—USURIOUS PAYMENTS—RECOVERY.

One who pays usurious interest, in the absence of a statutory provision, may recover the excess over the legal rate, and interest on the amount so paid from the date of the payment.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1151*)—EXCESSIVE JUDGMENT—REFORMATION.

That a judgment for double usurious interest payments was excessive by the amount of interest awarded would not necessitate a reversal and remand of the cause, but the judgment would be reformed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4498-4506; Dec. Dig. § 1151.*]

Appeal from Navarro County Court; C. L. Jester, Judge.

Action by S. Daniels against I. Baum. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reformed and affirmed.

R. S. Neblett and Simkins & Simkins, for appellant. Richard Mays, for appellee.

HODGES, J. This suit was instituted by the appellee against the appellant, under the provisions of article 3106 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, to recover double the amount of interest paid on certain loans of money made at a usurious rate. The testimony shows that interest in different sums was paid on different dates during the two years next preceding the institution of the suit; that the rate of interest charged and received was 18 per cent. per annum. The loans upon which they were paid were evidenced by notes payable to appellant upon certain dates specified, and providing for interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from maturity. It is shown that the interest was always paid in advance. This was done in some instances by deducting the amount of the interest at the rate mentioned from the sum expressed in the note, and delivering to the appellee the difference. In other instances Baum, the appellant, would give a check for the entire amount, and when this was cashed by the appellee, the interest would be paid to Baum from that sum. The case was tried before a jury, resulting in a verdict in favor of the appellee for the amount sued for, together with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, computed from October 30, 1905, the date when suit was filed.

It is claimed by the appellant that the act of 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 277, c. 143), amending article 3106, radically changed its leading characteristics, and in effect practically repealed the provision allowing the recovery of double the amount of all the interest received and collected under a usurious contract. Before the amendment article 3106 read as follows: "If usurious interest as defined by the preceding articles, shall hereafter be received or collected, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives may by action of debt, instituted in any court of this state, having jurisdiction thereof, within two years after such payment, recover from the person, firm or corporation receiving the same, double the amount of the interest so received or collected." After being amended it read as follows: "If usurious interest ('as defined by the preceding articles' omitted) shall hereafter be received or collected upon any contract, either written or verbal, the person or persons paying same, or their legal representatives, may by action of debt, instituted in any court ('of this state' omitted) having jurisdiction thereof in the county of defendant's residence, or in the county where such usurious interest shall have been received, or collected, or where said contract has been entered into, or where parties paying the same reside when such contract was made, within two years after such payment, recover from the person, firm, or corporation receiving the same, double the amount of such usurious interest (in lieu of 'the interest so received and collected')." Appellant also claims that, as the law now stands, it only permits one who pays interest under a usurious contract to recover double the excess he pays above the legal rate, and not double the entire interest paid; that the words "such usurious interest," which the amended statute uses in lieu of the words "the interest so received and collected" as used before amendment, evidenced an intent on the part of the Legislature to restrict the sum that might be recovered in penal actions to double such excess. This, of course, is based upon the assumption that the words "such usurious interest," in the amended article, mean the excess over the rate which may lawfully be charged and collected. It is true that no person can have a vested right in a penalty given by statute; and repeal of the law upon which the penalty is founded, at any time before a final judgment is rendered, destroys the right of action. This is too elementary to call for citation of authorities. It also follows that any modification of the penal statute restricting the right of recovery to an amount less than that originally permitted is equally effective in diminishing to that extent the amount for which judgment can be rendered. The question here is, Do the words "such usurious interest," used in the amended act, mean all of the interest received on a contract providing for an unlawful rate, or only the excess over that which may lawfully be charged and collected? In short, what does the phrase "usurious interest" mean?

It will be observed that prior to the amendment the article referred to used the language "if usurious interest, as defined in the preceding articles," etc. This language had the effect of limiting the right to recover double the interest collected to that received on a written contract, because, under the preceding articles, no other class of contracts, which provided for a greater rate than that allowed, is declared unlawful. The omission of that clause from the amended article enlarges, rather than restricts, the meaning which may be given the words "usurious interest" as now used, and permits recourse to any authoritative source for the purpose of ascertaining the sense in which it is used. We must therefore regard the term "such usurious interest," as employed in the latter portion of that article, as also partaking of the enlarged definition thus permitted, and as being used in the usually accepted sense. When thus disengaged from the conventional restriction imposed under the old article, "usurious interest" should be held to mean "unlawful interest." The prohibition against charging a rate of interest in excess of 10 per cent. per annum is found in article 18, § 11, of the Constitution, as amended in 1891. It says: "All contracts for a greater rate of interest than ten per cent. per annum shall be deemed usurious," etc., and enjoins upon the Legislature the duty of providing appropriate pains and penalties for its enforcement. This provision of the Constitution has been held to be self-enacting. Quinlan's Estate v. Smye, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 156, 50 S. W. 1069; Roberts v. Coffin, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 127, 53 S. W. 597; Watson v. Alken, 55 Tex. 536. The last-mentioned case was decided before the Constitution was amended. The Constitution, as it existed at the time of this decision, provided that in the absence of contract the rate of interest should not exceed 8 per cent. per annum, and authorized parties by contract to agree upon a rate not to exceed 12 per cent. per annum. It then declares: "All interest charged above this last-named rate shall be deemed usurious, and the Legislature shall at its first session provide appropriate pains and penalties to prevent and punish usury." Under that provision usurious interest was the excess over what might be lawfully charged. This will account for the holding of the courts, in some of the cases cited by the appellant, in support of his contention. But under the Constitution as it now stands all contracts are usurious which provide for a rate in excess of 10 per cent. per annum. We think it necessarily follows that the contractual rate of interest is denounced as being usurious when it exceeds 10 per cent. per annum. The Constitution does not here, as it did before its amendment, undertake to separate the excess from the lawful rate, but declares the contract unlawful by reason of the fact that it calls for the payment of a rate in excess of that permitted. The vice of usury permeates the contract, and taints the entire rate of interest, even if it does not go farther. But the latter question is not here involved, and we do not intend to express an opinion on it. Under the decisions of this state, prior to the act of 1907, amending article 3106, it was held that double all of the interest received and collected, under a written contract providing for a rate in excess of 10 per cent. per annum, might be recovered in suits for the penalty. Boerner v. Traders' Nat. Bank, 90 Tex. 443, 39 S. W. 285; Smith v. Chilton, 90 Tex. 447, 39 S. W. 287. That construction of the statute had become settled, and was the accepted law at the time the act of 1907 was passed. Had the Legislature entertained a purpose to limit the right of recovery in future to double the excess only, it would certainly have used language conveying that meaning, and about the construction of which there could have been no reasonable grounds for controversy. Especially do we think this would have been the case when its accomplishment was within easy reach, by the use of simple words to that effect, after the judicial construction theretofore given the article. There was nothing in this amended article which implied a purpose, on the part of the Legislature, to relieve the condition of those who might violate the usury law. On the contrary, it removed the restrictions theretofore limiting the meaning to be given the words "usurious interest," made the penalty applicable to all contracts, whether written or verbal, which provided for a rate in excess of that permitted by law, and adjusted the venue of actions for penalties to suit the greater convenience of those who wished to bring such suits. All this indicated a fixed purpose to increase, rather than to ameliorate, the rigors of the law upon this subject. It is also significant that article 3104, which provided for a forfeiture of all interest stipulated in written contracts where the rate exceeded that permitted by law, was left in full force. It rarely happens in usurious contracts that the excess charged over 10 per cent. per annum is such that double its amount would equal the entire interest stipulated in the contract. It would charge the Legislature with a strange inconsistency, or an unaccountable oversight, to hold that it intended to limit the sum that might be recovered in a penal action to less than that which is expressly forfeited under a plea of usury. There would be no occasion to confer the right to maintain such an action unless the purpose be to add something to an existing remedy.

It has uniformly been held by our Supreme Court that, when a contract stipulates for a rate of interest in excess of 10 per cent. per annum, all interest payments will, upon a final settlement, be applied to the extinguishment of the principal of the debt. Inter Bldg. Ass'n v. Blering, 86 Tex. 476, 25 S. W. 622, 26 S. W. 39; Western Bank & T. Co. v. Ogden (Tex. Civ. App.) 93 S. W. 1102. This is permitted upon the ground that the contract for the interest is in violation of law, and cannot be enforced. In other words, the entire interest contracted for is usurious. We, therefore, hold that the rate of interest contracted and paid was usurious, and double that sum could be recovered. G. & H. Inv. Co. v. Grymes, 94 Tex. 609, 63 S. W. 860, 64 S. W. 778; People's Ass'n v. Kellar, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 616, 50 S. W. 186; Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Neb. 687, 60 N. W. 866; Watt v. First Nat. Bank, 76 Minn. 458, 79 N. W. 509; Waldner v. Bowden State Bank, 13 N. D. 604, 102 N. W. 169, 3 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 847, and notes.

Appellant insists that the contracts under which the various amounts of interest were paid were verbal, were never put in writing, and, that being shown by the evidence, there was error in rendering judgment against him for the full sum sued for. According to the testimony of appellee, Daniels, he had an arrangement with the appellant, Baum, for the latter to let him have money along as he needed it, and for which he was to pay Baum 18 per cent. per annum. When he needed money he went to Baum for it, and Baum wrote out the notes, which Daniels signed, and he would then give Daniels either the money, or a check upon some bank for it. The interest was invariably taken out by Baum in advance. Daniels always, so he says, paid Baum the interest before he got any of the money. He thus testifies: "I always paid the interest in advance out of the money I got from him; sometimes he would take it out himself. If he did not take it out, I gave him the money when I cashed the check. At the various and sundry times I went to see Baum for money, the amount of interest was not discussed between us; that had all been mentioned to start with." Baum denied having any general understanding with Daniels about the rate of interest he was to receive. He testified: "All my transactions with Daniels were in writing. When he got any money from me, I took his note calling for 10 per cent., and he paid me 8 per cent. on a verbal contract afterward. There was no contract by which he was to pay me 18 per cent. per annum." Again, he says: "Each transaction came up by itself. For instance, when the man came to me he was hard up, and wanted $200 or $300, or $500, whatever it might be. I would ask him how much he wanted, and how long, and he would tell me, and I would write out a note for the amount, bearing 10 per cent., and of course I charged 8 per cent. extra. I did that under a verbal contract or agreement." This was as near as Baum ever came to testifying as to any specific verbal contract upon which he made his usurious loans. The notes which he took from Daniels were offered in evidence, and all of them showed that they bore interest at 10 per cent. from maturity. This is in substantial contradiction of Baum's statement that the notes provided for 10 per cent., and that 8 per cent. was paid extra, and supports Daniels' statements that the interest was paid in advance. Baum admitted that his agreement with Daniels to pay him interest at the rate of 18 per cent. was made before the notes were signed or the checks written. The practical effect of the transactions between the parties was that Daniels gave his note for 18 per cent. more than he actually received in money when the loan was made, and the stipulation for interest was 10 per cent. from the maturity of the notes. This conclusion, we think, is amply supported by the testimony of Baum himself. The device resorted to was too plain and obvious to require a submission of the issue to the jury, and the court would have committed no error had he given a peremptory instruction in favor of the plaintiff in the case.

We think, however, that there was error in that portion of the court's charge where he directed the jury, should they find in favor of the appellee, to include interest upon the amount which they found, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date suit was filed, October 30, 1905. The statute giving the remedy upon which this suit was based is to an extent penal in its nature, and by its terms fixes the sum that may be recovered at double the usurious interest collected. No interest can be recovered on penalties in the absence of some statutory provision to that effect. McCreary v. Morristown Nat. Bank, 109 Tenn. 134, 70 S. W. 821; Newton First Nat. Bank v. Turner, 3 Kan. App. 352, 42 Pac. 936; Higley v. Beverly First Nat. Bank, 26 Ohio St. 75, 20 Am. Rep. 759. The rule is otherwise after the judgment is rendered. In this state all judgments bear interest from the date of rendition. Rev. St. 1895, art. 3105. This also seems to be the rule in other jurisdictions. 22 Cyc. p. 1520. Notwithstanding the fact that the penalties generally have for their purpose the infliction of some punishment upon the wrongdoer, still an action for its recovery is a civil suit, and the judgment rendered is a civil recovery, and not a conviction for a crime. In the civil action for a penalty punishment of the offender is not the sole object sought to be accomplished. Compensation to an aggrieved party may, and does frequently, form a part of the purpose of the statute. For that reason judgments rendered in such cases fall within the class of those upon which the statute allows interest.

It is true that one who pays a usurious rate of interest may, in the absence of any statutory provision, maintain a suit to recover the excess over the legal rate, and he may also recover interest on the amount so paid from the date of payment. Bexar Bldg. Ass'n v. Robinson, 78 Tex. 163, 14 S. W. 227, 9 L. R. A. 292, 22 Am. St. Rep. 36. But the statutory remedy here given includes this interest on the excess, and more; and, when the aggrieved party elects to pursue the statutory remedy, his recovery must be limited to the statutory measure. The error committed, however, can be cured by a reformation of the judgment, and will not necessitate a reversal and remand of the case. The judgment of the district court will therefore be so reformed as to award a recovery in favor of the appellee for the sum of $873.60, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date of the judgment in the trial court, and all costs incurred in the trial court. The costs of this appeal are adjudged against the appellee.

INTERNATIONAL & G. N. RY. CO. v. WILLIAMS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 8, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.
A jury finding upon conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935-3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1062*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

In an action against a carrier for damages caused by the ejection of plaintiff's wife, and for loss of time to plaintiff caused thereby, any error in submitting the issue of loss of time without proof of the value and amount thereof was cured by requiring plaintiff to remit a sum sufficient to cover that item of damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error; Dec. Dig. § 1062.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 382*)—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—CONTRACT OF CARRIAGE.

Plaintiff, after purchasing a ticket for the passage of his wife and child, went to the baggage room to check her baggage, and, because of the baggageman's delay in checking it, the train left before plaintiff could give his wife her ticket. Plaintiff's wife explained the circumstances to the conductor, and requested that she be carried as far as her money would take her, and not put off at the next station, because negroes were not permitted to stop there, but on reaching that station the conductor told her that was the place for her to get off and she remained there at the station for about four hours, when she returned on another train to the place from which she started without extra charge, the conductor of that train having been requested to return her free. She was subjected to no harsh treatment or special annoyance in being compelled to leave the train, except that resulting from having to wait at the station. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff of $350 was excessive, and should be reduced to $100.

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; Mike E. Smith, Judge.

Action by Mose Williams against the International & Great Northern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, unless plaintiff remits a part of the verdict.

Spoons, Thompson & Barwise, for appellant. Parker & Parker and McCart, Bowlin & McCart, for appellee.

HODGES, J. This action was instituted by the appellee, Mose Williams, against the appellant to recover damages claimed by him as having resulted from his wife's being ejected from one of the appellant's trains. It appears from Williams' testimony that he had carried his wife and child to the appellant's depot in Ft. Worth, and there procured tickets for them to be carried over the appellant's line to Calvert. He gave his wife the ticket for the child, and she and the child boarded the train, but he reserved her ticket for the purpose of having her baggage checked. He claims that he went promptly to the baggage room for that purpose, but, through the negligence of the baggage agent, did not procure a check for her trunk until after the train had left; that by reason of the conduct of the baggageman in negligently delaying the checking of the trunk, he did not have the opportunity to give his wife her ticket. He further testified that immediately after the train left he notified the ticket agent of the situation, and requested him to telegraph to the next station, notifying the conductor of the reason why his wife did not have her ticket; that the ticket agent agreed to do so, but negligently failed to send any such message; that if any was sent, it was too late to reach the agent at the next station, which was 10 miles distant, until after the train had passed and his wife had been ejected. The wife testified that when the conductor came through taking up tickets she told him the situation, and requested that she be carried as far on her trip as her money, amounting to $3.70, would pay for; that she also requested the conductor not to put her off at Everman, the next station, because of the fact that she understood negroes were not permitted to stop there, and that by going to the station beyond Everman she could meet friends of her own race. She claims that the conductor gave her no definite answer as to what he would do, but when they reached Everman he told her to get off, which she did, and remained in the depot at that place until 11:10, when she returned on the next train to Ft. Worth, where she was again met by her husband. It is agreed by the parties that the telegram containing the information requested by the plaintiff in this suit was sent, but was not delivered to the agent at Everman on account of a failure to get in communication with him. It was, however, delivered to the conductor at the next station beyond Everman, but after plaintiff's wife had been compelled to leave the train. The testimony as to the negligence of the baggageman in checking the trunk, and of the ticket agent as to sending the telegraphic notification to the conductor, is conflicting; but, the jury having found for the appellee, those issues were resolved in his favor. The appellee sued for $10,000 damages for the annoyance and humiliation suffered by his wife in being compelled to leave the train, and for $25 for his own loss of time. The jury returned a verdict for $350 damages. On a motion for a new trial the court required the appellee, as a condition for overruling that motion, to remit $150 of the amount recovered. This was done and the motion overruled.

Error is here assigned because the court submitted the issue of loss of time by the appellee, in the absence of any proof of the value and amount of time lost. This error, if any, we think, was cured by the remittitur required by the trial court.

It is also contended that the verdict is still excessive, even after the remittitur in the court below. We think this contention is correct. The evidence does not show that appellee's wife received any harsh treatment, or was subjected to any special annoyance or injury in being compelled to leave the train at Everman. The conductor merely told her that this was the place for her to get off. It is true she says that the child with her was sick; that she had to carry it in her arms; but she testifies to no facts showing that any situation existed which subjected her to any annoyances other than that which would naturally result from having to wait at the station. It was in the daytime, and she was only required to remain at Everman about four hours. She was carried back to Ft. Worth without any extra charge for railroad fare, the conductor of that train having been notified of her situation, and requested to permit her to return without collecting any fare. We think a judgment for $100 would be ample to compensate the appellee for all the damages sustained.

The remaining assignment of error is without merit.

The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, unless the appellee shall, within 20 days from this date, file in this court a remittitur remitting $100 of the amount adjudged in his favor upon the final disposition of the case in the trial court.

CHICAGO, R. I. & G. RY. CO. et al. v. JONES.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 25, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 22, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 664*)—RECORD—VARIANCE BETWEEN STATEMENT OF FACTS AND BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

An agreed statement of facts will control. In case of a variance between the statement of facts and the bill of exceptions.

2. CARRIERS (§ 229*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—INJURIES—DAMAGES.

The measure of damages to a shipment of horses, injured in transit by negligent delay and rough handling, is the difference between the market value of the horses at their destination, in the condition in which they would have arrived but for the carrier's negligence, and their market value in the condition in which they actually arrived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 963, 964; Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 474*) — OPINION EVIDENCE — MARKET VALUE.

Market value is largely a matter of opinion; and a witness acquainted with the market value of property at a particular place is competent to state his opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2217; Dec. Dig. § 474.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 472*) — OPINION EVIDENCE — INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

The opinion of a witness as to the market value of horses at the point of their destination if they had been transported properly, and had arrived there without unnecessary delay, is not objectionable as invading the province of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 472.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 474*) — OPINION EVIDENCE — COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

A raiser, breeder, and dealer in horses at a town, who saw a shipment of horses there, and who was acquainted with the market value there of such horses, was competent to testify as to the difference in the market value of the horses in the condition in which they arrived at the town and the condition they should have arrived had the carrier exercised proper care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2217; Dec. Dig. § 474.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 230*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action against a carrier for negligent delay in transporting horses, the court charged that negligence was doing something that a person of ordinary prudence would not have done, or the failure to do something that a person of ordinary prudence would have done, an instruction authorizing a recovery if the carrier negligently failed to transport the horses with proper dispatch, etc., was not objectionable as failing to give the jury a guide as to how long it should have taken to transport the horses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

7. CARRIERS (§ 230*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action against the initial carrier for negligent delay in transporting horses, the court charged that the measure of damages was the difference in the market value of the horses at the point of destination in the condition in which they arrived, if such condition was caused by the negligence of the carrier, and what would have been the market value of the horses had there been no negligent delay in the transportation, and that the carrier was not responsible for any injury the horses suffered after their delivery to the connecting carrier, an instruction authorizing the jury to find for the shipper such damages as he sustained, etc., was not erroneous for failing to limit the jury by any legal rule.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

8. CARRIERS (§ 230*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action against the initial carrier for negligent delay in transporting horses, resulting in the death of some of the horses, there was nothing to show that had the horses lived they would not have been transported by the connecting carrier to their destination with proper care and dispatch, and that the time required for transportation by the connecting carrier was from three to six hours, and there was nothing to show that, if the horses had been so transported by the connecting carrier, their market value would have been depreciated, an instruction authorizing a recovery on account of the horses that died, based on their market value at the point of destination in the condition they should have been in had there been no negligent delay in the transportation, was not erroneous as making the carrier pay for depreciation necessarily received while transported by the connecting carrier.

Appeal from District Court, Jack County; J. W. Patterson, Judge.

Action by C. W. Jones against the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

N. H. Lassiter, Robert Harrison, and Stark & Cox, for appellants. Sporer & McClure, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. December 5, 1906, appellee delivered to the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company, at Jacksboro, Tex., for transportation over its line of road, and over the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company's line of road to Pueblo, Colo., 29 head of horses, consigned to J. H. Jones at La Junta, Colo., a station on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway. The horses should have reached their destination within three or four days from the time they were received by the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company at Jacksboro. On account of its negligence and the negligence of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company the horses did not reach Pueblo until December 14th, where one of them died, and the others did not reach La Junta until December 15th. As a result of the negligence of said Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company and said Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company in delaying the carriage of the horses, and in roughly handling while transporting them, one of the horses died en route, and the others were injured, and appellee thereby was damaged in the sums found by the jury, and adjudged in appellee's favor by the court below.

The action of the court in admitting as evidence certain testimony of the witness Jones is made the basis of appellants' first assignment of error. There is a discrepancy between the question propounded to the witness and the grounds of the objection to it as stated in the statement of facts, and the question and grounds of objection to it as stated in the bill of exceptions. In appellants' brief the ruling is presented as it is shown by the latter. But the statement of facts is an agreed one, and we should allow it to control in disposing of the assignment. Bryan Press Co. v. H. & T. C. Ry. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 110 S. W. 100. With reference to the value of the horses at La Junta, according to the statement of facts, the question was: "What was the market value of these horses at that time if they had been transported properly, and had arrived there without any unnecessary delay?" The grounds of appellants' objection to the question were that "it calls for the opinion of the witness, is hearsay, is not the proper measure of damages, and invades the province of the jury." The answer of the witness was: "I think they were worth $100 per head, if they had arrived there in proper condition." From other testimony given by the witness it appeared that he had been engaged all his life in breeding, growing, and handling horses; that he had shipped horses from Jacksboro to La Junta; that he was acquainted with the horses in question, and their condition at the time they were shipped from Jacksboro; that they were then in good condition; and that he was acquainted with the value of such horses in La Junta. We do not think the court erred in refusing to exclude as evidence the answer of the witness. The measure of appellee's damages was the difference between the market value of the horses at La Junta in the condition in which they would have arrived there but for appellants' negligence and their market value in the condition in which, by reason of such negligence, they did arrive there. G. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Stanley, 89 Tex. 42, 33 S. W. 110. The fact that they were not to be transported by appellants all the way to their destination did not change the measure of appellee's damages as stated. E. T., V. & G. Ry. Co. v. Johnston, 75 Ala. 596, 51 Am. Rep. 494. Market value is largely a matter of opinion, and it was not error to permit the witness to state his opinion as to the market value of the horses at La Junta had they arrived there in proper condition; it appearing that he was acquainted with the market value at that place of such horses. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Donovan, 86 Tex. 378, 25 S. W. 10. The answer did not "invade the province of the jury." It merely stated the opinion of the witness as to the market value of the horses at La Junta, if they had arrived there in "proper condition." Whether they did arrive there in that condition or not was left, so far as the answer of the witness was concerned, without suggestion one way or the other, to the jury.

Appellee asked his witness McGowen the following question: "Do you know what was the difference in the market value of the said horses in the condition they arrived and the condition they should have arrived?" Over appellants' objection the witness was permitted to answer: "If these horses were shipped in good condition, and the shape I saw them in when they arrived here, the difference in their market value would have been at least $50." By their second assignment of error appellants complain of the refusal of the court to exclude as evidence the answer of the witness. The grounds urged in the motion to strike out the answer of the witness were that it "is hearsay, and province of the jury. The witness testified that he was a "raiser, breeder, and dealer in horses" at La Junta, that he saw the horses in question on the morning after they had been unloaded at La Junta, and that he was acquainted with the market value there of such horses. Without determining whether or not the answer, had it been objected to on other grounds, should have been excluded, we hold the court did not err in refusing to strike it out on the grounds stated in the motion.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "If you find and believe that the plaintiff shipped the horses in controversy over the lines of the defendant and connecting carriers from Jacksboro, Tex., to La Junta, Colo., and if you believe from the evidence that the defendants, their agents, or employes, by reason of negligence, failed to transport the horses with proper dispatch, and if you believe that by reason of the negligence of the defendants, their agents, or employes the horses were on the cars longer, on the way to La Junta, than they should have been, and if you believe, by reason of the horses being longer in the cars on the way than they should have been, and that thereby the horses were damaged as charged in the plaintiff's petition, without fault or negligence on the part of the agent of the plaintiff, who went with said horses, you will find for plaintiff such damages as you find plaintiff sustained. And on the measure of damages you are charged that, if the horses were damaged, as charged, by the negligence of the defendants in transporting the horses from Jacksboro, Tex., to Pueblo, Colo., where they were delivered to the connecting carrier, and if by reason of such negligence on the part of the defendants some of the horses died, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, on account of the horses that died, what would have been the market value of such horses at La Junta in the condition they should have been in had there been no negligent delay in transporting the horses from Jacksboro to Pueblo." Appellants insist that the instructions were erroneous because (1) the jury thereby were told to find a verdict against appellant "if the horses were negligently kept on the cars longer than they should have been, leaving the jury without any guide as to how long the horses should have been on the car"; (2) the jury thereby were told "to give the plaintiff such damages as they find the plaintiff sustained, and they are not limited in their inquiry or decision by any legal rule or direction"; and (3) the court thereby, in instructing the jury as to the measure of appellee's damages on account of the horse which died at Pueblo, assumed that said horse "would not have been in any wise injured or depreciated in value by the shipment over the Santa Fé from from Pueblo to La Junta. As to the objection first mentioned, it should be said that in other portions of his charge the court instructed the jury that "negligence" was "doing something that a person of ordinary prudence would not have done under the same or similar circumstances, or the failure to do something that a person of ordinary prudence would have done under the same or similar circumstances." This definition, we think, furnished a guide for the jury in determining from the circumstances as shown by the testimony how long the horses should have been kept on the car. As to the second objection, fairly construed, we think the instruction meant, and the jury must have understood it to mean, that they would find for appellee only such damages as they might find he had sustained by reason alone of appellants' negligence in delaying the transportation of, and roughly handling, the horses. In another portion of the court's main charge the jury were instructed, as to the horses which reached La Junta alive, that if they were injured as the result of appellants' negligence, the measure of his damages would be the "difference in their market value at La Junta at the time they arrived there and in the condition they were then in (if such condition was caused by the negligence of the defendant) and what would have been the market value of said horses at said place at the time they should have reached La Junta in the condition they should and would have been in on reaching said La Junta had there been no negligent delay in transporting the horses from Jacksboro to Pueblo." And in still another portion of the charge the jury were instructed that appellant would not be responsible for any injury the horses might have suffered after they were delivered to the connecting carrier at Pueblo, and that they should not consider any such injury in determining the amount of damages they might find in appellee's favor. Construing the portion of the charge objected to in connection with the other portions thereof to which we have referred, we do not think it could have operated to mislead the jury in the respect urged. As to the third and last objection specified above, it may be remarked that there is nothing in the record tending to show that had the horse lived he would not have been transported by the connecting carrier from Pueblo to La Junta with proper care and dispatch. Nor is there anything in the record tending to show that, if he had been so transported, his market value thereby would have been depreciated. We do not think it should be assumed that the horse, had he lived and had he been transported with proper care and dispatch from Jacksboro to Pueblo, "necessarily" would have been so injured by being transported from Pueblo to La Junta as to depreciate his market value. The record shows that the time required to make the trip from Pueblo to La Junta was from three to six hours. In the absence of evidence to the contrary we think it would not be improper for the court and jury to assume that the market value of a horse in proper condition to make the trip would not be depreciated if he should make it, and if while making it he should be handled with due care.

It appeared from the evidence that, while appellee as the owner thereof contracted for and delivered the horses to the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company for transportation, he in fact did not own several of the number. Appellants requested the court to instruct the jury that he was not entitled to recover damages on account of injuries suffered by the horses he did not own. The refusal of the court to so instruct the jury is complained of in appellants' fifth assignment of error. It has been repeatedly held that the shipper is entitled to recover for injuries to the property covered by his contract with the carrier, for which the latter is liable, notwithstanding the shipper did not own the property. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 84 Tex. 348, 19 S. W. 509; Ry. Co. v. Klepper (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 568; Ry. Co. v. Barnett (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 783; Parks v. Ry. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 708.

We have considered the remaining assignments of error presented in appellants' brief, and think they should be overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEVY, J. The appellant sued the appellees in trespass to try title, and from a judgment rendered against it has brought the case up by appeal.

The appellees have filed a suggestion that this court is without jurisdiction to hear and determine this appeal, for the reason that no appeal bond was filed by appellant in

This court has therefore no jurisdiction of the case, and it must be dismissed. Free-stone County v. Bragg, 28 Tex. 91; Uvalde County v. City of Uvalde (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 327.

SANTA FE TOWNSITE CO. v. NORVELL.
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 24, 1909. On Rehearing, April 28, 1909.)

1. JURY (§ 14*)—ACTIONS FOR INJUNCTION—JURY TRIAL.

In a suit for a mandatory injunction to compel obedience to a decree that defendant open a public highway across its property, it was not error to grant plaintiff a jury trial on the ground that the power to grant or refuse such relief is in the court alone, for the facts upon which the right to such injunction depended, if disputed, created an issue which it was the right of either party to have determined by a jury as in other cases of disputed facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 130*)—VERDICT—CERTAINTY.

A verdict in a suit for a mandatory injunction to compel obedience to a decree that defendant open a public highway of the first class across its property, that defendant had failed to construct a highway of the first class, and as described in the decree, while it might have gone into detail and specified each particular in which defendant had failed, should be construed as a finding that there had been a failure in all particulars, and, as so construed, is sufficient.

3. INJUNCTION (§ 189*)—DECREE—FORM.

A decree in a suit for mandatory injunction to compel obedience to a decree that defendant open a public highway across its property, granting such relief, should incorporate the provision of the latter decree directing the highway to be opened in a direct line as nearly as practicable without removing houses or encountering other immovable obstacles.

4. INJUNCTION (§ 5*)—GROUNDS OF RELIEF—ENFORCEMENT OF DECREE.

Though a decree that a party open a public highway across its property made no provision for the contingency of noncompliance, the court is not powerless to extend relief and a mandatory order will lie.

Appeal from District Court, Hardin County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Suit by W. J. Norvell against the Santa Fe Townsite Company. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Decree amended, and, as amended, affirmed.

Dies, Singleton & Dies, for appellant. Jno. L. Little, for appellee.

JAMES, C. J. The petition of Norvell alleged a decree of the district court of Hardin its property, beginning at a certain point, thence in a direct line as nearly as practicable without encountering houses or other immovable obstacles to crossing of a certain public road and the Santa Fé Railroad immediately west of the depot at the station of Silsbee; said highway to be clear of obstruction for vehicles and pedestrians, with necessary bridges or crossings over any intervening water courses, ditches, etc., and to be done immediately. Petitioner alleged that defendant had wholly failed and refused to comply with said decree, and he prayed for a mandatory injunction to compel obedience to the same. Defendant pleaded that it had complied with the decree.

The issue made at the trial was submitted to the jury in this manner: That, if the jury found from the evidence that defendant had substantially complied with the terms of the decree, they were to find for defendant. But, if they found that it had not complied with said decree, to find in favor of the plaintiff and to say: "We, the jury, find that the defendant, the Santa Fé Townsite Company, has not complied with the terms of the decree of September 26, 1906, in the following particulars, to wit [setting out in full the particular or particulars wherein you find the defendant has failed to comply with said decree of September 26, 1906]; and therefore we find for plaintiff." They returned this verdict: "We, the jury, find that the defendant, Santa Fé Townsite Company, has failed to comply with the terms of the decree of September 26, 1906, in the following particulars, to wit: The defendant Santa Fé Townsite Company has failed to comply with their contract to construct a road of the first class and as described in the decree of September 26, 1906, across the defendant's land. Therefore we find for plaintiff." Upon this the court entered judgment commanding defendant within 30 days to open a public highway 60 feet in width across its property between the points stated in the original decree, and as the same is described therein.

The first assignment of error is that the court erred in granting plaintiff a jury trial, because the relief asked was a mandatory injunction, and the power to grant or refuse such relief is in the court alone. We overrule this assignment as manifestly without merit. The original decree was an agreed one which simply determined the obligation of defendant to open immediately the highway over its property. The matter in controversy here was not the violation of an injunction involving contempt, but the determination of the right to a mandatory injunction to enforce performance of the duty imposed by said decree. The facts upon which the right to such injunction depended, such as the failure vel non to perform the terms cases or disputed facts.

We here set forth the other assignments of error: "Second assignment of error: The verdict of the jury in this case was not responsive to the charge of the court. The court charged the jury that in case they found that the defendant had not complied with the judgment of September 26, 1906, in reference to opening the road, that they should then find and set out in full the particular or particulars in which the defendant had failed to comply with said decree of September 26, 1906. The jury in its verdict found that the defendant had not complied with the terms of said decree, but failed to specify in what particular or particulars it so failed."

Third assignment of error: "The verdict of the jury was not sufficiently definite or certain to authorize or warrant the judgment entered in this cause, nor to warrant or authorize any judgment or decree in said cause."

Fourth assignment of error: "The court erred in its judgment wherein the defendant was ordered to open a road diagonally across its property and different from the road already opened, because the verdict of the jury fails to specify whether defendant had failed to comply with the 1906 judgment in matter of location or manner of opening road."

Fifth assignment of error: "The court erred in rendering judgment as was done in this case, because it was contended by defendant, and there was testimony to support such contention, that defendant had opened a road located so as to comply with judgment of September 26, 1906, and it was contended by plaintiff, with testimony to support such contention, that the road so opened was not the required width, etc. It was also contended by plaintiff, with testimony to support the contention, that the road so opened by defendant was not located so as to comply with said decree. And it cannot be determined from the verdict rendered what the jury found as to these issues; nor what kind of judgment would comport with such verdict."

Under all these assignments appellant presents this proposition: "A verdict is bad if it finds only a part of that which is in issue, or if it is so indefinite or uncertain as to require speculation on the part of the court to determine its true and full meaning." The principle embodied in the proposition is not fairly applicable to the verdict in this case. True, the verdict might, in response to this charge, have gone more into detail, and specified each and every particular in which defendant had failed, but the verdict, as we construe it, and as the trial judge evidently construed it, is a finding that there had been failure in all particulars. From the briefs of both parties we understand that a road of terms of the decree of September 20, 1900, and also whether or not the road so opened by defendant was 60 feet wide and clear of obstructions," etc. The question, then, was whether that road complied with the terms of the decree, and we take it that the verdict should be considered and construed as having reference to the road that had been opened, or attempted to be opened, when it states that defendant had not complied with the terms of the decree. The finding was practically that such road was not a road of the first class, and that it was not as the road was described in the decree. Appellant in his fifth assignment of error admits that the evidence was broad enough to cover such a finding. The assignment states "that it was contended by plaintiff with testimony to support the contention, that the road so opened by defendant was not located so as to comply with said decree." And "that it was contended by plaintiff, with testimony to support such contention, that the road so opened was not the required width," etc.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Rehearing.

We find that there is no difference in the course of the straight line in passing through appellant's property, as defined in the original decree and in the recent decree. We find, however, that the present decree differs from the original one, in that the latter commanded the street to be opened in a direct line "as nearly as practicable without removing houses or encountering other immovable obstacles," and the decree now omits this limitation. Such direct line would pass through blocks 29, 27, 23, and 20 of appellant's property. It was admitted by appellant at the trial that there were no houses on blocks 29, 27, and 23; but there was evidence that there were houses on lots 1 and 2 in block 20 through which lots such direct line would pass. Altogether we take it that it could not have been assumed as an uncontroverted fact (if the court proceeded upon that theory) that there were no houses or other immovable obstacles in the path of such straight line. Consequently we think the qualification should have been incorporated in the recent decree, and the decree will be reformed in this respect. We do this also for the reason that plaintiff did not seek to change the terms of the decree. The enforcement, and not a reformation of the decree, was the purpose of this suit. It appears to us that the judgment (as we amend it) is the correct one upon the evidence.

The map showing the direct route and also the route which was opened shows that the latter did not attempt to conform to any upon lots in the straight route except upon lots 1 and 2, in block 20, and these lots were situated about where the line would terminate near the railroad crossing and really presented no obstruction; and the route otherwise was not impracticable. Under these circumstances, it is clear that what had been done was not a substantial performance, but a bold evasion, of the decree, and plaintiff was entitled to relief.

As the original decree was entered, appellant assumed, and was charged with, the duty to open the street across its property in the particular manner. The decree made no provision for the contingency of noncompliance. It was expected that it would be complied with; it being an agreed decree. The courts are not powerless to extend relief in such cases. We know of no other form of relief available in such a case than that of a mandatory order.

Decree reformed, and motion overruled.

Appeal from Hardin County Court; H. N. Vickers, Judge.

Suit by T. J. Womble and another against W. F. Harsey and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

John L. Little, for appellants. B. L. Aycock, for appellees.

FLY, J. T. J. Womble and wife, L. M. Womble, sued W. F. Harsey in the county court of Hardin county, alleging as follows: "That heretofore, to wit, on the 21st day of May, 1906, defendant herein recovered a judgment over against plaintiff T. J. Womble

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

William Davis survey, in a certain suit styled W. F. Harsey v. T. J. Womble, No. 199 on the docket of the county court of Hardin county, Tex., which decree was entered of record in the minutes of said court in volume 1, pages 175 and 176, and to which reference is hereby made for further and more particular description."

Plaintiffs allege that said decree was wrongfully entered, and is void for this:

"(1) That in said suit No. 199, above mentioned, that said plaintiff T. J. Womble, who was defendant in said suit No. 199, was never served with citation or otherwise therein, and was never required to answer therein and never accepted service therein, and never at any time before said judgment, nor after the same until recently, had any notice of said judgment; and he was not legally before the court, and said court was without jurisdiction to try said cause, and said judgment rendered in said cause No. 199 is therefore void and inoperative.

"(2) It appears from said petition and judgment in said cause No. 199 that said suit was brought for the purpose of foreclosing a lien on land described in plaintiff's cause No. 199, and this court was without jurisdiction to try said cause or enforce said lien, as was therein recovered, since the district court alone has jurisdiction exclusively to enforce liens upon land, and any judgment rendered in said proceedings is not within the jurisdiction of the county court, and therefore void and inoperative."

This was followed by an allegation that a writ of execution had been issued under the judgment and personal property belonging to the wife had been levied on and advertised for sale, and certain damages were set up for the seizure of the property.

The prayer was as follows:

"That this court issue a writ of injunction to be forthwith issued upon such terms as may be prescribed by the court, commanding and restraining to said W. F. Harsey and the sheriff, W. W. McConnico, and all others acting by, through, or under them or either of them, directly or indirectly, from making said sale of the merchandise herein set out and advertised, and upon final hearing said injunction be made permanent.

"(2) That the judgment heretofore mentioned in cause No. 199 be set aside and vacated, and held for naught.

"(3) That the merchandise hereinbefore mentioned be decreed the property of plaintiff L. M. Womble.

"(4) That the said plaintiffs have judgment in the manner set out for the damages to said goods, loss of profits, and the injury to tion of the court, and claimed to have purchased the goods at a sale made after this suit was instituted under an execution issued out of the district court, and filed a motion to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the suit on the following grounds: "Comes defendant Harsey by attorney, and moves to dissolve the temporary injunction herein, because it appears that since the injunction was granted the subject-matter of the suit no longer belongs in any event to plaintiff L. M. Womble, for which the writ was granted, and for her exclusive benefit; because this court has no jurisdiction of the amount claimed as damages, which is all that possibly remains in controversy; because there is no other party to the suit; because there is no equity in the bill, the petition stating no cause of action, and the said judgment in cause No. 199 is not set out in its legal effect nor in hæc verba; because the answer of this defendant denies fully the supposed equities of the bill; because there appears to be another suit pending in the district court of Hardin county between the same parties and involving the same issues, and both courts cannot have jurisdiction. Wherefore defendant prays that the injunction be dissolved, and that defendant have his judgment for statutory damages and costs against plaintiffs and their sureties on the injunction bond. And that the petition be dismissed." That motion was sustained, and from that order this appeal was perfected.

If it be true that the judgment under which the execution was issued was obtained without service, and was obtained in a suit brought in the county court to foreclose a mortgage on land, the judgment was void and should have been enjoined, whether Mrs. Womble had any place in the suit as a party or not. The judgment had been obtained in the same court in which the injunction was sought, and the county court had the authority to issue the injunction no matter how small the amount of damages sought to be recovered. Dean v. State, 88 Tex. 290, 30 S. W. 1047, 31 S. W. 185. The power of the county court to restrain an execution issued by it is not questioned by appellees.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

2. PLEADING (§ 403*)—DEFECTS—CURE BY SUBSEQUENT PLEADING.

The trustee in bankruptcy of the maker of a note sued the payee for $700 paid by the maker while insolvent within four months of the adjudication in bankruptcy. The payee alleged the execution of the note by the maker, and a third person as surety, and prayed that the third person be made a party, and that, if judgment was rendered against the payee, he should have judgment over against the third person for the amount recovered by the trustee. The third person answered, and alleged that the payee compromised the matter with the trustee by paying $500, and agreeing to pay all costs, and that it would be inequitable for the payee to recover of the third person any sum paid to adjust the matter. Held, that the defect in the payee's pleading, so far as it sought recovery from the third person, was cured by the third person's answer, authorizing the court to render judgment in favor of the payee against the third person for the amount paid in the settlement of the case, together with the costs.

Appeal from Nacogdoches County Court; C. D. Mims, Judge.

Action by Edgar W. Hooker, trustee of J. Wright, against E. A. Blount, in which Dan Wright and others appeared as parties defendant on the application of defendant E. A. Blount. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant Blount, and in favor of defendant Blount against the codefendants, the latter appeal. Affirmed.

Ingraham, Middlebrook & Hodges, for appellants. H. B. Short and S. W. Blount, for appellee.

PLEASANTS, C. J. At a former day of this term we affirmed the judgment of the court below without a written opinion. Appellants have filed a motion requesting that we prepare and file a written statement of our conclusions of fact and law upon the questions presented by the record. While the statute does not require the Courts of Civil Appeals to render written opinions in affirmed cases which cannot be taken to the Supreme Court by writ of error, in deference to request of counsel we will briefly state the nature of the case and the reasons which controlled us in concluding that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. Tucker & Co. v. Freigberg & Kahn (Tex. Civ. App.) 101 S. W. 837.

The suit was brought by Edgar W. Hooker, trustee of the bankrupt estate of J. Wright, to recover from E. A. Blount the amount paid him by said Wright on a note held by Blount, which was executed by the said Wright as principal, and upon which appellants were sureties or indorsers. The ground upon which recovery was sought was that the payment to Blount was made by Wright after he became insolvent and within four months of the date upon which he was adjudged a bankrupt, and that Blount received such payment with knowledge of Wright's insolvency. Blount answered, denying any knowledge of the insolvency of Wright at the time of said payment, and alleging the execution of the note by Wright and the appellants herein, and prayed that they be made parties, and, in event of judgment against him, that he have judgment over against the appellants for the amount recovered by plaintiff.

The appellants answered in the court below by general exception and general denial and various special exceptions and pleas; one of said pleas being as follows: "And now come the said defendants, and say that they have been informed and believe that since the institution of this case the plaintiff in this case and the defendant E. A. Blount have settled, adjusted, and compromised this matter—that is, the matters involved in this suit—by the said E. A. Blount paying the sum of $500 and agreeing to pay all costs, and so charges the facts to be upon their information and belief, and they further say it would be unjust and inequitable for the defendant Blount to recover of them at all, and anyhow he ought not to because he only asks to recover in the event plaintiff recovers against him, and the plaintiff now has no cause of action against the said Blount, or to recover of them any other sum than that which he has paid to adjust said matter and these facts they are ready to verify."

The evidence is undisputed, and establishes the following facts: Wright was insolvent at the time he paid the note held by Blount, and was adjudged a bankrupt within less than four months thereafter. The agent of Blount to whom the money was paid knew of Wright's insolvency at the time the payment was made, but Blount had no personal knowledge thereof. The amount paid Blount by Wright in satisfaction of the note was $700. After this suit was brought, Blount compromised with the appellee Hooker by paying him $500 in full settlement of his claim for $700, and agreeing to pay the costs of suit. After this compromise was made, there was no amended pleading filed by Blount, and the case went to trial upon the pleading before set out. Upon this state of the pleadings and evidence the trial judge instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of Hooker against Blount for his costs, and in favor of Blount against the appellants for $500 and interest at 10 per cent. from date of the payment of said amount by Blount to Hooker, and for all costs of suit. A verdict was returned as directed and judgment rendered accordingly.

It is very earnestly insisted by counsel for appellants that the verdict and judgment cannot be upheld because they are not supported by the pleadings. We do not think this contention is sound. It is true that the appellee Blount only asked to recover of appellants the amount which appellee Hooker might recover against him, and it may be that, notwithstanding he pleads the facts fully as to the execution of the note and the liability of the appellants to him thereon for whatever portion of the money paid him by Wright he would be required to return to the trustee in bankruptcy, he would not under his pleadings be entitled to recover against appellants any sum not expressly adjudged to Hooker in this suit. But we think the plea of appellants before set out, in which the facts of the compromise are fully stated and judgment is asked to be rendered against them, in event they are held liable at all, only for the $500 paid by Blount in compromising the claim of Hooker supplies the deficiency in Blount's pleadings. The undisputed evidence shows that Blount was liable to Hooker for the full amount of the $700 paid him by Wright, and, having paid $500 in settlement of said amount, appellants, who were bound to him for the whole amount due on said note, are clearly liable for the $500 so paid by him. The answer of appellee Blount contains a prayer for general relief, and the facts pleaded by him and by the appellants, and shown by the undisputed evidence establish his right to the relief granted by the judgment.

It is further contended by appellants that the knowledge of Blount's agent of the insolvency of Wright at the time the note was paid, having been acquired prior to his agency, and not while he was acting in such capacity, cannot be imputed to his principal. It is true that the agent first learned of Wright's insolvency before he received the note for collection, but the evidence leaves no doubt of the fact that at the time Miss received the money from Wright he knew of the insolvency. If he knew the agent existed at the time he acted for his principal, it is immaterial that he had no knowledge prior to the beginning of the agency. Fire Association v. Compress Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 109 S. W. 1184; Hooker v. Blount, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 162, 97 S. W. 1083.

None of the assignments are meritorious. In our opinion no other judgment than the one rendered could have been properly rendered upon the evidence, which was undisputed, and therefore any error of procedure which may have occurred on the trial became immaterial, and the judgment of the court below was therefore affirmed.

This action of the court is made the basis of appellant's first assignment of error.

The only question necessary for us to decide in disposing of this appeal is whether the action of the court in instructing a verdict for defendant was proper under the circumstances stated. A decision of this question necessarily involves the inquiry whether the tender of performance by plaintiff in his pleadings without the payment of the agreed purchase price into court was sufficient to entitle the case to go to the jury. Whatever may be the rule in other jurisdictions, it seems to be settled by decisions of the courts of this state that, in cases to enforce specific performance of contracts to not caused by a risk assumed by him nor by inevitable accident, but was caused by the negligence and wrongful conduct of the defendant; and that, as a result of his death, the plaintiffs sustained pecuniary injury to the extent awarded by the verdict. There was testimony before the jury sufficient to support the findings referred to, and they are here adopted by this court, and the first and second assignments of error, which assail the verdict of the jury and complain of the refusal of a requested instruction directing a verdict for the defendant, are therefore overruled.

On the subject of imminent danger and discovered peril, the court instructed the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that after the defendant's fireman on said engine first saw deceased upon the track in front of said car that he discovered deceased would probably not get off the track before the car reached him, and was in imminent peril of being struck by said car, a sufficient length of time before he was struck to have signaled the engineer to stop the engine, and that said engineer (after receiving such signal, had it been given) could then have, by the use of the means at his command, stopped said engine and car after said fireman had discovered that deceased was in such peril, if you so find, before said injuries which caused the death of deceased were inflicted upon him, then you will find for the plaintiffs (although you may believe that the deceased was guilty of negligence himself in not discovering the approach of said car, or getting off said track, as charged above, or ~~the~~ ^{his} guilt of negligence in any of the re-

There are other assignments of error addressed to the charge of the court, and to the refusal of requested instructions, all of which are overruled. The court's charge was reasonably full and fair, and many instructions requested by appellant were given, and, when considered together, we hold that appellant has no ground of complaint in the particulars pointed out in its brief.

This disposes of all the questions presented for decision, and, finding no reversible error, we conclude that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Wm. P. Hamblen, Judge.

Action by W. B. Fordtran against Miss A. A. Dunovant and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Masterson, Atkinson & Masterson, for appellant. Hogg, Gill & Jones and Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood, for appellees.

McMEANS, J. This suit was instituted by appellant, W. B. Fordtran, against the appellees, Miss A. A. Dunovant and R. S. Autrey, to enforce specific performance of a contract to convey two lots of land in the city of Houston.

Appellant in his amended petition alleged, in substance, that Miss Dunovant, being the owner of the property in question, on October 23, 1905, entered into a contract in writing with him by which she agreed and obligated herself to sell the same to him, with the understanding that she was to accept from him vendor's lien notes for $17,000, the price agreed on, and for which notes appellant agreed to give her $17,000 in cash without discount, said sum to be paid on or before November 1, 1905, at the Houston National Bank upon the delivery of a deed conveying said property, and that said contract did not expire until the 2d day of November, 1905, and that the sale of said property was to be closed and consummated by that date. He further pleaded that on the 1st day of November, 1905, he requested Miss Dunovant to execute and deliver to him a deed conveying said property to him, and tendered and offered to pay her in cash the consideration agreed upon, but that Miss Dunovant wholly failed and refused to deliver said deed or to receive and accept the money tendered, but that a few days later, on November 9, 1905, she sold the property to appellee Autrey, who purchased the same with full knowledge of appellant's contract and his rights thereunder. The petition contains this further allegation: "Plaintiff further makes known to the court that he still makes good his tender of $17,000 in cash, and here and now tenders the same to defendants, or to the one of them which may be entitled to receive the same, in discharge of the obligation imposed upon him by said agreement, and in payment of said property, and that he has always been ready to make said payment; but, should the court be of the opinion that this plaintiff should pay interest thereon, he, in that event, tenders interest on said sum, and at such a rate as the court in its judgment and discretion may adjudge that he ought to pay." Miss Dunovant answered by general denial, and specially pleaded that, if the alleged agreement of October 23, 1905, was made, it had by consent of both parties been set aside and canceled, and that a new and different agreement had been made by them in lieu thereof; that, if any such contract as that alleged by plaintiff was ever made, it was not supported by a valid consideration; and that although not recognizing the right of plaintiff to a conveyance of said property under the contract of October 23, 1905, she nevertheless on November 9, 1907, and again on November 13, 1907, and since the filing of the suit, tendered to the plaintiff a deed to and immediate possession of the property, and agreed to pay the court costs in this suit, she having for this procured a deed back to her from her codefendant R. L. Autrey and his wife, but that plaintiff on each occasion refused to accept such deed and pay said money; that she not only tendered said deed, but on each occasion offered to sign any proper deed that plaintiff might prepare. And she pleaded such tender and her demand for payment in bar of plaintiff's right to recover. Defendant Autrey pleaded that he had purchased the property from Miss Dunovant after he had ascertained that plaintiff had no claim thereto, and he adopted her answer in so far as it set up the cancellation of the contract of October 23, 1905. The pleadings of all the parties were at great length, but it is believed that the substance of the same as above set out will be sufficient to an understanding of the points upon which this opinion is based. A jury was impaneled to pass upon the issues of fact. The plaintiff offered testimony tending to prove his cause of action, and the defendants offered evidence tending to establish the grounds of their defense. When the introduction of evidence was concluded, the trial judge in open court called upon plaintiff and his counsel to pay or tender into court the purchase money referred to in his pleadings, or to give the court some assurance that he could pay it, else, he declared, he would not submit the case to the jury. After a conference between plaintiff and his counsel, the latter announced in open court that, owing to the peculiar financial situation in Houston, plaintiff could not comply with the judge's demand, and that he could give no assurance of the money being forthcoming, whereupon the judge instructed the jury to return a verdict for defendants, which the jury did. This action of the court is made the basis of appellant's first assignment of error.

The only question necessary for us to decide in disposing of this appeal is whether the action of the court in instructing a verdict for defendant was proper under the circumstances stated. A decision of this question necessarily involves the inquiry whether the tender of performance by plaintiff in his pleadings without the payment of the agreed purchase price into court was sufficient to entitle the case to go to the jury. Whatever may be the rule in other jurisdictions, it seems to be settled by decisions of the courts of this state that, in cases to enforce specific performance of contracts to convey lands, no actual tender of the agreed consideration need be made, and no tender other than an offer in the pleadings is necessary to entitle the case to go to the jury on the facts. The plaintiff having pleaded tender of the purchase money, and having offered evidence tending to prove a previous tender and offer to perform the contract according to its terms, it became the duty of the court to submit the case to the jury; and, upon a finding by the jury of the facts favorable to the plaintiff, the court should have granted him the relief prayed for, provided that within a reasonable time, to be fixed in the decree, he shall make payment of the amount due, and, failing in this, his right would cease. Kalklosh v. Haney (Tex. Civ. App.) 23 S. W. 421; Spann v. Stern, 18 Tex. 556; Ward v. Worsham, 78 Tex. 180, 14 S. W. 453; Gardner v. Randell, 70 Tex. 457, 7 S. W. 781; Moore v. Brown (Tex. Civ. App.) 103 S. W. 244. It follows, therefore, that the court erred in refusing to submit the case to the jury under the circumstances, and instructing a verdict for the defendants. And it would seem a harsh exercise of the court's discretion in case of the determination by the jury of the facts favorable to a recovery by plaintiff to require an immediate payment of the purchase money, but the court should fix a reasonable time, in view of existing conditions, within which the plaintiff is required to comply with the decree.

For the error indicated, the judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded.

The owners of certain real estate at the instance of their broker executed a writing reciting that they had that day sold to B. for a specified cash consideration certain described land which they obligated themselves to convey to B. on his paying the purchase money less the sum receipted for, defendants further agreeing to furnish an abstract of title, and, if the title was not good in B.'s opinion, to return the earnest money, but, if the title in his opinion was good and the property was not taken within 10 days after delivery of the abstract, the earnest money should be forfeited to defendants and their broker equally as liquidated damages. Held, that such agreement was a contract of sale, and not a mere option.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Norman G. Kittrell, Judge.

Action by William W. Thomas against Hamburger & Dreyling. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. Lockett, for appellants. S. H. Bra-shear, for appellee.

NEILL, J. This suit was brought by ap-pellee against appellants to recover the sum of $1,500 claimed to be due him by ap-pellants under the contract set out in our conclusions of fact for effecting a sale of the tract of land mentioned therein to Jas. A. Baker, Jr., upon terms, though different in some respects from those embodied in the contract, which were accepted by the ap-pellants, as shown by the written agreement ex-ecuted by them and Baker on December 8, 1905, which agreement is also incorporated in our conclusions. The defendants answered by general and special exceptions to plain-tiff's petition and a general denial, and pleaded specially that, in addition to a clear record title to the premises, their title there-to was perfect under the several statutes of limitation; that, if their title was in any way defective, plaintiff knew of such defect, undertook to make the sale under his con-tract with them with full knowledge of such defect, and took the risk of a sale being de-feated by reason thereof; and that, if the plaintiff ever complied with his contract in finding and procuring a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy, he afterwards, with-out defendants' consent, released such pur-chaser from his contract, etc. Defendants' exceptions to plaintiff's petition were over-ruled, and the case was tried before a jury to whom special issues were submitted, and upon the verdict returned judgment was en-tered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount sued for, principle, and interest.

Conclusions of Fact.

The contract between plaintiff and defend-ants is as follows: "Houston, Texas. Sept. 5th, 1905. Wm. W. Thomas, Houston, Texas. You are hereby appointed sole agent to sell the following described property, to wit: The (now occupied by George Raphael) for the sum of twelve thousand (\$12,000.00) ⁰⁰/₁₀₀ dollars, on terms as follows: For all cash or any other terms desired by purchasers, if same are satisfactory to us. The time for which this exclusive agency shall run is four months from date hereof, expiring January 5th, 1906. It is agreed that should said Wm. W. Thomas sell the above-described property within the time given, he shall receive what-ever sum in excess of \$12,000.00 he may sell property for out of the first payment made by purchaser. An abstract of title up to date of sale and clear title to purchaser to be furnished by the undersigned. Taxes paid to December 31, 1905, inclusive. No plat to be placed of record until expiration of this agreement. $\frac{1}{4}$ cash balance 1, 2 & 3 years 6% interest or [erased before signing]. Ham-burger & Dreyling. Accepted: Wm. W. Thomas."

This is the contract of sale effected by Thomas to James A. Baker, Jr.: "Houston, Texas, December 13, 1905. Received of James A. Baker, Jr., through the hands of W. W. Thomas the sum of one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars as part payment of the purchase money for the following described property situated on the south side of Buf-falo Bayou, in the city of Houston, Harris county, Texas, to wit: The westerly one-half of ten-acre lot 37 of the Jas. S. Holman sur-vey (less that part heretofore sold by us to Raiford, now occupied by George Raphael, and comprising about two lots), together with all improvements thereon, which property we have this day sold to said Baker, his heirs and assigns for the full sum of thirteen thou-sand five hundred ($13,500.00) dollars cash. Upon payment of the purchase money, $13,500.00, less the amount herein receipted for, we agree to convey or cause to be conveyed to the said Baker by good and sufficient warranty deed the above described property. We hereby agree to furnish within ten days from this date a complete abstract of the above described property certified to date. If the title to said property is not good in the opinion of the said Baker, then the $1,000.00 herein receipted for shall be returned to him, but if the title to said property in his opinion is good and said property is not taken within ten days from delivery of complete abstract of title of the property to him, then the $1,000.00 herein receipted for shall be forfeited to W. W. Thomas and our-selves equally as liquidated damages, and this receipt shall then be null and void, and all parties herein named released. In the event the title to said property is approved by said Baker, we agree to convey the same to him upon payment of the purchase money by deed containing covenants of general warranty. The said Baker shall also have the right at his election to waive any defects that may be found in the title to the property and accept a deed from us for the same, upon payment by him of the purchase money. Witness our hands in duplicate the day and year first above written. [Signed] L. A. Hamburger. Gus Dreyling. Jas. A. Baker, Jr."

The execution of these written instruments is undisputed.

The findings of the jury upon the special issues submitted to it are as follows: (1) The defendants did not furnish Baker with evidence of such possession of the property as would give title by limitation; (2) that the plaintiff procured the execution by James A. Baker of the contract dated December 13, 1905; (3) that defendants L. A. Hamburger and Gus Dreyling agreed to and signed said contract of December 13, 1905; (4) that Baker examined the title on the abstracts furnished by Hamburger & Dreyling, and, upon such examination, found the title thereto was not good in his opinion; (5) that Hamburger & Dreyling never produced any evidence to Baker showing the title to be good in his opinion; (6) that at the time the title was examined by Baker such title, by reason of such failure to show a good judgment, was not such a one as that it would have been approved in the opinion of lawyers generally; (7) that at the time and after Baker examined said title he was able, willing, and ready to pay the agreed price and take the land, if the title had been good in his opinion; (8) that at the time and after Baker examined said title he was able, willing, and ready to pay the agreed price and take the land if the title had been such that it would have been approved in the opinion of lawyers generally; (9) that Hamburger & Dreyling did not furnish or offer to furnish Baker any evidence that John Fitzgerald was a resident or citizen of Texas at the time the judgment was rendered against him in favor of Lee Pennington; and (10) that Hamburger & Dreyling did not offer to furnish Baker any evidence of title except that contained in the abstracts which had been offered in evidence.

In explanation of the two last special findings of the jury, we will say that the abstract of title furnished by the plaintiffs to Baker showed a complete chain of title from the sovereignty of the soil down to themselves; i. e., if the link, which consisted of a deed to W. R. Baker made by virtue of an execution sale upon a judgment rendered in the district court of Harris county, Tex., in 1852, in favor of Lee Pennington against John Fitzgerald personally, it appearing from the abstract that service on Fitzgerald was obtained by publication, it not being shown (the record in the case being lost) whether Fitzgerald was either a resident or citizen of the state of Texas, was good, and it was because this link might not be good that James Baker declined to consummate his purchase, his opinion being that, if at the time Fitzgerald was sued he was a nonresident of the state of Texas, his title was not divested by virtue of the sheriff's deed made to W. R. Baker by virtue of the sale made under execution issued on said judgment.

The special issues were submitted by the court after a charge correctly enunciating the principles of law applicable to the facts pertaining to them; and, as the evidence fully warrants the jury's findings upon all of them, we adopt and make the verdict our findings of fact upon such issues, which are the only ones controverted.

Conclusions of Law.

The principles of law which are deemed applicable by appellants' counsel to the case are presented under numerous assignments of error, urged with great ability, and supported by a wealth of authorities. Appellee's counsel, while not combating the principles of law contended for by appellants nor the soundness of the authorities urged in support of them, contends that the principles of law urged by their counsel are inapplicable to the case; and has presented in reply the principles of law he deems applicable, adduced numerous authorities in support of them, and has presented them with such force as to convince this court that appellants are wrong and he is right in all his contentions. While it would be pleasing to the writer to take up and discuss seriatim the numerous propositions and counter-propositions advanced by counsel for either party under the several assignments, unfold the authorities cited in support of them, and give at length the reasons which have induced the court to conclude against appellants and hold with the appellee, the time he can give to the disposition of this appeal denies him the pleasure of the labor; nor is it deemed necessary by the court to a proper disposition of the case that it should be done; for it is thought that an analysis of the contract between appellants and appellee and of the one between them and Baker, both of which are embodied in our conclusions of fact, and an exposition of the law applicable to them and to what was done under them by the parties to this action and by Mr. Baker, will cover every question raised by the assignments essential to a proper disposition of the case and demonstrate that it was correctly disposed of in the court below. By the instrument of September 5, 1905, the defendants appointed the plaintiff their exclusive agent for the period of four months from its date to sell the lands described therein for not less than $12,000; it being agreed that, if Thomas should sell the property within the period of his agency, he should have whatever sum in excess of $12,000 he sold the property out of the first payment made by the purchaser, appellants agreeing to furnish an abstract of title up to date of sale and clear title to purchaser. The meaning of this agreement is too clear for construction. Citation of authorities is unnecessary to show that, to entitle the plaintiff to the compensation stipulated for effecting a sale alone under the authority conferred by it, he must have within the period of his agency procured a purchaser able, ready, and willing to buy upon the very terms stipulated. Looking to this writing alone, Thomas could do nothing which it did not expressly authorize. It was his letter of attorney, and all the power he had was written in it. If, without more, he did anything short of or beyond it, such acts, while they might in certain events render him liable for damages, would not bind the defendants, or adversely affect anyone else. It is equally apparent that the other writing, incorporated in the conclusions of facts, had it been made between the plaintiff and Baker without the approval or acquiescence of the defendants, would show such an excess of or departure from his authority by Thomas as to render the instrument inoperative and absolutely void. If such were the case, it would bind neither defendants nor Baker, nor could plaintiff recover anything for doing what he had no authority whatever to do. But such is not the case. The writing, though procured by the plaintiff, was executed by the defendants themselves as well as by Baker. That it is an executory contract of sale based upon a valid consideration is apparent from the face of the writing. We say it is an executory contract of sale because it recites the payment by Baker and the receipt by Hamburger & Dreyling of $1,000 as part payment of the purchase money for the land. After the description then follows this declaration: "Which property we [L. A. Hamburger and Gus Dreyling] have this day sold to said Baker, his heirs and assigns, for the full sum of * * * $13,500 dollars cash." Then follows the stipulation of the defendants' obligation to convey the land to Baker upon his paying the purchase money of $13,500, less the sum receipted for. Then follows the stipulation of defendants' agreements to furnish abstract of title, and that, if title to the property is not good in the opinion of Baker, they will return the $1,000 they received from him, and that, if the title in his opinion is good and the property is not taken within 10 days from delivery of complete abstract of title, then the $1,000 receipted for shall be forfeited to Thomas and defendants equally as liquidated damages, etc.

This is not a mere "option," by which is meant a contract by which the owner of property agrees with another person that he shall have the right to buy his property within a certain time. By this the owner does not sell his property nor agree to sell it, but sells simply the right or privilege to buy at the election of the other party. Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Pac. 695, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17; Hopwood v. McCausland, 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469; McMillan v. Philadelphia Co., 159 Pa. 142, 28 Atl. 220. But, as is before said, it is a contract of sale. It shows a contract which, upon its breach by either party, the other can enforce. If, in the opinion of Baker, the title was good, and he failed to take the land, the $1,000 paid by him was forfeited to defendants and Thomas as liquidated damages. "Liquidated damages for what?" Why, simply for Baker's breach of the contract in failing to take the land. The damages to either party for its breach could be fixed by a stipulation in the contract, though the damages to the other was not. Beauchamp v. Couch (decided by this court on the 17th inst.) 117 S. W. 924. The damages to Baker which might have ensued from a breach of the contract on the part of Hamburger & Dreyling in failing to make him a deed of conveyance upon his tendering performance of his part of the agreement not being stipulated in the contract, he could have, at his election, either enforced specific performance of the contract or recovered such damages as he may have sustained. But, the defendants having failed to furnish an abstract showing a title good in Baker's opinion, he was under the agreement entitled to a restoration of the part of the purchase money he had already paid. This he could have recovered with interest, and such special damages as he may have incurred by reason of having been induced to enter into the contract had there been no stipulation for its return. Clifton v. Charles (Tex. Civ. App.) 116 S. W. 120.

What, then under the law and facts, were plaintiff's rights as against the defendants by reason of their failure to consummate their contract of sale with Baker? As has been seen, he was their exclusive agent at the time they signed the contract with Baker as the purchaser of the land to sell the same upon terms stated in the writing creating such agency; that, though the terms of the sale he effected with Baker differed materially from those expressed in his appointment, the defendant agreed to the alteration of the terms by signing the contract of sale; that the terms which fixed the amount of plaintiff's compensation in the event the sale was consummated in accordance with the contract with Baker were in no way changed, altered, or affected thereby; that Baker was able, ready, and willing to buy the land upon the terms agreed upon, if in his opinion the abstract furnished showed a title which was good; that the abstract furnished did not show a title which in his opinion was good; that his opinion was real and founded upon such opinion was such as any good lawyer would have formed without further data than was disclosed by the abstract; that Baker would have, in fact, completed his purchase had the defendants complied with their agreement showing a title to the land which was good in his opinion; and that the compensation for plaintiff's services under his contract of agency for procuring Baker as a purchaser able, ready, and willing to buy the land upon terms agreed to by the defendants would, had it not been for defendant's failure to comply with their agreement to furnish an abstract showing a title good in Baker's opinion, have been $1,500. If Baker had arrived at the opinion that the title was good and refused to take the land, plaintiff's compensation would have been $500 of the $1,000 paid by Baker as part of the purchase money, which was stipulated should, in such event, be forfeited to defendants and him as liquidated damages. This is stipulated in the contract between defendants and Baker, and shows that defendants recognized plaintiff as the procuring cause of the contract of sale. Can it, then, be said that, if the contract of sale had been fully consummated by the parties, plaintiff would not have been entitled to any compensation at all for procuring the purchaser? To put the question is to answer it in the negative. How, then, would the amount of his compensation have been determined? Clearly by his contract of agency, which entitled him to whatever excess of $12,000 he sold the property for. The rule seems to be well settled that where a real estate broker has contracted for a certain compensation for procuring a customer to purchase on certain terms and conditions, and he procures a purchaser who agrees to purchase under modified terms and conditions differing from those the agent was authorized by his principal to make, and such terms, as modified, are agreed to by the owner of the property by his entering into a written contract of sale, embodying the modified terms and conditions, with the purchaser, the broker is entitled to his compensation as stipulated in his contract of agency, if through the failure of his principal to comply with the terms and conditions he has undertaken on his part to perform and comply with the contract of sale is not consummated. Graves v. Bains, 78 Tex. 94, 14 S. W. 256; Conkling v. Krakauer, 70 Tex. 739, 11 S. W. 117; Hahl v. Wickes, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 76, 97 S. W. 838; McDonald v. Cabiness (Tex. Civ. App.) 98 S. W. 943; Id., 100 Tex. 615, 102 S. W. 721; West v. Thompson (Tex. Civ. App.) 106 S. W. 1134; Stewart v. Mather, 32 Wis. 344; Gilder v. Davis, 137 N. Y. 504, 33 N. E. 599, 20 L. R. A. 398; Lockwood v. Halsey, 41 Kan. 166, 21 Pac. 98; Gelatt v. Ridge, 117 Mo. 553, 23 S. W. 884, 38 Am. St. Rep. 683; Smith v.

and brings the seller and purchaser together, and a definite and binding contract is entered into between them to consummate the sale upon the terms and price agreed to by the seller, if the title is good, the broker is entitled to his commissions, although no sale be effected because of a defect in the title. Brackenridge v. Claridge, 91 Tex. 527, 44 S. W. 819, 43 L. R. A. 593; Albritton v. First Nat. Bank, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 614, 86 S. W. 646; Berg v. Street Ry., 17 Tex. Civ. App. 291, 42 S. W. 647, 43 S. W. 929; Stringfellow v. Powers, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 199, 23 S. W. 313; Parker v. Walker, 86 Tenn. 566, 8 S. W. 391. We apprehend that the same principle is applicable when the seller contracts with the buyer to furnish him an abstract showing a title good in the latter's opinion, and it proves, as in this case, not to be good in his opinion. There was no fraud, coercion, or undue influence practiced or exercised by Thomas upon the defendants alleged or proved as an inducement for their entering into the agreement to furnish an abstract showing a title good in the opinion of Baker. This stipulation in the agreement was purely voluntary on their part. They were free to make it a part of their obligation or not, just as they pleased. But, having made it, they were liable for the consequences of its breach. Watkins Ld. Co. v. Thetford, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 536, 96 S. W. 72; Leuschner v. Patrick (Tex. Civ. App.) 103 S. W. 664. Under the decision just cited it made no difference, so far as the broker was concerned, after he had procured a purchaser acceptable to the seller and a written contract of sale had been entered into by them, whether the purchaser was able to pay for the land or not, for in either event the agent was entitled to his commission. It would seem a fortiori that in this case, after the defendants had entered into the written contract with Baker, it would make no difference to Thomas whether they were able to furnish Baker with an abstract showing a title good in his opinion or not. As to their ability to conform to this condition was a matter for them, and not Thomas, to determine. He had procured a purchaser able, ready, and willing to buy upon terms agreed upon by the parties, and was no more responsible for defendants' inability to comply with their undertaking than he would have been if Baker had been unable to perform his. In either event, plaintiff would be entitled to his compensation. It made no difference whether the abstract showed a good title or whether defendants had title to the land by limitation or not; for, if it was not good in Baker's opinion, he could refuse to take the land and recover the part of the purchase money he had paid. Greer v. International Stockyards

Co., 43 Tex. Civ. App. 370, 96 S. W. 79; Smith v. Lander (Tex. Civ. App.) 106 S. W. 703.

Hence we conclude that under the law and facts the plaintiff had the right as against defendants to recover of them the $1,500 sued for. The judgment of the district court in Thomas' favor for such sum being in accordance with such right, and there being no error assigned which would authorize its reversal, it is affirmed.

McMILLION v. COOK.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 7, 1909.
Rehearing Denied April 28, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DIVISION OF COMMISSION—THEORY OF CAUSE.

Where plaintiff's petition pleaded an express contract to pay plaintiff one-half commission on the sale of certain real estate, defendant was not entitled to have the cause submitted on the theory of implied contract and quantum meruit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 357*)—IMPEACHMENT—GENERAL REPUTATION.

A question asked a witness as to whether he was acquainted with defendant's general reputation for truth and veracity in the community, counsel stating that by general reputation he meant the general opinion in the community in the range of defendant's acquaintanceship, was intelligible and substantially proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 357.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 358*)—IMPEACHMENT—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF IMPEACHING WITNESS.

Where an impeaching witness was asked concerning defendant's general reputation for truth and veracity, defendant's counsel was entitled to cross-examine the witness concerning the basis of the witness' opinion before he had been permitted to testify that defendant's reputation was bad.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 358.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 412*)—WAIVER OF ERROR.

Error in the court's refusal to permit the immediate cross-examination of an impeaching witness, before permitting the witness to testify that defendant's reputation was bad, was waived where defendant's counsel made no attempt to cross-examine the witness when an opportunity was afforded him to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 412.*]

5. WITNESSES (§ 358*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—COLLATERAL MATTER.

Where a witness had testified to impeaching circumstances against defendant, and stated that the witness and defendant had always been on good terms until defendant had told a lie on witness' son, a further question asked, as to what it was defendant had told that was a lie, was immaterial and collateral.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 358.*]

6. WITNESSES (§ 355*)—IMPEACHMENT—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

A witness, after testifying against defendant's general reputation for truth and veracity, stated on cross-examination: "When I say I am acquainted with his reputation for truth and veracity, and that it is bad, I base my judgment on what other people say. In fact it is because he did not tell me the truth just that one time." Held, that the court did not err in refusing to strike out the witness' testimony on the ground that it was based on his own knowledge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1154-1156; Dec. Dig. § 355.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 103*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—EXCEPTIONS—FORM.

A bill of exceptions to the exclusion of testimony should state what it was expected the witness would answer, and the objections to the testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 256; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

8. WITNESSES (§ 357*)—IMPEACHMENT—GENERAL REPUTATION.

The question: "Are you acquainted with his (defendant's) general reputation for truth and veracity out there? I mean general reputation, what the people generally say about him?"—was not objectionable as calling for the opinion of the public about plaintiff in any and all matters, and not as to truth and veracity merely.

Appeal from Montague County Court; Geo. S. March, Judge.

Action by J. W. Cook against G. W. McMillion. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Speer & Weldon, for appellant. W. S. Jamaeson, for appellee.

JAMES, C. J. The petition of J. W. Cook states a case of an express contract on the part of appellant to pay him one-half of a certain commission in the sale of certain real estate. Plaintiff alleged that defendant was agent for the sale of the land and agreed with plaintiff that if plaintiff found a purchaser he would pay plaintiff a sum of money equal to one-half of his 5 per cent. commission, and that plaintiff found and brought him a purchaser who bought the land, etc.

The action being based upon allegation of an express agreement and for a stipulated sum, appellant had no right to a submission of a case upon the theory of implied contract and quantum meruit. Consequently the charge complained of by the eleventh assignment was not incorrect.

The first assignment of error is overruled. The witness Young was asked the question: "Are you acquainted with his (appellant's) general reputation for truth and veracity in that community, and by his general reputation I mean the general opinion in the community in the range of his acquaintanceship?" The proposition in the brief is that: "When this question was asked, appellant's counsel believed the witness would attempt to respond with an answer based upon some other opinion in the neighborhood than that of appellant's general reputation for truth and veracity and should have been permitted to cross-examine the witness as to what he proposed to base his opinion upon, before permitting him to testify that his general reputation was bad." The question put to the witness could not be understood otherwise than as an inquiry into the general reputation of the party, or general opinion of the party, in the community of the party's residence or acquaintanceship. The question was in intelligible and substantially proper form. Appellant's proposition relied on is above stated. The proposition is a correct one, and it was error to refuse to allow counsel the opportunity at that time to test his qualification. The rule of practice is well settled in this state, for to allow the witness to give the testimony and permit counsel to develop the witness' disqualification only in a cross-examination after the testimony is in would, as stated in Johnson v. Brown, 51 Tex. 77, place the party at the disadvantage of having an impression prematurely made on the minds of the jury, which neither the charge of the court nor the remarks of counsel could entirely remove. See, also, for rule, Clapp v. Engledow, 72 Tex. 256, 10 S. W. 492. But should the judgment be reversed for such error, when it appears that counsel failed to make any cross-examination whatever of the witness? If he had done this, and developed what he expected he would have developed through a preliminary examination, he might have had the testimony of the witness stricken out by the court, and at all events the result of the trial might have been different. It seems to us that where a party is placed at a disadvantage by an erroneous ruling of the court, and he possesses some means calculated to avoid the consequences of the ruling, he ought not to be heard to complain of it where he has made no effort to make use of such means. We therefore overrule the assignment.

Second assignment: The proposition is: "Witness T. H. Lawrence had testified to impeaching circumstances against appellant and had stated he and appellant had always been on good terms until the latter had told a lie on his son, and then appellant should have been permitted to ascertain more about the transaction to the end that the jury might determine whether or not witness' animosity for appellant and his knowledge of this old transaction had induced him to swear that appellant's reputation for truth and veracity was bad." What was sought to be asked the witness was: What was it that defendant had told on him that was a lie? It appears that the witness had testified in chief against defendant's general reputation for truth and veracity, and it was upon cross-examination by appellant that he testified as stated in the proposition. What the lie consisted of was immaterial and collateral, and the court did not err in refusing to allow the further inquiry.

Third assignment: The same witness, Lawrence, testified upon cross-examination: "When I say I am acquainted with his reputation for truth and veracity, and that it is bad, I base my judgment upon what other people say and what I know. In fact, it is because he did not tell me the truth just that one time." Thereupon counsel moved to have the impeaching testimony of Lawrence withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, which request was refused. The entire testimony of the witness should be considered. He did testify upon cross-examination that he based his impeaching testimony on what other people said, and upon what he knew himself. The additional statement, "In fact, it is because he did not tell me the truth that one time"—may have had reference to what he himself knew. At any rate, taking all this witness stated on his cross-examination, it did not so distinctly appear that he was testifying solely from his individual opinion that it would have justified the court in striking out his testimony.

The fourth assignment is overruled. The bill of exceptions upon which it is founded does not state what the objection to the testimony was, which was sustained, nor does it undertake to state what it was expected that the witness would answer.

We overrule the fifth and sixth assignments. The remarks attributed to the trial judge, exhibiting impatience with counsel, ought not and cannot fairly be supposed to have had any influence upon the jury's performance of their duty.

We regard the question objected to by the seventh assignment, to wit: "Are you acquainted with this defendant's general reputation for truth and veracity out there? I mean by general reputation what the people generally say about him"—as untenable. This question, taken in its entirety, is clearly not subject to the objection interposed to it: That it called for an answer as to the opinion of the public about defendant in any and all matters, and not as to truth and veracity merely.

We overrule the eighth and ninth assignments.

Affirmed.

2. CARRIERS (§ 207*) — FAILURE TO CARRY FREIGHT TENDERED—EXCUSE—SUFFICIENCY.

A contract between a carrier and a shipper stipulated that the carrier should receive empty cars of another carrier and deliver them to the shipper for the reception of the freight. The carrier notified the shipper to get his freight ready for shipment. The carrier failed to deliver the cars, and the shipper sustained damages. Held, that the carrier was liable for breach of contract, though there was an unexpected movement of freight and a shortage of cars in which to ship the same.

3. CARRIERS (§ 13*)—DISCRIMINATION — “UNJUST DISCRIMINATION.”

To constitute “unjust discrimination” under Sayles’ Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 4574, prohibiting unjust discrimination, defined to be undue or unreasonable preference to any particular shipper, a preference must be given to one shipper over shippers of similar freight under similar circumstances, and a contract binding a carrier to receive cars of another carrier and deliver them to a shipper for the reception of his freight is not invalid as creating an unjust discrimination, in the absence of evidence that the contract gave the shipper a preference over shippers of other similar freight, who could secure cars from other carriers.

Appeal from District Court, Hunt County; R. L. Porter, Judge.

Action by the Shawnee Cotton Oil Company and another against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant the Texas & Pacific Railway Company appeals. Affirmed.

W. L. Hall and T. B. McCormick, for appellant. Looney & Clark, for appellees.

BOOKHOUT, J. This was a suit brought by appellee, Shawnee Cotton Oil Company, against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by a shipment of cattle made by the plaintiff over the lines of the defendant railways between Iatan, Texas, and Shawnee, Okl., during the month of December, 1906. The plaintiff alleged that on or about November 27, 1906, it owned 878 head of two and three year old steer cattle, which it desired to ship to Shawnee; that the Texas & Pacific Railway Company claimed that, owing to a rush of business, it could not immediately furnish cars for the shipment, and, as plaintiff was desirous of an immediate shipment to prevent deterioration if not immediately transported, it arranged with the Missouri, Kansas &

Texas Railway Company of Texas to furnish the necessary cars to the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and that these two companies agreed and arranged with the plaintiff by that means to at once and within a reasonable time furnish and have at Iatan the necessary cars to transport the cattle, and that said companies failed and refused to comply with said arrangement, and did not have the cars at Iatan until December 19th, when 20 cars were furnished, and until December 21st, when 10 additional cars were furnished; that, relying on said understanding, the plaintiff at once got his cattle ready, but that, on account of the failure of the defendants to furnish the cars as agreed, it was kept waiting from time to time, not knowing when the cars would arrive, and being required to keep a man in charge at expense, and that, by reason of these facts, the cattle deteriorated in their market value $2 per head, and its agent cost it in expense $100; that the defendants handled the shipments as partners; and that in the transportation a number of head of the cattle were killed or injured. Plaintiff prayed for a judgment against all of the defendants for the damage incident to not delivering the cars, and for the loss of two head of cattle the sum of $1,985, and against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas it claimed an additional damage for the injuries to the shipment en route, $377.

Defendant the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, after exceptions and a general denial and a denial of partnership, pleaded that, at the time demand was made upon it for cars, it was unable immediately to comply with said demand, because at that time there existed throughout the country the most serious congestion of traffic that had occurred in a great many years, if, in fact, such a congested condition of traffic throughout the country had ever occurred before; that the conditions which prevailed upon the Texas & Pacific Railway were similar to those throughout the country; that during the fall of 1906 there was a shortage of cars due to the unprecedented movement of freight over its entire line and over the lines of connecting carriers, and there was such an unprecedented offering of freight of all kinds at all stations along the lines of said defendant's road that, with the utmost care, it could not promptly handle the freight that was offered, and was compelled on account of such unprecedented condition to furnish the various shippers shipping facilities as fast as it could, but in the order in which freight was offered and applications for cars were made; that this condition was generally known throughout the country and was known to the plaintiff, and that defendant did not enter into a contract or agreement with the plaintiff or any of its codefendants to receive cars from the Missouri, Kansas & Texas, and immediately place the same at Iatan for the use of plaintiff in making the shipment. It denied that it received said cars from the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company with such understanding, or that it was advised by said company that said cars were delivered to it for said purpose, but alleged that it was receiving and using all of the cattle cars it could get, either of its own or from connecting carriers, to fill orders which were on file at the time at various stations on its line, and that it uniformly adhered to the rule to furnish such cars in the order of their application, and that it did not and would not have agreed to receive cars to be immediately placed for the plaintiff out of their regular order ahead of others who had previously filed application or demand for cars. It denied that it in any manner induced the plaintiff to bring these cattle into Iatan prior to the time it was able to furnish cars for these shipments; that the congested condition was known to the plaintiff and to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Companies; and that this defendant did, in fact, furnish said cars as soon as possible, and in the order of the plaintiff's application with reference to other applications on file at the time the plaintiff's demand for cars was made. The Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas filed answers similar to the answer of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company. A trial resulted in a judgment for plaintiff against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company for the sum of $1,756 damage to the cattle on account of delay in delivering the cars and $57 expense of the plaintiff's agent at Iatan awaiting the arrival of cars, and $54, being the value of 2 head of cattle killed en route on said defendant's line, and a judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company in the sum of $351, being the value of 13 head of cattle killed by injuries received on the lines of said companies between Ft. Worth and Shawnee. The Texas & Pacific Railway Company only appeals.

The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. The court filed conclusions of fact, wherein he found that the Texas & Pacific Railway Company made the contract for the shipment of plaintiff's cattle substantially as set out in the petition. Appellant in various assignments complains of this finding. We have carefully examined the evidence, and are of the opinion that it is amply sufficient to support the finding. The appellee owned 878 head of cattle near Iatan, which he desired to ship to Shawnee, Oklahoma. The appellant being unable because of rush of business to furnish cars in which to ship said cattle, appellee arranged with the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas to furnish 81 stable cars in which to load and ship cattle from Iatan to Shawnee. The evidence shows that appellant agreed to receive said cars for such purpose, and did actually receive the same on November 27th, and started them west from Ft. Worth on November 27th and 28th, and after said arrangement had been made appellant notified appellee on November 27th that it had received the cars and would take them out at once for the cattle and for appellant to at once get its cattle in readiness to be loaded, and that, acting on this arrangement, appellee did, in fact, get the cattle, and had them near Iatan in readiness to be loaded. Appellant wholly failed to deliver any car or cars at Iatan until December 19, 1906, at which date it had there 20 cars, into which were loaded 528 head of plaintiff's cattle, and on December 21, 1906, it had at Iatan 10 more cars into which were loaded the remainder of the cattle, being 350 head. Appellant contends that a carrier is not liable for inability to promptly accept and carry all freight tendered to it if there arises an unexpected press of business for the prompt handling of which its facilities are inadequate, provided the carrier could not have reasonably anticipated and provided against such situation by a timely and corresponding increase of its facilities. There is authority to support this contention. H. & T. O. R. Co. v. Smith, 63 Tex. 326. This, however, could not relieve appellant if there was an express contract between appellant and appellee for the shipment of the cattle.

In the case of G. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Hume Bros., 87 Tex. 219, 27 S. W. 112, our Supreme Court in disposing of a contention, the same as that made by appellant in this case, said: "If the agent of the railroad company made a contract with plaintiffs or their agent to furnish cars at a given time to transport the cattle, then the fact that the shipment of cattle over the line of the railroad at that time was so great that it did not have cars sufficient to enable it to furnish the cars contracted for would constitute no defense to the action for the breach of that contract." In the case of Southern Kansas R. R. Co. v. Morris (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 433, Judge Stephens, speaking for the court of the Second district, said: "The court did not err in holding that the answer pleading an unusual volume of business as an excuse for not complying with the contract presented no defense. The case was not one of failure to furnish cars within a reasonable time after application had been made for them, but of failure to furnish cars at a given time according to contract." And in the more recent case of San Antonio & Aransas Pass Railway Co. v. Timon (Tex.) 114 S. W. 792, the shipper went to an agent of the railway company, and informed him that his cattle would be ready for shipment on a certain day, and requested the agent to have cars at his station at that time to ship cattle in, and the agent replied, "All right." The Supreme Court held that this was sufficient to show acceptance of the offer to ship on the day named and a contract on the part of the railway company to have cars at its station on the day named by the shipper, and that the railway company was liable in damages for injury sustained by reason of failure to furnish the cars on the day specified by the shipper in his offer. See, also, Cross v. McFaden, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 461, 20 S. W. 847; Railway Co. v. Hume, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 653, 24 S. W. 917; Railway Co. v. Hodge, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 543, 30 S. W. 831. Having held that there was an express contract between appellant and appellee, whereby appellant agreed to receive from the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas at Ft. Worth 81 empty stable cars and deliver them to appellee at Iatan in which to ship the cattle and gave notice to appellee to get his cattle ready for shipment, the appellant was liable for a breach of this contract, notwithstanding the unexpected movement of freight and the shortage of cars in which to ship the same.

There was evidence showing a congestion of freight upon the line of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company during the months of November and December, 1906, and a shortage of cars on the part of the company in which to ship the freight. It was because of such shortage that appellee procured cars from the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, in which to ship his cattle. The appellant received these cars and agreed to forward same to Iatan. At the time no suggestion was made of any shortage of motive power; nor does the answer of the company set up a shortage in motive power to handle all freight tendered to it. The answer only sets up a shortage of cars in which to ship the cattle. With proper motive power the cattle could be shipped from Iatan to Ft. Worth in 24 hours. The appellant contends that if a carrier is suffering from a heavy congestion of traffic and press of business, so that it cannot promptly accept and handle in due order all of the freight that is being tendered for shipment, during the continuance of such conditions, shall contract to carry freight for a customer out of its regular order and ahead of others of its customers having prior right, such contract so made is illegal and cannot be enforced, and, if breached by the railway company, affords the party with whom it was made no right of action that the courts will enforce. If the contract amounted to an unjust discrimination against other shippers having live stock to be shipped over appellant's railroad, and who had furnished cars in which to ship the same and who were similarly situated as appellee, then it was unlawful, and would not be enforced. Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 4574. But the evidence must show an unjust discrimination as defined by the statute to make it unlawful. H. & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Stewart, 1 White & W. Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 1246; H. & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Rust & Dinkins, 58 Tex. 107; Hoover v. Penn. R. R., 156 Pa. 220, 27 Atl. 282, 22 L. R. A. 263, 36 Am. St. Rep. 58. To be an unjust discrimination, the evidence must show a preference given to appellee over shippers of live stock who had furnished the cars in which the same were to be transported. There was no evidence that any other shipper of live stock furnishing his own cars had priority over appellee.

Complaint is made by appellant of the court's failure to make certain specific findings of fact. The record shows a request by appellant for certain special findings of fact, but does not show that any exception was taken to the court's failure to make such findings. The motion for new trial complains of the finding that appellant contracted and agreed to accept the 81 cars from the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and informed plaintiff to get the cattle in readiness to be shipped. But no complaint is made therein of the court's failure to make special findings on the issues submitted by appellant. There was no bill of exception taken and preserved in the record complaining of the court's failure in this respect. It is held that the failure of the court to file conclusions of fact when requested will not be considered on appeal without a bill of exception taken before the adjournment of court. Landa v. Heerman, 85 Tex. 1, 19 S. W. 885.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 501*)—OPINIONS—EXAMINATION—QUESTIONS—FOUNDATION.

Where, in an action for damages to land by impounding water by the negligent construction of a railroad embankment, plaintiff testified that the land had been cleared and in cultivation for several years before the overflow, and was in fine condition and under crop when overflowed, a question as to what the land was worth if it was cleared and in a high state of cultivation was not objectionable on the ground that the hypothesis on which it was based was not supported by the evidence.

3. DAMAGES (§ 174*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for injuries to land in May, 1905, where the only evidence that the conditions affecting its value on March 14, 1906, were the same as immediately after the overflow, was testimony of a witness that there had been practically no change in the "value of the land" in that neighborhood from May, 1905, to March, 1906, testimony as to the value of the land on March 14, 1906, was properly excluded.

4. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad for damages caused by impounding water by the negligent construction of an embankment so as to flood plaintiff's land, where there was no evidence that the damages were caused from any other cause than the failure of defendant to provide sufficient openings in its roadbed to pass the water, an instruction that if defendant constructed its bed so as to impound the waters of the stream, and the roadbed broke and caused the overflow of plaintiff's land, was not on the weight of the evidence for excluding any other issue than the impounding of the water.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; E. B. Muse, Judge.

Action by A. S. Chilton and another against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas & Rhea, for appellant. Turney & Lewis, for appellees.

TALBOT, J. The appellees, A. S. and A. J. Chilton, brought this suit against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas, the appellant, to recover damages caused by overflow of their land during the year 1905; said land being situated in what is known as "Five-Mile creek bottom," about nine miles south of Dallas. It was alleged by plaintiffs that the natural flow of the water in Five-Mile creek was in a southeasterly direction, but, by reason of the negligent construction of appellant's railroad embankment across said stream and the valley thereof in not providing sufficient openings through same for the water to pass in high water, the flow of the waters had been changed from its natural course and caused to back up against and on the west side of said embankment, causing same to break on the 13th of May, 1905, precipitating the waters over the land of plaintiffs, washing same, and damaging said lands to the extent of $3,110. The defendant pleaded the defense that he held notes on the land, aggregating $1,000 without interest, which notes were secured by vendor's and mortgage liens on the land, and that, by reason of the facts pleaded by plaintiff, intervenor's security had been impaired to the extent to which land had been damaged by the overflow, and asked that judgment be rendered for such injuries against the defendants, and that the court set aside to intervenor such part of the damages awarded as might seem just and right. The trial before a jury resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,250, and judgment was thereupon entered by the court in favor of the plaintiffs, and against the defendant in the said sum of $1,250, directing that the same when collected be paid into the registry of the court, to be applied two-thirds to the indebtedness of the intervenor, R. G. Phillips, and the balance to plaintiffs' attorneys. From this judgment the appellant prosecutes this appeal.

It is assigned that the trial court erred in refusing to grant appellant's motion for a new trial because the verdict of the jury is excessive. This assignment should not, in our opinion, be sustained. The evidence was amply sufficient to warrant the amount of the verdict. Indeed, a verdict for a larger sum would have been justified by the testimony.

J. M. Hagler, a witness for the plaintiffs, was asked the following question: "Well, Mr. Hagler, if the land had been cleared as you say it was, and it was in a high state of cultivation, clean and clear, what would you say the piece of land would be worth?" Appellant's counsel objected to this question on the ground that there was no evidence in the case to justify the hypothesis upon which the question was based. The objection was overruled and the witness permitted to answer: "It was worth from $70 to $75 per acre." We think there was no error in this ruling of the court. Plaintiffs had testified that their land had been cleared and in cultivation for several years before the overflow, that at the time of the overflow there was a nice crop on the land, and it was in fine condition. This testimony found in the record is sufficient to meet the appellant's objection and show the correctness of the court's ruling. We have examined the authorities cited by counsel for appellant in support of their position and believe they are not in point.

We are also of the opinion there was no error in refusing to permit the witness Thigpen to testify to the value of plaintiffs' land on March 14, 1906. This witness, it appears, did not see the land after it was cleared and put in cultivation, nor until about one year after the overflow and injury to it. The measure of damages in such case is the difference between the market value of the land immediately before and immediately after the injury. By the evidence excluded the appellant sought to show the value of the land nearly one year after the damage complained of was done, without showing that the conditions affecting its value were the same as they were just after the overflow. It is true the witness Thigpen stated that "there had been practically no change in the value of the land in that community since May, 1905, to March, 1906"; but without further evidence that the conditions affecting the value of plaintiffs' land were practically the same on March 14, 1906, as they were just after the injury, its value at the latter date would not furnish the proper criterion for determining plaintiffs' damages.

Appellant's fourth assignment complains of the following charge: "If you find and believe from the evidence that the defendant so built and constructed its roadbed across Five-Mile creek and the bottom lands adjacent thereto, in such a manner as to obstruct and impound the waters of said stream, and said embankment broke, and the flood caused thereby flowed over and across plaintiffs' lands and injured said land, you will find for the plaintiffs. If you find for the plaintiffs, you will affix the damages at such sum as you may find to be the difference between the reasonable market value of the land before the injury, if any, and immediately after the injury, if any." The objection to this charge is that it is upon "the weight of the evidence, in that it excludes any other issue than the mere impounding of the waters," and instructed a verdict for plaintiffs if the jury should find that defendant's embankment obstructed and impounded the waters of the stream, thereby ignoring the question of what might have been the proximate cause of such obstruction and impounding. The objection is not well taken. It was a statutory duty imposed upon appellant to construct in its roadbed such necessary culverts and sluices as the natural lay of the land at the point in question required for the necessary drainage thereof, and a violation of this duty rendered it liable for such damages as plaintiffs sustained as a result thereof. The charge complained of very fairly submits those issues to the jury, and we fail to find any substantial evidence in the record tending to show that any other cause than the failure of appellant to provide its roadbed with sufficient openings for the passage of the water proximately contributed to the damage done the plaintiffs' property. In other words, we fail to find any evidence raising an issue as to the proximate cause of the injury to appellees' property, and the charge quoted was sufficient. The charge was in no respect upon the weight of the evidence.

The contention that the evidence was sufficient to justify the conclusion that the drift accumulated in the creek bed above the railroad embankment, or that the ditch cut by the Trinity Rod & Gun Club, changed the surface waters of Five-Mile creek, and "impounded the waters of said creek against the embankment of defendant," and proximately contributed to cause plaintiffs' damage, is not sustained. We think the evidence conclusively shows that neither the said drift nor this ditch in any way contributed to cause the overflow resulting in the injury to plaintiffs' land. For this reason the court correctly refused appellant's requested charge, made the basis of its fifth assignment of error, submitting such an issue.

The evidence warranted the conclusion that the rainfall was not unusual and unprecedented. The material allegations in plaintiffs' petition were sufficiently established to justify the verdict of the jury, the issues raised were fairly submitted, and the judgment will be affirmed.

DALLAS TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. STORY.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 3, 1909.
Rehearing Denied May 1, 1909.)

MORTGAGES (§ 298*)—INTEREST—EFFECT OF PAYMENT OF PRINCIPAL.

A mortgage creditor, who collected on the policy after destruction of the improvements more than enough to extinguish the principal of the debt, could not collect more interest than that which had accrued at the date of the collection of the policy; but a creditor entitled to receive the amount of interest notes as commissions for negotiating the loan might retain such amount, notwithstanding his collection of the policy.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; W. M. Holland, Judge.

Action by Millard Story against the Dallas Trust & Savings Bank. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cockrell & Gray, for appellant. R. L. Porter, for appellee.

RAINEY, C. J. On November 23, 1905, the appellee borrowed from appellant the sum of $3,500, for which he agreed to pay 8 per cent. interest per annum. Five promissory notes were executed by appellee and made payable to the order of H. A. Kahler, four of which were for $300, each, and the other for $2,300; said notes falling due December 1, 1906, December 1, 1907, December 1, 1908, December 1, 1909, and December 1, 1910, respectively, bearing 6 per cent. interest per annum, payable semiannually. At the same time appellee executed to appellant ten notes

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes first notes. A first and second mortgage on real estate situated in the town of Mexia, Tex., were executed to secure the payment of said notes; the first mortgage to secure the payment of the first five notes, and the second to secure the other ten notes. The improvements on said property were insured against fire, and the policy made payable to H. A. Kahler, or to the legal holder of said notes, as their interest might appear. The first mortgage provided that, in case said improvements were destroyed by fire, "the said H. A. Kahler, or other legal holder of said bond shall have the right to apply the moneys collected from the insurance in payment of the debt secured, whether due or not." It was further provided that if default was made in the payment of taxes, premiums of insurance, or charges of any kind, at the option of the holder, "the moneys due on said bond and for advances as aforesaid may be collected by a sale under this mortgage or by suits in the courts of Dallas county, or otherwise, as H. A. Kahler, or other legal holder of said bond may elect." The second mortgage provides, among other things: "If default shall be made in the payment of the above-described notes for $291.55, or of the notes or bonds secured by the first mortgage aforesaid, or if default should be made in the compliance of any of the terms or conditions of said first mortgage, which are hereby adopted and made a part of this instrument, then the whole sum hereby secured shall become due and payable at the election of the holder hereof." In the early part of 1907, the improvements on said property were destroyed by fire, and on April 10, 1907, appellant collected $3,500 on the insurance policy and appropriated said insurance to said debt. At this date appellee had paid the notes that had fallen due, and he was owing a balance of $3,200, not including future interest. The holder of the first series of notes not then paid agreed to accept payment if interest was paid up to June 1, 1907, that being the next interest paying period, and cancel the notes. The appellant, the holder of the ten notes given for the 2 per cent. interest, demanded a greater sum than said notes would amount to on April 10, 1907, claiming that the 2 per cent. for which said ten notes were given represented the commissions it was to receive for negotiating the loan. Appellant offered to compromise by making some reduction of the amount that it claimed to be due, but appellee refused to settle on that basis and brought suit for $207.57, with 6 per cent. interest per annum thereon from April 10, 1907, claiming that much was wrongfully withheld from him by appellant out of the interest thereon at 8 per cent. up to June 1, 1907.

The contention of appellant that the 10 notes were given for its commissions in negotiating the loan, and therefore it was entitled to retain the full amount of their face value, does not necessarily follow from the evidence. If the contract had been that appellant was to receive said amount as its commissions for negotiating the loan, then we think it would be entitled to retain said amount; but under the evidence the court was authorized in concluding that such was not the contract entered into. It is true, Mr. Bregg, vice president of the bank, testified, in substance, that the bank in like transactions took a second mortgage to cover pay for services, attorney's fees, and expenses of examining the property, and to pay commissions to the correspondent or agent through whom the business comes, etc. This was doubtless Mr. Bregg's conception of the contract and prompted the drawing of the contract in the form it was; but there seems to be no evidence that appellee knew at the time of making the contract that the loan was being made for some one else, and that said 10 notes were executed for the bank's commissions. On the other hand, appellee testifies, in substance: That the contract for the loan of the money was made with the bank, the rate of interest to be 8 per cent. per annum, and when drawing up the paper he objected to signing the papers in the form as drawn up; but they told him it was their form and the way they loaned all their money. That at the time he was not informed that other parties were interested in the loan, and, having contracted for the money, he signed in accordance with their request. That Mr. Bregg told him after the fire that the 10 notes were the bank's commissions. The notes on their face specify they were given for a part of the interest on said loan, and until after the fire said notes were treated as part of the interest.

The conclusion, under the facts, being authorized that said 10 notes were given for part of the interest, then, did the bank have the right to retain the amount thereof then not due out of the insurance money collected by it? The fire insurance policy covering the mortgaged property which was burned, and enough thereof being collected and applied to the extinguishment of the principal of the debt as per the terms of the mortgage, no greater amount of interest was collectible than had accrued at the date of the collection of said insurance. *Dugan v. Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; E. B. Muse, Judge.

Action by Joseph Chase against the Dallas Consolidated Electric Street Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

RAINEY, C. J. This suit was brought by appellee to recover of appellant damages on account of personal injuries sustained by him while he was attempting to alight from one of appellant's cars. The petition alleged, among other things, that defendant was duly incorporated under the laws of Texas; "that, while he was a passenger on one of the defendant's cars, he gave the defendant notice that he wished to alight therefrom, and thereupon said car checked its speed, and plaintiff went to the rear platform to alight from said car, and as the car had passed the usual and customary place for alighting at Harwood street and as the speed of the car had been checked, and believing the conductor's signal indicated that he should get off, plaintiff proceeded to alight from said car while it was going at a slow rate of speed, but, as he was in the act of alighting, some projection on the step of the car was caught in the hem of plaintiff's pants, whereby he was hung as he was alighting, and violently thrown to the ground, and crippled, bruised, and injured, which said injuries were more specifically set out in the petition; that the projection, the nature and character of which plaintiff had no means of knowing, and which he had not discovered, was negligently left on said step and made same unsafe for passengers, and said negligence on the part of defendant was the direct and proximate cause of the injuries received by plaintiff." The defendant answered by general denial and plea of contributory negligence. A trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $1,500. The allegations of plaintiff's petition were supported by the evidence, and the jury were warranted thereby to render a verdict for him.

The first assignment of error complains of the action of the court in overruling appellant's motion to quash the jury panel for the week. The jury for the week were drawn under Acts 30th Leg. 1907, p. 269, c. 139, known as the "Jury Wheel Law." The contention urged is that said law is unconstitutional, and therefore inoperative. This contention is not well taken. Railway Co. v. Danforth (Tex. Civ. App.) 116 S. W. 147.

The next complaint is that the court erred in the following paragraph of his charge, viz.: "If, through the negligence of defendant, there was some projection on said car on the platform or steps thereof which caught in plaintiff's pants as he was alighting therefrom and caused him to fall, and receive the alleged injuries complained model was negligent on his part in so doing." The objection to said charge is that it has the "effect of presenting to the jury the issue of negligence with reference to a projection upon the platform of defendant's car in the absence of any allegation or claim in plaintiff's petition that there was any projection upon the platform of the car or any defect in such platform." The petition alleges that "plaintiff went to the rear platform to alight from said car, * * * and, as he was in the act of alighting, some projection on the step of the car caught in the hem of plaintiff's pants," and threw him to the ground. There seems to have been no contention on the trial that any projection was on the platform as contradistinguished from the step. Some witnesses speak of appellee's going out on the platform and alighting from the car, etc.; others speak of the step of the car, etc. The step is a part of the platform, and under the evidence, which shows that he was thrown while attempting to alight, it is immaterial whether he was thrown from the platform or step, as the jury could not possibly have been misled by the charge. Nor are the facts such that the charge submits two issues, which makes it impossible to tell from the verdict upon which issue the jury found.

Complaint is made of the charge on the ground that it repeats a former portion of the charge on the right of recovery, which had the effect of singling out particular facts and impressing the jury with the importance of same. The appellee could with equal propriety urge the same objection to the charge, as the court repeated several times the issue of contributory negligence.

When the charge is considered as a whole, there was no such undue prominence given to plaintiff's side of the cause, as that it worked injury to defendant.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

RAILROADS (§ 351*)—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSING —INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to an occupant of a buggy at a crossing caused by the unnecessary noise of the engine frightening the horses, an instruction that plaintiff could not recover if the employees on the engine did not see plaintiff in his perilous position is too restricted, since it is the duty of the employees to use ordinary care to discover the position of parties who intend to cross the track and are near enough for their horses to be frightened.

ment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

V. L. Shurtleff and W. E. Spell, for appellant. Collins & Cummings and J. A. Kibler, for appellee.

RAINEY, C. J. Mrs. Boesch and companions were riding in a buggy on a street in the town of Whitney, and when they approached within 30 or 40 feet of the point where the railroad track crosses said street they saw a train approaching and stopped their horse for the train to pass. It is alleged that, when the train reached the crossing, the engineer negligently caused steam to escape from the engine, causing a loud and unusual noise, which frightened the horse and caused it to run away and injure Mrs. Boesch. The defendant plead a general denial and contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. A trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the railroad.

It seems the engine passed over the crossing, going west, and stopped, and then immediately began backing east. There is no controversy that the engine in crossing west made more noise than was customary and necessary in the operation of trains, but there was a sharp conflict whether the horse became frightened and ran from the sight and noise of the engine when it first reached the crossing going west, or when it backed east, at which time appellant's witnesses claim the engine emitted steam. Upon the question of the care devolving upon the railroad under the circumstances, the court gave a special charge requested by the railroad, as follows: "Notwithstanding you find and believe from the evidence that the engine of the defendant did emit steam and frighten the horse which was being driven by Mrs. Boesch at the time and place alleged in plaintiff's petition, yet if you further believe that the engineer in charge of said engine did not see plaintiff and her companions in the buggy south of the defendant's track at the crossing of said track on Colorado street in the town of Whitney as shown by the evidence, and that the fireman or other servant or employé of defendant on said engine at the said time and place did not discover the perilous position of plaintiff (wife) and the other occupants of the buggy in question, if you find their position was perilous, in time to have informed or advised the engineer in charge of such engine of their said position in time for such engineer by the use of the means at hand to have prevented the accident in question, then and in such event the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, and you will return a verdict for defendant." The giving of this charge is assigned as error; the contention, in effect, being that the question was not whether the engineer saw the parties in the buggy, but was it the duty of the engineer to use ordinary care to discover said parties, and not cause the engine to make an unusual and unnecessary noise?

Whether or not it is the duty of the employes of a railroad company in operating a train in approaching a crossing at a public street to anticipate the nearness thereto of parties driving or riding horses that might become frightened at the train seems not to have been directly passed upon by our Supreme Court. We understand the duty to be to use care to prevent colliding with one attempting to cross the track, and to desist from making a noise when it is discovered that a horse near the track has become frightened. The charge of the court limiting the care of the employes to whether or not they saw the parties at the time was too restricted. In our opinion the rule is that such employes, in approaching and while crossing the street, should use ordinary care to discover the position of parties who intend crossing the track and are near enough for the horses they are driving or riding to become frightened at the train. The rule here stated accords with the following authorities, viz.: Railway Co. v. Pendery, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 60, 36 S. W. 793; Railway Co. v. Bellew, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 264, 54 S. W. 1079.

We have considered all the other assignments of error and find no error therein.

of other persons, as the heirs of Matthew and Amanda Cartwright, in trespass to try title to recover 600 acres out of the northeast corner of the north half of the Isaac Powell league situated in Sabine county, Tex. The plaintiff also made the Texas Loan Agency and W. A. Polley, under whom he claims by general warranty deeds, parties defendant, and prayed judgment against them on their warranties, in the event of his failure to recover the land. All the defendants who were sued for the land disclaimed any title or interest in it except the appellee, M. C. Cartwright, who answered by a plea of not guilty. The Texas Loan Agency answered plaintiff's petition by a general demurrer, and W. A. Polley, though cited, failed to answer at all. The case was tried before a jury, and the trial resulted in a judgment against the plaintiff for M. C. Cartwright and in favor of the plaintiff against the Texas Loan Agency and W. A. Polley on their warranties. The plaintiff and the Texas Loan Agency have both appealed from the judgment.

As we shall reverse the judgment on account of an error in the charge, only so much of the evidence as may be necessary to expose the questions considered and to show the grounds upon which the judgment is reversed will be presented or discussed. Isaac Powell, the original grantee, conveyed to John Cartwright and his son, Matthew Cartwright, the north half of the Isaac Powell league, by deed dated July 4, 1838. The title of this part of the survey afterwards became vested in Robert G. Cartwright, another son of John Cartwright, and it is agreed by the parties to this action that he is the common source of title under which they both claim; the defendant M. C. Cartwright derailing his title from a deed of R. G. Cartwright, and the plaintiff claiming his under a deed from R. G. Cartwright's heirs to H. G. Damon. The deed from R. G. Cartwright, through which defendant claims, conveyed the north half of the league to the first Matthew Cartwright. This deed was dated November 22, 1845, and filed for record May 12, 1846, and, the records having been destroyed in 1875, was again filed for record on July 12, 1889, at 2 o'clock p. m. All the other heirs of Matthew C. Cartwright, the first, and his wife, Amanda, conveyed 794 acres of the Isaac Powell league, including the 600 acres in controversy, to Matthew C. Cartwright, who is the defendant in this suit, by their deed dated August 20, 1904, which was filed for record September 25, 1905. It is admitted that plaintiff was a purchaser for value. The only question is: Did H. G. Damon purchase for value in good faith and without notice or knowledge of the prior deed from Robert G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright. So much of the evidence bearing upon this question as is necessary to be considered will be stated in considering the assignments of error to which it is pertinent.

Conclusions.

1. The first assignment of the appellant La Brie, which is adopted by his coappellant, is: "The court erred in charging the jury in the fourth paragraph of its charge, as follows: 'The evidence shows that said Damon paid a valuable consideration for said land. The issues therefore to be determined by you are: Did he pay said consideration in good faith without notice of the prior deed for said land from R. G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright. In order for said Damon to have been a purchaser in good faith, it was necessary for him to exercise reasonable diligence in making inquiry as to the title he was acquiring—that is, such diligence as an ordinarily prudent man would have exercised under the same circumstances—and, if he had knowledge of facts that would have provoked inquiry on the part of an ordinarily prudent man, the law charged him with the duty of following up such inquiry with ordinary diligence, and with knowledge of all the facts which such an inquiry would have disclosed; and, if he failed to do so, he was not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, provided you further believe that, had he made such inquiry, he would have been led to actual notice of facts, which, if followed up, would have disclosed the existence of the prior deed from R. G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright.' First, because plaintiff established the fact beyond controversy that Damon had no actual knowledge of the prior deed from R. G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright, and, second, because plaintiff established the fact beyond controversy that H. G. Damon had no knowledge, actual or otherwise, of any fact or facts which would put him on inquiry, and which would have led him to actual notice of the prior deed from R. G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright."

The error insisted upon by the proposition under the assignment is, as we construe it, that the paragraph of the charge embodied in the assignment submits an issue not raised by the evidence, and that the grounds upon which the insistence is urged are: (1) That Damon had an abstract of title to the land submitted to his attorney, Kirby, which showed that at the time he purchased and paid the consideration the record title was in his vendors; (2) and that the evidence shows that at the time of his purchase he (Damon) had no knowledge of the deed from Robert G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright executed November 22, 1845, nor of any fact which would have put him upon inquiry which would have led to the discovery of said deed—that therefore he was an innocent purchaser for value.

Damon having purchased subsequent to the date of the deed from Robert G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright, the burden was upon plaintiff to show that he (Damon) was a purchaser for value, without notice of such prior conveyance. Unless the evidence upon the issue was of such probative force that no fair-minded man could reach any other conclusion from it than that he was such purchaser, it was the duty of the trial court to submit it to the jury. A "bona fide purchaser" is one who has in good faith paid a valuable consideration without notice of the adverse rights of another. In other words, he must be a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. It may be conceded that the evidence conclusively shows that Damon did not have actual notice of the prior conveyance; but, if he had knowledge of any fact or circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry which, if prosecuted with ordinary diligence, would lead to actual notice, he was charged with knowledge which might have been acquired by such diligence. In view of this principle, can it be said from the evidence, as a matter of law, that Damon had no knowledge of any fact or circumstances which would put him on notice of the prior conveyance by Robt. G. Cartwright? If not, then it was a matter of fact for the jury, and not the court to decide.

Laying aside for the present the question, to be considered under another assignment, whether S. M. Johnson in negotiating the sale was acting in the matter as Damon's agent, we will inquire whether there are any facts or circumstances shown by the evidence of which Damon had knowledge, which the jury might find were such as would have put a prudent man upon inquiry, which, if followed up with due diligence, would have led him to the knowledge of the fact of the prior conveyance under which the appellee claims the land in controversy. In pursuing this inquiry we will consider, pro hac vice, that Johnson was, as appellants claim, the agent of the heirs of Robt. G. Cartwright with a power of attorney from them to sell the land, and was acting only as their agent under the power of attorney in negotiating the sale to Damon. It is undisputed that this power was coupled with an interest in the land, entitling Johnson to one-half of the proceeds of the sale. This fact was known to Damon, for, when a deed was tendered him executed by Johnson as attorney in fact for the heirs, Damon refused to accept it, but demanded, in lieu of it, a deed from the heirs in person. He knew when the deed from the heirs, executed by them in person, in accordance with his demand, was tendered to and accepted by him, that Johnson was to receive one-half of the purchase money. Can it be said as a matter of law that this fact alone was not, in and of itself, sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry? We think not. It is a matter of common knowledge that men of common sense and ordinary business capacity, when they believe they have a good title to property, do not give away half of it, or of the proceeds of its sale to another merely in consideration of his making a sale. If, then, with a knowledge of the fact that Johnson was to recover half of the proceeds of the sale, might not the jury have found from all the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence that prudence required Damon to make further inquiry as to his vendors' title to the land, and that, if he had prosecuted the inquiry with ordinary diligence, he would have found that the ancestor of his vendors had conveyed the land to Matthew G. Cartwright, under whom appellee claims, and that consequently they had no title to convey? We think such might have reasonably been their finding.

Damon, upon the supposition that Johnson was acting solely for himself and as agent for Robert G. Cartwright's heirs, must be regarded as dealing with him at arm's length. In such event, to his mind would naturally have been suggested this inquiry: "Why is it, if Robert G. Cartwright's heirs have title to this land, Johnson is to receive one-half of the proceeds of sale for inducing me to buy it? I must inquire of them the cause of this." Upon making such inquiry of them, can it be said, in view of their testimony, as a matter of law that he would not have obtained the information, which their testimony shows, that, until Johnson came to them and asked them to make him the power of attorney, they had never claimed the land, had never paid taxes thereon, had always thought that Robert G. Cartwright had sold it, but that Johnson persuaded them to execute the power by representing that the record of deeds of the county where it lay showed that they owned the property, and that he ought to have a half interest in it for his services in finding the land for them? Following up this inquiry, he would probably have ascertained that the appellee and those under whom he claims had been assessing it as their property and paying taxes upon it from a date prior to Robert G. Cartwright's death, and by asking the appellee he would have found out that he was the owner of the land. When a fact is known, sufficient to put a subsequent purchaser upon inquiry, he cannot close his eyes to it and excuse himself from pursuing the inquiry by taking the opinion of an attorney upon an abstract of the record title. If this could be done, the rule that whatever is sufficient to put a party upon inquiry, etc., is notice, would be rendered nugatory.

Again, the evidence shows that after the deed, dated November 22, 1845, of Robert G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright, under which appellee claims, was re-recorded, Damon, notwithstanding he testified that he was a purchaser for value in good faith without notice of appellee's title, immediately offered to buy the land from the owner at $2 per acre. Why did he do this, if he had purchased in good faith without notice of appellee's title?

From this, the jury have reasonably reached the conclusion that he had notice of appellee's title when he bought from Robert G. Cartwright's heirs, else he would not have made the offer to purchase the land from the appellee. The jury did not have to believe Damon anyway, and the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction are not such as bear convincing proof that he was a bona fide purchaser without notice.

2. The second assignment of error is: "The court erred in its charge wherein it instructed the jury in words as follows: 'At the time Damon purchased said land from the heirs of R. G. Cartwright, the deed from R. G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright was not of record. Hence, if Damon had notice of such deed, you are instructed that it must have been otherwise than by the record. This could have been given to Damon in either one of three ways: (1) By actual knowledge thereof prior to the payment of the purchase price by him for the land; (2) by knowledge of any fact or facts sufficient to put an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry, which, if prosecuted with ordinary diligence, would have led to actual notice of the prior deed from R. G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright, prior to the payment by said Damon of the purchase price for said land under his said deed; (3) by the knowledge of Silas M. Johnson of the prior claim of Matthew Cartwright, and those having his title to the land in controversy, provided you believe from the evidence that said S. M. Johnson was the agent of said H. G. Damon to make said purchase for him (Damon).' First, because defendant Cartwright failed to establish the fact that Silas M. Johnson was the agent of H. G. Damon in purchasing the land in controversy. Second, because Silas M. Johnson's knowledge, if any he had, of the prior claim of Matthew Cartwright, or those having his title, was not notice to H. G. Damon, actual or otherwise, of the prior deed from R. G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright."

The first proposition advanced is: "'Prior claim' and 'prior deed' are not synonymous terms, are not idem sonans, and do not mean one and the same thing."

That the terms are not idem sonans is self-evident, and that they are not necessarily synonymous, nor mean the same thing, is apparent; but when all the evidence, as well as the agreement of the parties, shows that appellee's "prior claim" is "under a prior deed," the terms, as used in the charge of the court, are practically synonymous and are of the same meaning, or rather, the term "prior claim" is necessarily referable to appellee's "prior deed," and can mean nothing else in this case.

The second proposition is: "If Silas M. Johnson was the agent of H. G. Damon in purchasing the land in controversy, then his knowledge of a prior claim, or of the deed from Robt. G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright, could not be imputed to Damon, since it was clearly shown by the evidence in the case beyond dispute or controversy that Johnson had a personal interest in the land sold to Damon, and any knowledge acquired by him of the deed from Robt. G. Cartwright to Matthew Cartwright would have advised him of an adverse title to the title which he and the heirs of Robt. G. Cartwright were offering for sale to Damon, and, such being the case, it will be presumed that Johnson would not communicate any such knowledge to Damon, since it would be adverse and antagonistic to his own interest and the interest of the heirs of Robt. G. Cartwright, and the rule that the principal is chargeable with knowledge of all facts that come to the knowledge of his agent while acting within the scope of his agency does not apply when the agent has a personal interest in the matter which would likely lead him to conceal his knowledge from his principal."

We can see no escape for appellee from this proposition, for the doctrine that a principal is chargeable with notice known to his agent is based, not only upon the fiction of identity, but also upon the fact that it is the duty of the agent to communicate his knowledge to his principal, and the presumption that he has performed his duty. No such presumption can arise, however, where the agent is dealing with the principal in his own interest, or where for any other reason his interest is adverse to his principal, so that it is to his own interest not to communicate the knowledge to the principal. In such a case the general rule, that notice to an agent is notice to his principal does not apply. Harrington v. McFarland, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 292, 21 S. W. 116; Kauffman v. Robey, 60 Tex. 311, 48 Am. Rep. 264; Texas Loan Agency v. Taylor, 88 Tex. 47, 29 S. W. 1057; Allen v. Garrison, 92 Tex. 546, 50 S. W. 835; Cooper v. Ford, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 253, 69 S. W. 487; Clark & Skyles on Agency, § 485; Mech. Ag. § 723. It is undisputed that Johnson had a half interest in the land and received such an interest in the proceeds of the sale of the same which he effected to Damon. Therefore, even if it should be conceded that he was Damon's agent in procuring his purchase of the land from the heirs of Robert G. Cartwright, his knowledge, if any he had, of the prior deed to Matthew Cartwright or the claim of appellee to the property, or of any fact sufficient to put him on inquiry, could not, under the principle of law stated, be imputed to Damon. In this view it can make no difference upon whom was the burden of proving Johnson was Damon's agent in purchasing the land, for it relieves the case of such an issue by rendering it immaterial whether such agency existed, as in no event could Johnson's notice of the deed under which appellee claims be imputed to Damon.

3. This also disposes of the third, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh assignments, and all the propositions under them, in appellant's favor.

4. There being evidence, as we have held in considering the first assignment of error, tending to show that Damon had notice of the deed under which the appellee claims, or at least of such facts and circumstances as would put him upon inquiry, and such deed being of record when La Brie, as well as his vendor, Polley, bought the land, the plaintiff could only recover by proving that Damon was a bona fide purchaser without notice of such deed. Hence the court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury to return a verdict for La Brie. We therefore overrule the fourth assignment of error.

5. From what we have said in considering the first and fourth assignments of error, it follows that, had it not been for the error in the charge exposed by the second assignment of error, there would have been no error in the court's refusing to grant a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence.

6. The evidence, the admission of which is complained of in the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth assignments of error, was, we think, admissible, in connection with other facts and circumstances, as tending to show that Damon had notice of the prior conveyance under which appellee claims, and that the principle that declarations of a vendor, made after he has conveyed the property, cannot be introduced to disparage his title, has no application to any of the evidence referred to in these assignments.

On account of the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 193*)—REVIEW—EXCEPTION NOT PRESENTED AND RULED ON BELOW.

Where the record on a writ of error does not show that an exception to plaintiffs' petition, that it appeared from its face that the cause of action alleged was barred by limitations, was raised below, an assignment of error as to sustaining the exception cannot be considered.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 909*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where there is neither a statement of facts nor conclusions of fact in the record, it must be presumed in favor of the judgment that the evidence sustained a plea of limitations.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 194*)—EXCEPTION NOT MADE BELOW—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEA.

Where defendant pleaded that the cause of action accrued more than 13 years before commencing suit, which would cover the longest period embraced by any statute of limitation, and there was no exception on the ground that it did not specify a particular statute, the sufficiency of the plea cannot be called in question for the first time on a writ of error.

Error from District Court, Guadalupe County; M. Kennon, Judge.

Suit by Edward Schneider and others against William Schneider and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Dibrell & Mosheim, for plaintiffs in error. Seidemann & Short, for defendants in error.

NEILL, J. This suit was brought on March 3, 1908, by plaintiffs in error, as heirs of B. Schneider, deceased, against defendants in error, William Schneider and others, for a partition of the property, both real and personal, of the decedent's estate. Among others, plaintiffs' petition contains these allegations: "That the personal property belonging to the estate of the said B. Schneider consists of the sum of $800, with interest thereon from January 1, 1895, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum now in the possession of the defendant Wm. Schneider, who from said time has held, and now holds, said sum of money in trust for said estate." The defendant William Schneider answered by a special exception to the part of the petition containing said allegations, upon the ground that it appears therefrom that plaintiffs' cause of action accrued more than 13 years before this suit was instituted, and is barred by the statute of limitation. He then pleaded that plaintiffs' cause of action accrued more than 13 years before the suit was commenced, in bar of the action. It does not appear from the record that the special exception of this defendant was ever presented to or acted upon by the court. The case was tried without a jury, and, as to the $800 claimed by plaintiffs from William Schneider, its judgment is as follows: "This day came the parties by their attorneys, and then came on to be heard the defendant's William Schneider's plea of limitation to that portion of plaintiffs' petition alleging an indebtedness due the estate of B. Schneider, deceased, by said William Schneider for the sum of $800, with interest from January 1, 1895, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, being heard, it is the opinion of the court that the law is for said defendant, and that said alleged indebtedness is barred by the statute of limitation. It is therefore considered by the court that the said plea of limitation be, and the same is hereby, sustained, and that plaintiffs take nothing by their suit against William Schneider as to said $800." As this is the only part of the judgment the exception to plaintiffs' petition, that it appeared from its face that the alleged cause of action against William Schneider was barred by the statute of limitation, was presented to and ruled upon by the court, the first assignment of error, which complains of the court's sustaining such exception, cannot be considered.

2. As there is neither a statement of facts nor conclusions of fact of the trial judge in the record, it must be presumed in favor of the judgment that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the court in sustaining the defendants' plea of limitation to plaintiffs' action against William Schneider for the $800 he was sued for. If it should be conceded that plaintiffs proved such amount of money was once held for, or due by, William Schneider, as trustee, to the estate of B. Schneider, deceased, still it cannot be said, in the absence of a statement of facts, that such trust was not repudiated, and knowledge of its repudiation brought home to the plaintiffs in time to bar their action.

3. Since the defendant pleaded that plaintiffs' cause of action accrued more than 13 years before the commencement of this suit, which would cover the longest period of time embraced by any statute of limitation, and there was no exception to the plea on the ground that it did not specify any particular statute, the sufficiency of the plea cannot now, for the first time, be called in question.

There is no error in the judgment, and it is affirmed.

Stock Company and others. From a decree granting a temporary injunction, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 111 S. W. 417.

Dowell & Dowell, for appellants.

RICE, J. This is an appeal from an order granting a temporary injunction under article 2989, Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, relating to injunctions, as amended in 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 206, c. 107). On the 10th of February, 1909, the West Texas Bank & Trust Company, a private corporation, filed suit in the district court of Travis county against the 40-Acre Spring Live Stock Company, a private corporation, and also against John Dowell, Frank Heierman, Will A. Hall, and John Tom Hall, the last two composing the firm of Hall Bros., substantially alleging that about the 24th day of June, 1907, in the district court of Bexar county, it recovered judgment against John Dowell and said 40-Acre Spring Live Stock Company, for the sum of $39,035.13, with a decree foreclosing a deed of trust and vendor's lien on certain tracts of land fully described in said petition, and that thereafter it sued out an order of sale in said cause, directed to the sheriff of Travis county, commanding him to seize and sell said described tracts of land, and that in pursuance thereof said sheriff did, about the 19th of October, 1907, seize said tracts of land by virtue of said order of sale, and advertised the same for sale, and did thereafter sell two of said tracts of land, describing them, but did not sell the remaining tracts mentioned in said order of sale, for the reason that he and the plaintiff in said judgment were enjoined from further executing said writ by an injunction issued out of the district court of Travis county, in a certain suit pending therein wherein Frank Heierman was plaintiff and Geo. Matthews, sheriff, and others, were defendants. It was further alleged in said petition, upon information and belief: That the defendants had entered into an arrangement with Hall Bros, whereby they were to enter upon the remaining tracts of land, and cut and remove the timber growing thereon, and that in pursuance of said agreement they had entered upon said premises and had cut and appropriated a large portion of the timber thereon to their own use and benefit, and were continuing to cut and remove said timber from said tract of land; that its said judgment theretofore obtained in the district court of Bexar county against said 40-Acre Spring Live Stock Company and John Dowell was still unsatisfied, save and except the price-bid for said two sections of land sold, as above stated, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $640, and except as to $4,209 received from the sale of certain personal property; that both said 40-acre Spring Live Stock Company and John Dowell were insolvent; that said remaining tracts of land were insufficient to satisfy the balance of said judgment; that it was unable to state whether said Heferman or Hall Bros., or either of them, were financially able to respond in damages for said trespass upon said premises; that it had no adequate remedy at law; and that, unless restrained by order of the court, defendants would cut, dispose of, and waste said timber so as to render plaintiff's judgment of little value. Wherefore it prayed for a temporary writ of injunction restraining them from further trespassing thereon, etc. On the 11th of February, 1900, the court, upon consideration of said application, granted said temporary injunction as prayed for upon the plaintiff's filing bond, and the same was duly issued in accordance with said order. On the 20th of February the defendants gave notice of appeal from this order, filing an appeal bond, as required therefor. There was no motion to dissolve, nor was any answer filed by the defendants, and nothing whatever done by them in the court below, except to give notice of appeal, as above stated, and to thereafter file their assignments of errors.

Sections 2 and 3, p. 207, c. 107, of the Acts of the 30th Legislature, 1907, amending article 2989, tit. 56, of the Revised Civil Statutes, read as follows:

"Sec. 2. Any party or parties to any civil suit wherein a temporary injunction may be granted or dissolved under any of the provisions of this title in term time or in vacation, may appeal from the order or judgment granting or dissolving such injunction to the Court of Civil Appeals having jurisdiction of the case; provided, the transcript in such case shall be filed with the clerk of the Court of Civil Appeals not later than fifteen days after the entry of record of such order or judgment granting or dissolving such injunction.

"Sec. 3. It shall not be necessary to brief such case in the Court of Appeals or Supreme Court, and the case may be heard in said courts on the bill and answer and such affidavits and evidence as may have been admitted by the judge granting or dissolving such injunction; provided, the appellant may file a brief in the Court of Appeals or Supreme Court upon furnishing the appellee with a copy thereof not later than two days before the case is called for submission in such court, and the appellee shall have until the day the case is called for submission to answer such brief."

The questions raised by appellants' several assignments of error, in effect, amount to a general demurrer and special exceptions, by which the sufficiency of the petition for injunction is questioned. We think that the statute above quoted contemplated that some action must be taken in the court below calling in question the correctness of the proceedings before this court would be justified in undertaking to revise its action. Here there was no question raised in the trial court by the defendants, nor any ruling made which defendants seek to have reviewed, except the bare question as to the right of the court below to grant the injunction upon the petition. The errors assigned are such as, in our judgment, may be waived where no objection has been urged in the court below, as in the present instance, and must be so held; and, unless it appears that fundamental error has been committed by the court below in granting the injunction in the first instance, we are constrained to believe that we have no authority to revise the action of that court; and, believing that no such error appears in the record, its judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

KERR et al. v. BLAIR.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 21, 1900.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 622*)—RES JUDICATA—GROUNDS OF SET-OFF.

Defendant had sued plaintiffs for damages for breach of a threshing contract, in which suit plaintiffs denied the breach and pleaded facts showing that the damage, if any, was due to causes over which they had no control and to the fault of defendant. No set-off on account of goods sold or for services performed was pleaded. Defendant recovered in that suit a judgment for $500 damages, but neither the verdict nor the judgment disclosed that it was for the difference between defendant's damages and the balance due on plaintiffs' account. Held, that such judgment was not res judicata of plaintiffs' action on the account.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 720*)—RES JUDICATA—VERDICT.

That a jury improperly considered plaintiffs' account against defendant, which was not pleaded in determining the amount of defendant's damages in a prior action, did not make the verdict conclusive against plaintiffs' right to maintain a subsequent suit against defendant on the account.

3. JUDGMENT (§ 717*)—RES JUDICATA—"MATTER IN ISSUE."

The "matter in issue" in a former action as to which the judgment is res judicata is that on which plaintiffs' cause of action is based, and which defendant denies by his pleadings.

Appeal from Matagorda County Court; Jesse Matthews, Judge.

Action by John A. Kerr and another against W. L. Blair. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and rendered.

Gaines & Corbett, for appellants. Linn, Conger & Austin and W. S. Holman, for appellee.

McMEANS, J. The appellants sued the appellee for $306.53 as the balance due upon an open account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold by them to appellee and for services performed by them for him, and for 6 per cent, per annum interest thereon from January 1, 1906. The defendant answered by general denial and by plea of former adjudication, which is in the following language:

"And for further answer herein defendant says: That heretofore, to wit, on the 16th day of June, A. D. 1906, in cause No. 2,641, in the district court of Matagorda county, Tex., wherein W. L. Blair was plaintiff, and Kerr Bros., a firm composed of John A. Kerr and Andrew Kerr (the plaintiffs in this cause), were defendants, a final judgment was rendered for the plaintiff therein against the said defendants therein; that in said cause the matters herein sought to be tried and disposed of were litigated and fully and finally determined against plaintiffs herein; that in said cause, and upon the trial thereof under the pleadings of the plaintiffs herein (defendants in said cause), in said cause contained, the plaintiffs contested, tried, and proved before the jury and submitted the issue herein contained to said jury for their determination therein, and the evidence supporting the plaintiffs' cause of action herein was in said cause submitted to the jury, and the jury in said cause in their verdict thereon considered the same in connection with all the other evidence and facts and thereafter awarded verdict for the plaintiff therein, W. L. Blair; that thereafter the said verdict was duly returned into court and was by the court duly accepted, and thereafter on the said 16th day of June judgment in behalf of plaintiff for the sum of $500 was duly by the court entered on said verdict; that by the said judgment the issues in this cause were and have been once duly and finally litigated, and the said judgment was appealed by, and said appeal prosecuted by, defendants therein to the Court of Civil Appeals for the First Supreme Judicial District of Texas; that said cause and judgment was affirmed by said court aforesaid, and said judgment is now final as to the parties by the affirmance of said judgment in said court of Civil Appeals for the First Supreme Judicial District of Texas, at Galveston, Tex.; that by reason of the premises the said judgment is res adjudicata of the matters in controversy herein, and the said issues so pending herein were involved and adjudicated in said cause and in another court; and that thereby the plaintiffs herein are fully estopped and precluded from trying or enforcing any right of action herein against this defendant, if any they have, which is denied."

By his first supplemental answer, appellee further pleaded as follows: "That the cause of W. L. Blair v. J. A. Kerr et al., referred to in the first amended original answer of the defendant herein, was a suit for damages by W. L. Blair, plaintiff therein, against the defendants therein, the plaintiffs in this suit, for damages, for a breach of contract and failure to thresh the rice crop of this defendant Blair. That in said cause the defendants therein, J. A. Kerr et al., the plaintiffs in this cause, filed pleas of general denial and various special pleas in bar of plaintiffs' cause of action, which said pleadings covered and contained allegations and subject-matter sufficient in every respect to warrant the trial court and to compel the trial court to admit in evidence all such matters and things between the parties thereto as would defeat in whole or in part the plaintiff's cause of action therein and reduce the amount of the recovery as claimed by him, the plaintiff, in his said petition. That upon trial of said cause the court, in accordance with the law under the pleadings, admitted the testimony of the defendants, Kerr et al., of the value of the services rendered by them in the part performance of their contract as set out and pleaded in this cause and sued for herein, and the same was adduced before the jury by the plaintiffs herein, and the same was considered by the jury in arriving at their verdict so rendered in said cause. That not only did the plaintiffs herein (being defendants in the aforesaid cause) plead by general denial, but in addition thereto by special plea set up and alleged the partial performance of the contract to thresh this plaintiff's rice to his satisfaction, and the remaining injuries sued for were caused by wet weather and the plaintiff Blair's own negligence. Plaintiff shows that on the trial admissibility of the evidence of the value of the services of plaintiff in partially threshing Blair's rice was not only passed upon and adjudicated by the district court of Matagorda county as matter of law, but the said evidence was adduced before the jury by plaintiff herein over objection and was considered by said jury in settling the issues of said cause by their verdict."

The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict was rendered for appellee, upon which a judgment was duly entered. Appellants' motion for a new trial having been overruled, they bring this case before us on appeal.

Appellants' twelfth and thirteenth assignments of error are as follows:

"Because the court erred in rendering judgment in favor of the defendants, because the undisputed testimony showed that the plaintiffs were entitled to recovery unless the account was settled by the judgment in cause No. 2,641 in the district court of Matagorda county, Tex., styled W. L. Blair v. J. A. Kerr et al., or Kerr Bros., and because the undisputed evidence showed that cause No. 2,641 in the district court of Matagorda county, Tex., did not involve the same issues as were involved in this cause.

"Because the court erred in rendering judgment in this cause in favor of the defendant, the undisputed evidence showing that the plaintiffs' cause of action was true and correct, and that the amount due had never been paid, and the pleadings and judgment in the cause of W. L. Blair v. Kerr Bros., in the district court of Matagorda county, which were depended upon by the defendant to show a former adjudication of the issues involved in this cause, plainly show that the issues involved were not in any manner identical."

The appellee, Blair, testifying in his own behalf, admitted the account sued on to be correct in every particular, and that, unless his plea of former adjudication was sustained, he owed appellants the $306.53 sued for. He said: "I am not disputing the correctness of the account, taken as a whole, both debits and credits; but my sole contention is that this was settled by the judgment in cause No. 2,641 in the district court, styled W. L. Blair v. Kerr Bros." In support of his plea of res adjudicata, the appellee offered in evidence: (1) The original petition in cause No. 2,641 in the district court; (2) the original answer of the defendants in said cause; (3) the judgment; and (4) the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals rendered on appeal of said case. The petition of Blair in said case sets up a cause of action for damages against Kerr Bros. for breach of a contract to thresh a certain part of his rice crop, alleging his damages at $2,103.80. In their answer Kerr Bros. denied that they breached their contract, and set up facts to show that the plaintiff's damage, if he sustained any, was not due to fault upon their part, but to causes over which they had no control, and to the fault of Blair. The answer does not remotely set up, in offset to plaintiff's demand, the account herein sued upon, or otherwise make mention of it. It was in no manner put in issue, and the amount due by Blair to Kerr Bros. could not, under the pleadings in that case, have been legally adjudicated and determined. The judgment was based on a verdict in favor of Blair for $500, and does not on its face or otherwise show that the amount of the verdict and judgment was the difference between Blair's damages and the balance due on Kerr Bros.' account. The charge of the court was not introduced in evidence, but it appears from the copy of the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals which was introduced (see 105 S. W. 548) that the measure of damages submitted in the charge, in case the jury should find damages for Blair, was the value of the rice injured and destroyed as it stood in the field, etc., which reasonably precludes the idea that the jury was permitted to offset against the damage any balance in Kerr Bros.' favor against Blair. It is true that the account could have been pleaded in that case and settled by the verdict and judgment, but it is certain that it was not pleaded and thus made an issue in the case; and if, as appellee contends, and as the testimony of certain jurors who sat in the trial of that case tends to prove, the jury took the account into consideration and allowed Blair only the difference between the amount of his damages and Kerr Bros.' account, they acted without warrant of law, and their verdict would not be res adjudicata of the account sued on in this case, because the matter was not put in issue by the pleadings.

In Nichols v. Dibrell, 61 Tex. 541, the rule is broadly stated to be "that the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive not only as to the subject-matter determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated," etc. The rule is less broadly stated in the later cases, prominently among which may be mentioned: James v. James, 81 Tex. 380, 16 S. W. 1087; Norton v. Wochler, 81 Tex. Civ. App. 524, 72 S. W. 1025; Land Mortgage Co. v. Macdonell, 93 Tex. 398, 55 S. W. 737; Linberg v. Finks, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 396, 25 S. W. 789. In James v. James it is said: "It is a general rule, having its foundation in sound reason, that the former judgment or litigation relied on as having adjudicated the matter and as a bar to further proceedings should have involved and determined the same vital issue, or that such issue or question should have been fairly within the scope of the pleadings. The 'matter in issue' is that upon which the plaintiff's cause of action is based, and which the defendant denies by his pleadings. Vaughan v. Morrison, 55 N. H. 582. It can only be conclusive of such matters as was essential to be determined before the judgment could be rendered" (Phillipowski v. Spencer, 63 Tex. 607), and is not conclusive as to collateral issues or any matter which must be inferred from it." See, also, Crebbin v. Bryce, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 532, 60 S. W. 587.

The conclusions we have reached obviate the necessity of passing upon the other as-rence to appellants' suit, and as no other defenses to plaintiffs' suit were urged, and as the correctness of the account sued on was admitted, the court should have instructed a verdict for the plaintiffs.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and, this court proceeding to render such judgment as should have been rendered by the court below, it is ordered that judgment be here rendered in favor of appellants and against appellee for the sum of $306.53, with 6 per cent. per annum interest thereon from January 1, 1906, and all costs incurred in the court below as well as in this court.

Reversed and rendered.

HERMANN v. ALLEN.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 9, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 6, 1909.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 261*)—WRONGFUL INJUNCTION—MEASURE OF LIABILITY.

Where defendant, by injunction, withheld from plaintiff a building which defendant knew plaintiff could have rented for $100 to $350 a year had he been permitted to remove it, and interest at 6 per cent. on the value of the building would not have exceeded $21, plaintiff's measure of damages by reason of such wrongful injunction was the rental value of the building, and not the interest on its value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 609; Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 261*)—WRONGFUL INJUNCTION—DAMAGES—WITHHOLDING PREMISES.

Where defendant wrongfully refused to permit plaintiff to remove a house which plaintiff was entitled to, and later obtained an injunction restraining such removal, plaintiff, on the injunction being dissolved, was entitled to recover damages from the date of defendant's refusal and not from the date of the writ; his right not being impaired by his attempt to remove the building without defendant's consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 664*)—RES JUDICATA—ISSUES DETERMINED—REVERSAL ON APPEAL.

Plaintiff sued defendant to restrain his removal of a house from certain land belonging to defendant, in which action defendant pleaded both his right to remove and his damages by the alleged wrongful injunction, which he sought to recover. A judgment was rendered perpetuating the injunction without passing on the question as to whether defendant had sustained damages. On appeal the judgment was reversed, the court holding that defendant was entitled to the possession of the house and that the injunction was improvidently issued; the only question presented being defendant's right to possession. Held, that the reversal destroyed the effect of the judgment as res judicata of defendant's claim for damages, nor was the judgment on appeal conclusive of that question which was not considered.

the parties, and it did not appear that the determination of the appeal was delayed thereby, the judgment perpetuating the injunction having been reversed, defendant in a subsequent suit for wrongful injunction was not thereby deprived of the right to recover damages for the detention of the property withheld by the injunction prior to the final judgment on the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—PROPOSITIONS.

Assignments of error which are not propositions in themselves, and are not submitted as propositions nor followed by propositions and statements, will not be reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3000; Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

6. JUDGMENT (§ 720*)—RES JUDICATA—ISSUES.

The controlling issue in an injunction suit was whether defendant had notice of a contract under which a building in controversy was placed on plaintiff's premises. That action was to restrain defendant, who had purchased the building, from removing it, and required a determination of the issue of notice in order to authorize a judgment for defendant which was returned. Held, that the question of damages for defendant's failure to make certain repairs on plaintiff's property adjoining the building removed, as required by such contract having been necessarily determined in the injunction suit, the judgment therein was res judicata thereof.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUEST FOR PROMPT VERDICT.

A verbal request by the judge after delivering his charge that the jury bring in a verdict as speedily as possible, but that they should not in any degree hasten their deliberations, was not objectionable, there being no intimation that the verdict was returned in undue haste, or that the case was not fully considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

8. NEW TRIAL (§ 103*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

Where, in an injunction suit to restrain the removal of a building, it was immaterial whether any evidence was offered by defendant on his claim for damages for the detention of his building by plaintiff in a subsequent suit by the original defendant for wrongful injunction, newly discovered evidence consisting of the statement of a stenographer who took down the testimony in the injunction suit that defendant therein testified as to the rental value of the building was not ground for a new trial.

of injunction was issued and was decided in the lower court in favor of the plaintiff therein, the appellant in this suit, but, upon appeal to this court, the judgment of the lower court was reversed and judgment rendered in favor of the appellant, the appellee herein. Allen v. Houston Ice & Brewing Company et al., 44 Tex. Civ. App. 125, 97 S. W. 1063.) The Houston Ice & Brewing Company and A. C. Binz and C. E. Settegast were made defendants in the original petition, but plaintiff dismissed his suit as to them. The petition alleges, in substance, that on the 19th day of April, 1905, plaintiff was the owner of a store building in the city of Houston situated on land belonging to appellant, and had the right to remove said building from said premises; that he made demand upon appellant for the possession of the building, which was refused, and, upon his attempting to remove same, appellant procured the issuance of a writ of injunction, and thereby prevented him from removing said building and kept same in appellant's possession from the 19th day of April, 1905, to the 20th day of February, 1907; that said writ of injunction was wrongfully and illegally sued out by appellant, and that the plaintiff was damaged thereby in the sum of $550, the rental value of the building for the time it was so wrongfully withheld from him by appellant; that while said building was so wrongfully held by defendant he destroyed or permitted the destruction of shelving and counters therein belonging to plaintiff and of the value of $74, a porch and gallery of the value of $8.50, and sashes and window panes of the value of $1.20; that by reason of said injunction plaintiff lost the use during the time aforesaid of certain tools and appliances with which he was preparing to remove the building at the time the injunction was served upon him; and that the reasonable rental value of same for the time they were so withheld from him was the sum $882. He also claimed damages for loss of wages paid his sons and other hired hands for assisting him in the work of removing said building, all of which work had to be performed the second time, and was therefore lost to plaintiff, as a result of the issuance and service upon him of said writ of injunction; the amount so claimed being itemized as follows: Wages of son Mac (10 days at $2 per day), $20; wages of son Vernon (10 days at $3 per day), $30; hire of other men, $17. Recovery was asked for the full amount of the damages above set out.

The defendants' answer contains a general demurrer, special exceptions, and general denial, and special pleas of res adjudicata and in reconvention for damages caused defendants' property by plaintiff in the removal of said building. The plea of res adjudicata plaintiff against defendants in this cause. In cause No. 36,498 the Houston Ice & Brewing Company et al. v. Lorenzo W. Allen et al., mentioned in plaintiff's petition, on pages 4 and 5 of the answer filed by the defendant L. W. Allen in that case, who is plaintiff in this cause, said L. W. Allen alleged and pleaded as follows: 'Defendant further represents that, by reason of his being enjoined from moving said building, he has been compelled to keep idle subject to the termination of this action one team with wagon and driver, at an expense of $4.50 per day, one carpenter, at an expense of $2 per day, four pair trucks, cribbing and other moving appliances, at an expense of $6 per day, and has lost his own time, reasonably worth $2.50 per day, all for the term of 60 days, to his damage in the sum of $900, for which he prays judgment against plaintiffs and their bondsmen on their injunction bond; that he has also been deprived of the use of his said building for the term of two months, to his reasonable damage in the sum of $50, for which he also prays judgment. This defendant here now makes offer to do all equity in the premises that to this honorable court may seem meet and proper, and to fully conform to the orders of this court. Wherefore, premises considered, this defendant prays that it will dissolve said temporary writ of injunction heretofore granted herein, and that he may recover of plaintiffs his damages aforesaid, together with all costs, and defendant further prays, but in the alternative only, that, in the event said injunction is perpetuated, it will be conditioned upon the plaintiffs' paying to this defendant the amount secured by his mechanic's lien upon said building, together with his costs of foreclosing the same, and defendant prays for all such other and further relief to which he may be entitled.' On the trial of said cause No. 36,498, the Houston Ice & Brewing Company et al. v. L. W. Allen et al., in the district court of Harris county, Tex., the defendant L. W. Allen introduced evidence to sustain his said allegations as above quoted, and the plaintiffs introduced evidence in rebuttal thereto. The trial court in the final judgment rendered in said cause considered said evidence, and refused to allow the defendant L. W. Allen the damages prayed for by him in his pleading above quoted. In the judgment reversing and rendering the cause entered by the Court of Appeals, said court last above named affirmed the decision of the lower court in its finding as to defendant Allen's plea for damages. Wherefore, these defendants say that plaintiff ought not to have and maintain this action against the defendants, and these defendants therefore pray that they go hence without day, and have judgment against plaintiff for their costs." The plea in retioned obligating himself, is permitted to remove the building to repair any damage to defendants' property caused thereby, and was so obligated by the terms of the contract under which the building was placed upon defendants' property. The damages claimed by this plea are itemized and aggregate the sum of $200. The trial in the court below by a jury resulted in the following verdict, in accordance with which judgment was rendered against appellant:

"We, the jury, find each separate item as directed by the court as follows:

"We, the jury, find for plaintiff as per item above, $430.70.

"[Signed] Fred Burke, Foreman."

The evidence shows that plaintiff on the 19th day of April, 1905, became the owner of a building situated on premises in the city of Houston belonging to the defendant. After his purchase of the building, he demanded of defendant the possession of same in order that he might remove it to premises owned by him. Defendant refused to give him possession of the building, claiming the right to hold same as security for the payment of ground rents due him by plaintiff's predecessor in title under the contract by which the building had been placed on defendant's premises. In August, 1905, plaintiff, without the consent of defendant, entered upon the premises, took possession of the building, and began preparing it for removal to his own premises a few blocks distant. While engaged in this undertaking, he was on August 5, 1905, restrained from removing the building by writ of injunction obtained by defendant in an injunction suit brought by him in the district court of Harris county. Upon the trial of this suit, judgment was rendered in the lower court perpetuating the injunction, but upon appeal to this court that judgment was reversed on October 25, 1906, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff herein dissolving the injunction, and decreeing that plaintiff in said suit take nothing thereby. An application for writ of error prosecuted by the defendant from this judgment was refused by the Supreme Court. The mandate from this court in said injunction suit was returned to the district court of Harris county on February 8, 1906. In the answer filed by plain-building, he has been compelled to keep idle, subject to the termination of this action, one team, with wagon and driver, at an expense of $4.50 per day, one carpenter, at an expense of $2 per day, four pair trucks, cribbing, and other moving appliances, at an expense of $6 per day, and has lost his own time, reasonably worth $2.50 per day, all for the term of 60 days, to his damage in the sum of $900, for which he prays judgment against plaintiffs and their bondsmen on their injunction bond; that he has also been deprived of the use of his said building for the term of two months, to his reasonable damage in the sum of $50, for which he also prays judgment." Upon the trial of said cause in the district court no evidence was offered in support of this plea. In that suit, as before shown, the lower court perpetuated the injunction, and upon the appeal to this court the only issue presented and passed upon was whether the injunction was properly granted. After the record in the injunction suit had been filed in this court, a motion was filed by the appellant to have the submission of the appeal postponed until the fall term, 1906, of this court. This motion was agreed to by appellee's counsel. The case was decided in this court on October 25, 1906. There is no evidence that the granting of this motion in any way delayed the submission of said appeal; it not being shown that it would have been reached for submission in regular order before that date. The evidence sustains the verdict of the jury as to the amounts of the several items of damages found.

The first assignment of error complains of the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury that the measure of plaintiff's damages for loss of the use of his building during the time it was withheld from him by defendant was 6 per cent. interest upon the value of the building. This charge was properly refused. It is well settled that the ordinary rule for the measure of damages for conversion of property is its value and legal interest thereon from the date of its conversion, and under this rule, where the property is returned, the measure of damage for its detention would be interest on its value. It is, however, equally well settled that this rule should not be applied in all cases. The purpose in fixing the amount of damages being primarily to award compensation for the injury, it necessarily follows that the rule by which damages are to be measured depends largely upon the facts of the particular case, and, in cases of conversion, it has been often held that the value of the use of the property should be allowed as compensation for its detention. Endel v. Norris, 15 Tex. Civ. App.

142, 39 S. W. 606; Hudson v. Wilkinson, 45 Tex. 453; Oraddock v. Goodman, 54 Tex. 588; Waller v. Hall (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 82. The application of the ordinary rule of interest on the value of the property would give plaintiff in this case no adequate compensation. The evidence shows that he could have rented his house, if he had been allowed to remove it by appellant, for from $100 to $350 per year, and that 6 per cent. interest on the value of the house would not exceed $21 per year. Appellant had actual notice of the fact that appellee intended to rent the house if he was permitted to remove it, and was charged with notice of its reasonable rental value, and it would be manifestly unjust to hold that, notwithstanding he had knowingly caused plaintiff to suffer this loss, he should only be required to pay as compensation therefor the inadequate amount of 6 per cent. interest on the value of the house.

The second assignment complains of the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that plaintiff's claim for damages accruing prior to the issuance of the writ of injunction could not be allowed. There was no error in refusing this instruction. The conversion of the house by defendant occurred when he refused to permit plaintiff to remove it, and plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for its detention from that date, and this right was not lost or impaired by his attempt to remove the building without defendant's consent.

Under his third assignment, appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give a special charge requested by him limiting plaintiff's right to recover damages sustained by him to such damages as occurred after November 11, 1905, the date of the judgment in the district court in the injunction suit. The proposition advanced under this assignment is that under the pleadings in the injunction suit plaintiff herein might have recovered all damages which had been caused him up to the trial of said suit by the wrongful detention of his property by the defendant, and, no damages having been awarded him by the judgment of the district or of this court in said suit, his claim for same is res adjudicata. The question presented by this assignment is not free from doubt, but we have reached the conclusion the defendant's plea of res adjudicata was not sustained by the evidence. The general rule is that a judgment as between the parties to the cause in which it is rendered is res adjudicata of all issues determined by said judgment, or that might have been determined under the pleadings in the cause in which the judgment was rendered. Of course, the judgment of the district court perpetuating the injunction, had it remained in force and effect, would have been conclusive of plaintiff's right to recover damages for the detention of his property, regardless of whether such damages had been claimed in his answer in that suit, because his right to damages depended wholly upon his right to the possession of the property. The trial court having found in that suit that plaintiff was not entitled to the possession of the property, it became unnecessary to pass upon the question of whether he had sustained damages by reason of its detention by defendant, and the record in that case shows that that question was not determined. Upon appeal to this court, the only question presented was plaintiff's right to the possession of the property, and, while the case might have been remanded for trial upon the issue of damages, no such request was made in this court by either party, and judgment was here rendered upon the sole issue of plaintiff's right to the possession of the property. We think the case of Watkins v. Junker, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 629, 23 S. W. 802, determines the question presented by this assignment adversely to appellant's contention. The judgment of this court reversing the judgment of the court below destroyed the effect of that judgment as res adjudicata of plaintiff's claim for damages, and we do not think our judgment on said appeal was res adjudicata of that claim because it was not passed upon in considering said appeal, as affirmatively appears from our judgment, and upon the case presented in this court by the assignments of error and briefs of the parties it could not have been passed upon.

There is no merit in the fourth assignment of error, which complains of the refusal of the court to give a special instruction requested by appellant instructing the jury not to allow plaintiff any damages for detention of his property prior to the final judgment in this court on the appeal in the injunction suit. This assignment is predicated upon the contention that by the motion to postpone the submission of the appeal in the injunction suit plaintiff was responsible for delay in determining his right to the possession of the property, and for the delay thus caused defendant could not be held liable for damages for such detention. The contention is wholly without merit for two reasons: First, because, if any delay was caused by the motion to postpone the submission of the appeal, said motion having been agreed to by the defendant, any delay in the determination of the case caused thereby could not be charged solely or primarily to the plaintiff, and there is nothing in the agreement to indicate that either party thereto intended that the motion should have any effect upon the rights of the parties in the subject-matter of the suit; and, second, because there is nothing in the record to indicate that the granting of this motion delayed in the least the determination of the appeal in said case.

The fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth assignments, which complain of errors in the charge of the court, are without merit, and are overruled without discussion.

The ninth and twelfth assignments are not followed by propositions and statements as required by the rules, and for that reason cannot be sustained.

What we have before said in discussing the fourth assignment disposes of the questions presented by the thirteenth and fourteenth assignments, and they are overruled.

The fifteenth assignment is not a proposition in itself, and is not submitted as one, and no proposition is submitted thereunder as required by the rules, and for this reason it should not be sustained.

The sixteenth assignment complains of the ruling of the trial court in sustaining objections of plaintiff to an estimate made by H. N. Jageman, a carpenter, of the costs of certain repairs upon appellant's property adjoining the building removed by appellee. In answer to appellant's claim for damages caused by the removal of said building, appellee pleaded the judgment in the injunction suit as res adjudicata of such claim. In the contract under which the building was placed upon appellant's property by appellee's predecessor in title, it was expressly stipulated that, when the owner of the building should remove same, he would be required to repair any damage to appellant's property caused by such removal. The controlling fact issue in the injunction suit was whether appellee herein had notice of this contract at the time he purchased said building, and the decision in that case necessarily required the determination of that issue in favor of appellee. The question of damages for failure on the part of appellee to comply with the provision of that contract having been determined in said injunction suit, it follows that, in so far as the offered evidence tended to establish appellant's claim for such damage, appellee's objection thereto on the ground that the claim thereby sought to be established was res adjudicata was properly sustained.

The question raised by the seventeenth assignment has been disposed of by what we have before said in discussing the first assignment.

There is no merit in the eighteenth assignment, which complains of the action of the court in verbally requesting the jury, after delivering his charge, to "bring in a verdict as speedily as possible consistent with their duties." The trial judge qualifies the bill of exception taken to his action in making this request by the following statement: "This bill is signed with the explanation that there were many cases pressing for trial, and I am always desirous of avoiding, if possible, the necessity of summoning talesmen. I said to the jury that I would be glad if they would arrive at a conclusion as soon as was consistent with careful deliberation, but that they should not in any degree hasten their deliberations in order to return quickly, but carefully discuss all the facts. As the jury was out several hours, I hardly think the suggestion worked any injury." We do not think it at all probable that this request by the court could have injuriously affected any right of the appellant, there being no intimation in the record that the verdict was returned in undue haste, or that the case was not fully and carefully considered by the jury before they agreed upon the verdict.

The nineteenth assignment is without merit, and is overruled without discussion.

The twentieth assignment cannot be sustained. If the motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence was sufficient in other respects, the alleged evidence set out in the motion was not material, and for that reason, if for no other, the court did not err in overruling the motion. Under our views upon the question of res adjudicata, as expressed in discussing the third assignment of error, it was immaterial whether any evidence was offered by plaintiff herein in the injunction suit on his claim for damages for the detention of his building by the defendant. The newly discovered evidence for which the new trial was asked was the statement of the stenographer who took down the testimony upon the trial of the injunction suit that plaintiff testified in that suit as to the rental value of his building. As before said, we do not think this evidence was material.

There is no error presented by the record which requires a reversal of the judgment of the court below, and it has therefore been affirmed.

Affirmed.

ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RY. CO. et al.
v. PATTON.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 3, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT.

Where there was evidence contrary to an allegation that plaintiff's automobile had been totally destroyed in transportation over the lines of connecting carriers, a charge assuming that such allegation had been proved beyond controversy was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 180*)—CONNECTING CARRIERS—LIMITED LIABILITY.

Where each of several connecting carriers participating in the transportation of an automobile had legally restricted its liability to damage done on its own line, a charge that two of the carriers had contracted to transport the machine to destination, and were liable for failure to deliver it there in good order, was erroneous.

3. CARRIERS (§ 193*)—CONNECTING CARRIERS—INJURY TO GOODS—DEMURRAGE.

Appeal from Jack County Court; Sil Stark, Judge.

Action by C. W. Patton against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants other than the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company appeal. Reversed and remanded.

E. B. Perkins, Daniel Upthegrove, Spoons, Thompson & Barwise, and R. M. Rowland, for appellants. Nicholson & Fitzgerald, for appellee.

DUNKLIN, J. The St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company and the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas have appealed from a judgment rendered against them by the county court of Jack county in favor of C. W. Patton for $337.50 as damages to an automobile. The machine was shipped from Cleveland, Ohio, and consigned to plaintiff Patton at Jacksboro, Tex. The Vandalla Railway Company and the Pennsylvania Railway Company carried it to East St. Louis, Ill., from whence it was shipped to Texarkana by the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company, which for convenience will be called the "Foreign Cotton Belt Company." The St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas, hereinafter designated the "Texas Cotton Belt Company," transported it from Texarkana to Ft. Worth, Tex., and at the station last named tendered it to the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company, hereinafter called "Rock Island Company," for shipment from Ft. Worth to Jacksboro, but the machine was then in a damaged condition, and by reason thereof the last-named company refused to accept it, unless the Texas Cotton Belt Company would prepay or guarantee $88.50 freight charges on the machine from Cleveland to Jacksboro. This demand was refused, and the machine was left in Ft. Worth in possession of the Texas Cotton Belt Company. All the railway companies above mentioned were made parties defendant in plaintiff's petition. The verdict of the jury was in favor of the Rock Island Company, and also in favor of the two Cotton Belt Companies on their pleas over against the Vandalla and Pennsylvania Railway Companies for $314.50. The trial court instructed the jury that, if they should find a verdict against the two Cotton Belt Companies, the measure of plaintiff's damages which should be allowed against these defendants would be the reasonable value of the automobile at Jacksboro, Tex., in the condition it should have arrived at Jacksboro, less the legal freight charges on the shipment. This charge assumed, as a fact proven beyond controversy, that the damage to the machine while in transit over those two railways had totally destroyed its value as alleged in plaintiff's pleadings; but, as evidence was introduced to the effect that such contention was untrue, the charge was error which will require a reversal of the judgment. In the charge the jury were told, in effect, that if they believed that the machine was shipped from Cleveland, and consigned to plaintiff at Jacksboro, and if the Texas Cotton Belt refused to prepay or guarantee to the Rock Island $88.50 freight charges, and refused to deliver the machine to plaintiff at Jacksboro, and if the automobile was in a damaged condition at the time it was tendered to the Rock Island, then the two Cotton Belt Companies would be liable. Appellants complain that such instruction was substantially a charge that the two Cotton Belt Companies had each agreed to ship the machine to Jacksboro, and owed the duty so to do. From this charge it would seem that such was the theory of law adopted by the trial court; and, in view of another trial, we deem it proper to suggest that it is incorrect. The undisputed evidence shows that by contract each company handling the machine limited its liability to damage done on its own line. To so contract was a legal right to each company, and none of the companies was under any legal duty to prepay or guarantee the entire freight charges on the machine. The Texas Cotton Belt Company claimed demurrage charges on the machine, and this claim should have been submitted to the jury, but the court failed to submit it.

For the errors indicated above, the judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Where it was practically undisputed that plaintiff, an aged woman with weak eyesight, was injured while alighting from defendant's train because of defendant's negligence in failing to provide a stepstool to break the distance from the last step to the ground, which was from 18 to 30 inches, and that plaintiff while stepping from the car was thrown to the ground and injured because of the long step, defendant was not prejudiced by the denial of a continuance for the absence of a witness, who would have testified that plaintiff did not "slip and tumble or fall" from the car or its steps to the ground, but just went down "as she stepped off."

6. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—INSTRUCTION—FUTURE SUFFERING.

An instruction that the jury could award plaintiff damages for future suffering only in case they found from the evidence that plaintiff would continue to suffer in the future from such injuries, and then award such sum as the jury might believe would fairly compensate plaintiff for such suffering as "she would undergo in the future," was too favorable to defendant in the use of the words "she would undergo," instead of "as she would reasonably and probably undergo."

Appeal from District Court, Palo Pinto County; W. J. Oxford, Judge.

Action by Sallie White against the Weatherford, Mineral Wells & Northwestern Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

By her petition the appellee sought to recover damages for personal injuries received while a passenger disembarking from the passenger train of the appellant, claimed to have been occasioned to her by the negligent failure of the appellant to furnish and provide a stepstool for her assistance, and in failing to render her personal assistance in her descent from the bottom step of the car to the platform, a distance of about 30 inches, at the station of her destination; she being an old and feeble lady and of weak eyesight, which fact was known to the employees of appellant in charge of the train at the time. The appellant answered by general denial and contributory negligence. The case was tried to a jury, and in accordance with their verdict a judgment was rendered in favor of the appellee.

Without setting out the evidence in detail, substantially it shows that the appellee, a woman 70 years old and with weak eyesight, was a passenger on the appellant's passenger train for her home at Mineral Wells, Tex. When the train stopped at its regular station at Mineral Wells, the passengers thereon proceeded to alight from its several coaches; the conductor assisting the passengers to alight at one coach, and the porter at another coach. The coach the appellee was riding in was a vestibule coach, and occupied the third place from the front of the train. When the train stopped the appellee followed a part of the crowd of passengers in front of her to the rear end of the car she was riding in; a fellow passenger carrying her grip. The rear door of the vestibule car she was riding in was open, and she, on reaching its platform, proceeded to alight from the same. The porter of the train was standing in about six or eight feet of the platform appellee was then on and at the steps of the next car behind the car she was alighting from, and the porter saw her alighting. After reaching the bottom step of the platform of the car, the appellee proceeded to make the descent therefrom to the platform of the station, which was the ground, prepared and used by the appellant as the place for its passengers to alight. In making the descent from the bottom step of the car to the ground, and by reason of the distance of this step of the car to the ground, which was not known or appreciated by the appellee at the time, and there being no stepstool, she was overbalanced, and as her foot reached the ground it careened under the weight of her body and threw her forward to the ground. All the evidence agrees with the testimony of the conductor and porter that "there was no footstool at the place she fell," and that no employé was there to or did assist her in alighting from the car. By her fall to the ground, and as a result thereof, appellee suffered serious injury to her hip and leg. The jury found on these facts in favor of the appellee, and we think the evidence sufficient to sustain their verdict and to warrant the finding which we make, that appellant was guilty of negligence toward the appellee, as claimed of damages allowed her, except as to the medical and medicine bills claimed in the petition.

H. C. Shropshire, for appellants. E. H. Bennett, Albert Stevenson, E. B. Ritchie, and J. T. Jones, for appellee.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). By the first assignment of error, it is contended that the court erred in overruling the first application for continuance for the term for the want of the evidence of the three witnesses named. It appears from the record that the three witnesses who had been subpoenaed to attend and testify for the appellant, and for whose absence at the time the first application for continuance was made, appeared in the courtroom by process of the court before the trial had ended and before the plaintiff and the defendant had finished introducing their evidence. Two of the witnesses testified in the case after making their appearance. The appearance of the witnesses before the closing of the hearing of evidence operated, we think, to relieve any error in overruling the said application for continuance for the term, because no injury could be held to have resulted from the particular ruling. The second application made in the case for continuance for the term, the overruling of which is complained of in the second assignment of error, was an equitable application addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court; and unless it could be held in the light of the entire record that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, erred to the injury of appellant's right, this court could not reverse the judgment of the trial court. The second application for continuance for the term was made during the trial of the case for the want of the evidence of the witness Mabry, who, it is alleged, after appearing as a witness in the case, and during the trial of the case, and without the knowledge and consent of appellant, who had him subpoenaed as a witness, got on the train and left, without testifying, for Colorado, Tex. The application states what the witness would testify to in the case. On the motion of appellant for a new trial, appellant contended that the overruling of the second application was error, and the appellee contested the same and attached the affidavit of said witness as to his testimony, which reads, after omitting formal parts: "That on the 9th day of June, 1907, he came into Mineral Wells on the noon train from Weatherford, on which Miss Sallie White, the plaintiff was a passenger. That affiant got off of the east platform of the coach that Miss Sallie is supposed to have fallen from, though affiant did not see her fall, but after affiant had gotten off he heard an exclaima-ground, rather, on one leg, and some persons were trying to lift her up, and this was the first he saw of her and all that he saw, except she was carried into the depot. Affiant did not see her fall, and does not know how she came to fall." In reply to the contest, the appellant attached a letter written by the witness to the superintendent of appellant, of date January 2, 1908, which reads: "In reply to your letter to me under date of December 27th regarding an accident resulting in personal injury to Miss Sallie White on or about May 11, 1907, I wish to say that I was standing on the platform when the train pulled in, and noticed a number of trainmen assisting passengers in alighting from a number of coaches, at least three or more. I also noticed one quite elderly lady get off a coach where there was no one to assist her. This party, after alighting on the platform and standing perfectly still for several seconds, and as she was about to step forward, seemed to collapse and sank to the ground. I am quite positive that she did not fall down immediately upon putting her feet on the platform. I hurried to where the lady was on the ground, and assisted her to arise. Other than this I know nothing." For the purpose of the assignment of error presented, it may be assumed that the witness would testify as stated in the application for continuance.

The legal contention that could arise in regard to the ruling of the court on the second application is that the appellant was, without fault or negligence on its part, deprived of material evidence in defense of the case. Could it be said that any injury resulted to appellant because of the absence of the testimony of the witness? To discharge the duty that appellant owed appellee, its passenger, in this case, it was incumbent upon it to exercise a high degree of care for her safety in disembarking from the car. The practically undisputed evidence warrants the conclusion that this duty was not discharged. Appellant's conductor and porter and all the witnesses agree that there was a considerable distance intervening between the station platform and the bottom step of the car, and that there was no stepstool there to assist her in alighting. The precise distance from the step to the platform is in conflict as to whether it was 18 inches or 30 inches. That appellee, in making the descent unassisted from the bottom step of the car to the platform, and because of the long step to be taken by her, was thrown to the ground, is made positive and clear. That injury was occasioned to her by the fall on the ground cannot be questioned from the evidence in the record. The rear door and the vestibule of the coach she was riding in were open, and she followed passengers in her car going have provided against the same by informing her, or by having the vestibule doors closed. The platform of the car being the place to alight from, and the door of the same, as well as the vestibule, being opened, was, in the absence of notice to her, an invitation to alight therefrom at that place, and was a place that the appellant could reasonably have known passengers would alight from. In this light of the record, the evidence of the absent witness must be considered. It would appear that the witness would testify, as set out in the application: "That, at the time the accident to plaintiff is alleged to have occurred he, the said witness, was standing on the platform of the defendant's depot at Mineral Wells and saw plaintiff alight from the train; (1) that plaintiff did not slip and stumble or fall from the bottom step of the car to the ground, (2) or from any of the steps of said car to the ground, or (3) from said train to the ground, in any manner whatever." Appellee did not claim in her evidence that she did "slip and stumble or fall" from the step of the car as she was going down the steps of the car. She testified: "There was no footstool at the alighting place, and no employé there to assist me down. I cannot say that I stepped off of the steps. I fell off. When I discovered there was no footstool, and the crowd moved, I tried to descend myself and threw my hand around and tried to hold on, and my body broke loose, and I went down on my knee under me. From the lower step of the car to the ground I think was from 2½ to 3 feet." This evidence is made clearer on her cross-examination by appellant, when she says: "I made my step on the last step and seen there was no stool and went too far, overbalanced, to catch myself, and swung around. I didn't stumble or fall as I went down to the steps. I was overbalanced." It is evident that the appellee's only claim in the evidence was that, because of the intervening distance between the step of the car and the platform of the station, and in making the long step to reach the platform, she was overbalanced, and because thereof fell to the ground. The conductor said: "I didn't see her as she stepped on the ground. A lady took hold of her arm, and I went up and asked her what the trouble was. And I asked her how she fell, and she said she stepped out on the ground and her leg gave way and struck her knee on the ground."

The porter of the train said: "I was probably six or eight feet east of the steps of the car and in front of the chair car. I saw the lady in the act of going down to the ground. I was helping passengers off when I saw the lady fall." The witness Denton said: "When I first saw the lady, she was standing on the platform on the east side of the car. She down as she stepped on." As the appellee made no such claim as to the cause of her injury as outlined in the application, the evidence of the absent witness would not have affected the result of the case or have been material to any issue. The further portion of the evidence of the absent witness as claimed by appellant was "that plaintiff alighted from the train in safety and without injury therefrom, and after alighting from the train in safety and standing upon the platform perfectly still for several seconds, and as she was about to step forward, seemed to collapse and sank to the ground, and was afterwards assisted to arise by the witness and others, and that her injuries, if any, were not caused by any slipping, stumbling, or falling from the train in any manner." That appellee did fall on the ground was conclusively shown, and all the witnesses agree to that fact. If she was injured by the fall to the ground as the evidence shows, and the injury was due to the negligence of the appellant, as the evidence conclusively shows, then it could not reasonably be ruled that reversible error was committed in this case in overruling an application for the want of evidence going to show that after making the long step to the platform the appellee, on reaching the platform, stood "perfectly still for several seconds, and as she was about to step forward seemed to collapse and sank to the ground, and was assisted to arise."

By the third assignment of error, it is contended that the court erred in the admission of certain evidence. While it is the proper and correct practice for the witness to state the facts and let the jury draw the proper deductions arising therefrom, it could not be held, we think, in this case, under the evidence, that the question and answer complained of constitute reversible error. The answer of the witness was not a bare conclusion or belief not founded on facts or observed data, but was founded upon personally observed data. All the physicians agreed in their evidence that the appellee's left leg had become an inch shorter than the right. One of the physicians testifying for the appellee said, "I think she will remain more or less crippled as long as she lives," and on cross-examination by the appellant said, "I do not think she will ever recover entirely." The two other physicians do not say that the injury was not permanent. That her left leg was shorter than the other, and had become so from the injury, was a fact within her knowledge, and was an apparent and external injury. When she answered that she believed the injury was for life, she but stated a fact known as well to laymen as to experts. If a finger or hand is cut off, a layman could as well know that it would not grow back

The appellee having filed a remittitur for the amount claimed in the petition for medical attention and medicine, the error in this respect contended for in the fourth and fifth assignments is relieved. A remittitur is a complete answer to the error. Insurance Co. v. Herbert (Tex. Civ. App.) 106 S. W. 421. The remaining contention in the fourth assignment, as to the court's charge, cannot be sustained, as it is favorable to appellant. Before the jury could award appellee damages for future suffering, the jury were required by the charge to find "from the evidence that the plaintiff will continue to suffer in the future from such injuries," and then to award "such a sum of money paid now as you may further believe from the evidence will fairly compensate the plaintiff for such suffering as you find from the evidence she will undergo in the future." Appellee, and not the appellant, could complain that the charge was burdensome in requiring a finding of the suffering to be such as "she will undergo," instead of "as she will reasonably and probably undergo" in the future.

The charge, in defining and restricting "utmost care" to be "such a degree of care as would be exercised by a very careful, prudent, and competent person under the same or similar circumstances," placed upon the term used the proper limitation, and, as thus qualified and restricted, the instruction was not error.

The main charge of the court fairly and affirmatively submitted the issue to the jury admitting of a finding for the appellant on the issue of negligence if it had not been guilty of negligence, and the seventh assignment is overruled. The court charged as a corollary of a finding for appellee, "if you do not so find and believe from the evidence, your verdict will be for the defendant."

The eighth and ninth assignments are overruled. There is evidence to sustain a finding of negligence and to support the amount of the verdict.

The case was ordered affirmed; but, as there was error which required a remittitur to cure, the costs of this appeal will be, and are, here taxed against the appellee.

UNKNOWN OWNER v. STATE.

1. TAXATION (§ 642*)—DELINQUENT TAXES—LIEN—FORECLOSURE—CITATION.

A proceeding against the unknown owner of land to foreclose a delinquent tax assessment as authorized by Laws 1897, p. 138, c. 103, § 15, is a special proceeding in which the citation

2. TAXATION (§ 643*)—DELINQUENT TAXES—COLLECTION—STATUTES.

Gen. Laws 1905, p. 317, c. 129, § 2, provides that no tax collector shall be allowed credit for lists of delinquent or insolvent taxpayers as provided by Rev. St. 1895, art. 5170, until he makes oath in writing that he has exhausted all resources to collect the taxes under specified statutes. Held, that such provision had no reference to fees to which the collector is entitled in suits to collect delinquent taxes under such act, and hence a petition for such relief was not defective for failure to allege that the tax collector had performed the duties prescribed in section 2.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 709*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

An assignment that the court erred in refusing to hear evidence in support of a motion to tax the costs will not be reviewed where the bill of exceptions does not set out the evidence.

Appeal from District Court, Martin County; James L. Shepherd, Judge.

Action by the State of Texas against the alleged Unknown Owner of certain land to foreclose a tax lien. From a judgment for the state, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. N. Grisham and Jno. B. Howard, for appellant. A. L. Green and S. J. Isaacs, for the State.

CONNER, C. J. This suit was brought by the state of Texas, acting through its county attorney, against the alleged "unknown owner" of lot 6 in block 5 in the town of Stanton, Martin county, for the sum of $10.99 taxes and the further sum of $26.50 penalty, interest, and costs. The trial, which was before the court without a jury, resulted in a judgment in favor of the state with foreclosure of tax lien and order of sale as prayed for.

The objections urged to the citation in the first assignment are not maintainable. This was a special proceeding under the delinquent tax law of 1897, which prescribed the form of citation to be issued in cases of this character, and the citation in the record substantially conforms therewith. See section 15, c. 103, p. 138, Laws 1897; State v. Unknown Owner (Tex. Civ. App.) 103 S. W. 1116. It is not required therefore that the citation should have stated the file number of the suit, as provided by article 1214 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, or to have included a statement of the amount of costs as given in the petition; it being the rule that the special rather than the general law shall control. Hash v. Ely (Tex. Civ. App.) 100 S. W. 980; the appellant demurred. The objection pointed out, that it is not alleged that the tax collector had performed the duties prescribed by the act of 1905, is entitled to no weight. This act (see Gen. Laws 1905, p. 317, c. 129, § 2) has reference evidently to credits to which the tax collector is entitled for his lists of delinquent taxpayers, as provided by Rev. St. art. 5170, and not to the fees he is entitled to receive in suits, such as this, for the collection of taxes.

The assignment to the court's action in overruling special exceptions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, embracing different questions, is too general for consideration, and that complaining that the court refused to hear evidence in support of appellant's motion to tax the cost must be overruled on the ground that the bill of exception fails to set out the evidence offered so that we may judge of its character.

There are numerous other assignments of error, some of them apparently presenting important questions; but they are such as cannot be considered in the absence of a statement of facts, and we, having on a former day struck out the statement of facts presented in this cause, must overrule them.

No reversible error having been shown, we order an affirmance of the judgment.

TEXAS & P. RY. CO. et al. v. DEAN.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 22, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 446*)—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—FAILURE TO GIVE SIGNAL—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a railroad company for killing a mule which had escaped from a lot and had gone on a crossing, where it appeared that the company's agents in charge of the train failed to blow the whistle or ring the bell in approaching the crossing, it could not be said as a matter of law that the failure was not the cause of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1640; Dec. Dig. § 446.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 425*)—INJURIES TO ANIMALS ON TRACK—LIABILITY OF RAILROAD.

Where a railroad employed persons to make a grade crossing, it was not liable for injuries to a horse used in the work, caused by getting its shoe hung on a spike standing about two inches above the flange of the rail, where it did not appear that the condition could not have been plainly discernible by any one making a casual inspection of the place.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 425.*]

Appeal from Midland County Court; Charley Gibbs, Judge.

Action by W. L. Dean against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reformed and rendered.

covered a judgment against the appellant for the aggregate sum of $400 for the death of a mule and an injury to a horse. It is claimed that the mule was killed by being negligently struck and run over by one of the appellant's trains. The sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of negligence is challenged by the different assignments of error. It is shown that the mule escaped from a lot and was upon a crossing where a road commonly used by the public crossed the appellant's track, and that the appellant's agents in charge of the train failed to blow the whistle or ring the bell in approaching the crossing, in the manner required by law. The court found that this failure caused the collision and resulted in the injury. We cannot, as matter of law, say that this finding is not correct. Railway Co. v. Red Cross Stock Farm, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 114, 53 S. W. 834; Railway Co. v. Kilman, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 107, 86 S. W. 1050. Appellee sued for $250 as the value of the mule.

The injury to the horse occurred at a different time and place. It seems that appellee's father had been employed by the railway company to make a grade crossing over its line at a point on its right of way which had previously been fenced. For what purpose this was to be made is not shown. It is shown that the crossing was to be constructed by filling on each side of the track with dirt, for which scrapers and teams were employed. The appellee's team was being used by his father in the performance of the work, and was at the time being driven by an employé hired by his father. When the first scraperful of dirt was being moved, and in driving the team across the track, one of the horses got his shoe hung on a spike standing about two inches above the flange of the rail. The spike had not been observed by any of the parties, and was not observable when standing on the ground on the north side of the rail, the direction from which the track was approached by this team on that occasion. There is nothing to indicate but what it might have been observed by even a casual inspection by one going upon or close to the track. The horse was injured in such a way that it is claimed he was rendered practically worthless, and appellee alleged his value to be the sum of $150.

We do not think the evidence showed any negligence on the part of the railway company to support a judgment for the last-named amount. The parties employed were engaged to make the crossing safe and convenient for both man and beast who might have occasion to use it, and it could not be expected that the railway company would by some other agency do a part of that work in advance. Furthermore, this object which caused the injury was necessarily plainly discernible by any one who would undertake to make even a casual inspection of the place where the work was to be done.

The judgment of the county court will be reformed, and judgment here rendered in favor of the appellee against the appellant for $250 only as the value of the animal killed at the crossing. The costs of this appeal will be adjudged against the appellee.

DAYTON LUMBER CO. v. STOCKDALE.
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 30, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 22, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 139*)—TAKING CASE FROM JURY—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

It is not error to direct a verdict for plaintiff, where defendant's evidence is so weak that it raises only a surmise or suspicion of the existence of facts sought to be established in support of the offset pleaded by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 338; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 69*)—LIABILITIES AS TO THIRD PERSONS—FRAUD OF AGENT.

An agent's contract is not a fraud on his principal because the agent owns an interest in the property to be used in performing the work and rents his interest to the contractor for a monthly rental to be paid whether the property is used or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 130; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

3. PARTIES (§ 52*)—NEW PARTIES—APPLICATION.

A pleading filed by defendant on the day of trial, asking that its agent be made a party, comes too late.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 83; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 500*)—RECORD—RESERVATION OF QUESTIONS FOR REVIEW.

An assignment complaining of the overruling of a motion to bring in a new party cannot be considered when the record fails to show that it was presented to the court or was overruled.

Appeal from District Court, Liberty County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Action by E. A. Stockdale against the Dayton Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stevens & Pickett, for appellant. Marshall & Marshall, for appellee.

McMEANS, J. The appellee, E. A. Stockdale, instituted this suit against the appellant, Dayton Lumber Company, upon a stated account for $805.80 as a balance due him for hauling logs to appellant's tram railroad, and for the further sum of $337.50 as damages for time lost by appellee through the alleged breach of a contract on the part of appellant to furnish appellee steady work, and for the further sum of $120, the value of time lost by appellee by reason of delays caused by appellant in compelling appellee to move his logging outfit to places distant from the place he engaged to operate. These last two items were not allowed by the court, and no further reference need be made to them. Appellant answered by general denial and pleaded specially that about February 1, 1907, it made a verbal contract with appellee to haul to its spur tracks all timber cut into logs on a certain tract of land, and that for such hauling he was to receive $1.80 per 1,000 feet, and that by the terms of said contract appellee agreed to haul first the logs on said land situated furthest from the track, leaving those nearest thereto for the last haul, but that appellee, in violation of said contract, hauled first the logs nearest the spur, and then without excuse abandoned the contract and refused to haul the remaining logs on the tract, leaving thereon logs amounting to 276,577 feet, which it was necessary for appellant to have hauled, and that it was forced to pay $2.50 per 1,000 feet to have this done, thus being required to pay 90 cents per 1,000 feet more than the cost to it would have been had appellee performed his contract, or an additional cost to appellant of $248.92, which it pleaded in offset to appellee's account. Appellant further pleaded that one W. H. McGregor, its agent who made the contract for hauling with appellee, was its woods and logging superintendent and had complete control and management of the hauling of its timber and of the work done by appellee under said contract, and that after appellee abandoned said work appellant learned that McGregor, at the time of making said contract, and while acting as agent for appellant, was jointly interested with appellee in the contract, owning one-half of the teams, wagons, etc., used by appellee in hauling, and that this contract of McGregor was a fraud upon it for which the contract should be canceled. Upon the conclusion of the testimony the court peremptorily charged the jury to return a verdict for appellee for $805.80, the amount of the stated account, with 6 per cent. per annum interest thereon from November 1, 1907, and in obedience to the instruction such a verdict was returned, and judgment for appellee accordingly entered. The case is now regularly before us on appeal.

By its first assignment of error, appellant complains of the action of the court in instructing a verdict for appellee, because, it contends, there was ample evidence to show that appellee had contracted to haul all the timber off a specific tract of land, and, having failed to complete the contract, appellant was entitled to an offset in the sum it had been compelled to pay for having the remaining timber hauled over and above the price which it had agreed to pay appellee therefor.

The evidence was undisputed that appellant owed appellee for hauling logs a balance of $805.80. It was also undisputed that at the time appellee ceased to haul there remained on the tract 276,577 feet of timber, and that this amount was hauled by W. S. Williams, under a contract with appellant, for which Williams received $2.50 per 1,000 feet. As to the contract between appellant and Stockdale, the testimony is as follows:

Stockdale testified: "The contract I had was as follows: I was to haul logs at so much ($1.60) per 1,000 feet to their tram road, and was to be paid monthly. I never had any contract to clean up any job at all. I was supposed to haul logs at so much per 1,000. My logs was delivered on the tram road and they were scaled, and my account was credited with it. Mr. McGregor scaled the logs. There was no understanding, during this time, between me and Mr. McGregor, or any persons of the Dayton Lumber Company, that I was to engage in cleaning up any certain amount of ground. I was just merely hired by the company to haul timber at so much per 1,000 feet. I never had a contract to haul all the timber on tract 5 or 5A. I was to get $1.60 for anything they gave me to haul. I don't know how close some of this timber was to the tract that I hauled on No. 5. I think the timber was about a mile wide, and they run a spur as near the center as they could, and it was about one-half mile on each side. They were to cut the timber, and I was to haul it. Some of this timber was right close to the track, and I got $1.60 per 1,000 feet for that, and $1.60 for that furthest from the track. I could haul and quit a month, if I wanted to. I could haul that right by the track and get $1.60 for it and quit. There was no agreement that I was to haul until I had completed all hauling. Mr. McGregor made this contract with me. He was superintendent for the company at that time. He had no interest at all in that contract with me, but he had an interest in the teams I was running. He owned one-half of the teams, and I rented the teams from him at $125 a month. I worked them after he left, but up to that time he was superintendent. My intention was to clean up the spur, but the condition of the ground kept me from it, but I had no contract with the Dayton Lumber Company that I would clean up the spur, or any particular tract of land."

McGregor, the logging superintendent of appellant, testified: "In my capacity as agent of the Dayton Lumber Company, I entered into a contract with Mr. E. A. Stockdale, with reference to him logging the timber on the company's plant. That contract was: We were to pay him $1.60 per 1,000 feet to haul logs and deliver them on skids. At the time I made the contract with him, he was not to furnish any particular part of any particular job—that is, he was not to clean up any ground—and there was nothing said as to that. I left employment of the Dayton Lumber Company the 1st of November, 1907. I owned one-half interest in the stock that Mr. Stockdale operated then; that is, in the mules. I rented to Mr. Stockdale my interest in the stock at so much per month. He was to pay me $125. I had no interest in the contract that Mr. Stockdale made with the Dayton Lumber Company, and was not a party to it in any way. I also had interest in Foster's teams. That is the same Foster that was hauling there adjoining Stockdale. I received $125 for my mules and oxen."

L. Fouts, superintendent and manager of appellant, testified: "Mr. McGregor held the position of superintendent of the woods and logging during that time. I do not know anything about the contract he made with Mr. Stockdale, only what he told me. He reported to me he had made a contract with Mr. Stockdale and Mr. Foster to pay them $1.60 per 1,000 feet for any logs delivered on any spur track we might build. With reference to the work he done in October—he was hauling to what we call spur No. 5A; was to haul practically all of it—I can't say that Mr. McGregor told me that Stockdale was to haul all the timber at $1.60 per 1,000 feet delivered on the spur. As to what I know about Stockdale having to finish up any particular cut, it is understood that a man has to finish up his cut before he leaves it; but I do not know what contract McGregor made with Stockdale about that, only what McGregor reported to me; I do not know that McGregor did make such report to me; that is, that Stockdale was to finish up any particular cut. Well, I don't think McGregor did report to me on the contract he made with Stockdale."

The only evidence in the record claimed by appellant to be contradictory of the testimony above set out is that of the witness Williams, to whom McGregor and Stockdale sold the teams and logging outfit, to the effect that at the time of his purchase Stockdale said that it was understood that he (Stockdale) was to clean up the rest of spur No. 5; and the testimony of appellee that he was notified by appellant after he quit hauling on December 9th to complete the hauling on the tract or he would be charged up with the cost, that he was not ready to begin work on the date he was notified, as it was impossible for him to have done the work with the mules, and the reason he did a few days in November and also a few days in December, and crippled several of his mules, and he thought he would wait until the ground dried, and that he had intended to haul all the logs on the tract, that he would have done so, but it was impossible to get his mules in the woods, but that he did not have any contract to "clean up the job." The most that can be said of the evidence, relied upon by appellant as raising the issue of a contract on the part of appellee to haul at the contract price all the logs on the specific tract, is that it raises only a surmise or suspicion of the existence of facts sought to be established in support of the offset pleaded by appellant, but its probative force is so weak that in legal contemplation it falls short of being "any evidence" from which the jury could reasonably infer the existence of the alleged fact; and that court did not therefore err in instructing a verdict for appellee. Joske v. Irvine, 91 Tex. 574, 44 S. W. 1059; Wills v. Ice Co., 39 Tex. Civ. App. 483, 88 S. W. 265; Murphy v. Railway Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 96 S. W. 941. The assignment is overruled.

By its third and fourth assignments, appellant contends that the action of the court in instructing a verdict for appellee was erroneous for the further reason that the testimony proved that McGregor, appellant's agent, was individually interested in the contract made by him as such agent with Stockdale, and that his interest was of such nature as to amount to a fraud on his principal and to render the contract void. Without discussing the principle involved in the proposition, the assignment is overruled on the ground that there is not sufficient evidence in the record to raise the issue. Both Stockdale and McGregor testified positively that the latter had no individual interest whatever in the contract. The testimony relied upon by appellant to sustain its contention is that prior to the making of the contract McGregor owned a half interest in the teams and logging outfit with which Stockdale did the work, and McGregor rented to Stockdale his part of the property for the consideration of $125 per month; the agreement being that Stockdale should pay him said sum regardless of whether the property should be used or not. This agreement was not inconsistent with any duties McGregor owed to his principal, nor did it make him a party in interest with Stockdale in the contract, or place him in an adverse or antagonistic attitude toward his principal.

The fifth assignment, which complains that the court erred in overruling appellant's motion to make McGregor a party, is overruled. The pleading by which he was sought to be made a party, not having been filed until was overruled.

The defendant offered to prove by McGregor that in making contracts with Rice and Harrell for hauling logs it was stipulated that the logs furthest away from the tracks should be hauled first, leaving those nearest the track to be hauled last, and also offered to prove by the witness Fouts, the appellant's general manager, that it was customary to insert such stipulations in hauling contracts generally. An objection to the introduction of this evidence was sustained. The evidence was sought to be introduced as a circumstance to prove that such a stipulation was also embraced in the contract with appellee, Stockdale. It was the positive evidence of both Stockdale and appellant's agent, McGregor, who made the contract with him, that the contract contained no such provision; and, the proof being uncontradicted on this point, testimony as to what stipulations it was customary to insert was not admissible for the purpose for which such evidence was offered; and if this was not so, and had the testimony been admitted, we do not think the evidence, together with other circumstances admitted, would have been sufficient to raise the issue that Stockdale's contract contained such a provision. The assignments raising the point are overruled.

There being no reversible error in the record, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Affirmed.

HOGSETT v. NORTHERN TEXAS TRACTION CO. et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 3, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 1, 1909.)

1. JURY (§ 136*)—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES—NUMBER.

Each defendant is entitled to six peremptory challenges when there is a controversy between them, although they have a common ground of defense against plaintiff's demand.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 499*)—RESERVATION OF GROUND OF REVIEW—OBJECTIONS—EVIDENCE.

An assignment of error complaining of the admission of evidence will be overruled when no objection or exception appears in the record.

Orrick & Terrell, for appellant. Capps, Cantey, Hanger & Short, for appellees.

CONNER, C. J. On February 20, 1909, we dismissed the appeal herein for want of a final judgment, but the record has since been so corrected as to avoid the objection stated, and we therefore set aside the order of dismissal and proceed to a disposition of the case upon the assignments of error presented.

The action was instituted by appellant against the appellee the Northern Texas Traction Company because of an alleged false accusation of theft from the person of D. G. Chapman, one of the traction company's conductors, while appellant was a passenger on a street car in the city of Ft. Worth, and upon which charge he suffered arrest, humiliation, etc. It was alleged that the acts of the conductor were done during the discharge of his duties and had been ratified by the street railway company. The defendant replied by a general denial and a plea over against Chapman, the conductor, on the ground, in substance, that such act, if tortious, was of such character as rendered him liable over to the company for such sum as might be rendered against it. Chapman answered by general denial and a special plea of the truth of the charge because of which appellant sued.

In the first assignment appellant insists that: "The defendant herein and the cross-defendant herein together should have been allowed only six peremptory challenges." Aside from the fact that the record indicates a want of timely objection to the action now complained of, we think the assignment completely answered by the case of National Bank v. S. A. & A. P. Ry. Co., 97 Tex. 201, 77 S. W. 410. Here, as in the case referred to, there was a controversy between the defendants notwithstanding their common ground of defense against the plaintiff. They therefore were entitled to six peremptory challenges each.

Sterling P. Clark was permitted to testify to the good character of appellee Chapman, which is now objected to in the second assignment of error as "irrelevant and immaterial and as an attempt to corroborate a witness whose credibility had not been attacked and who had in no way been impeached." As an explanation to the bill, the court adopts the stenographer's report of the proceeding, from which it clearly appears that appellant's objection to this testimony was sustained; but upon the suggestion of counsel for appellant that "I want to see the case develop," and an appeal by the witness that he was compelled to leave the city, the court permitted the witness to answer, indicating that, if the testimony did not become material, it could be eliminated. After which we find no further objection or exception whatever, and upon this ground we overrule the assignment. Burton v. Anderson, 1 Tex. 93; Norell v. Phillips, 46 Tex. 162; Sheldon v. Benavides, 60 Tex. 673.

The third and last assignment undisposed of complains of appellant's answer upon cross-examination as a witness to the effect "that he had taken a prominent part in politics before the Terrell election law went into effect, but had not done so since." We have carefully considered the stenographic report of the cross-examination pertaining to the complaint, and fail to find that objection was made to the particular testimony made the ground of the assignment, and the assignment must therefore be overruled.

The case upon the merits seems to be one of conflicting evidence, and, having found no reversible error as assigned, we affirm the judgment.

GRAY et al. v. TRIBUE et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 8, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 6, 1909.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 527*)—PAYMENT—EVIDENCE.

Proof that a note about 18 years old was in possession of the maker after date of payment and was marked paid, together with date of payment, and by whom made, prima facie showed that the maker had paid it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1847-1855; Dec. Dig. § 527.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 184*)—VENDOR'S LIEN—PAYMENT OF PRICE—EFFECT.

Where the purchase-money note was paid by the purchaser, the legal title to the land became vested in him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 355; Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 251*)—CONFORMITY TO ISSUES.

Where, in partition for a lot 209 feet by 209 feet, and to remove a cloud on the title thereof, the petition described the land, and defendants filed a cross-petition for 109 feet by 209 feet off of the west side thereof, the pleadings were sufficient to authorize the court to enter judgment for defendants for the lot described in the cross-petition.

4. JUDGMENT (§ 251*)—ISSUES.

Where, in partition and for the removal of a cloud on the title, defendants disclaimed as to part of the land and claimed ownership to the balance, and plaintiffs took a nonsuit, the only issues which remained were those which related to the cross-action and answer thereto, and the court could not enter judgment for plaintiffs for the part disclaimed.

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; Irby Dunklin, Judge.

Action by Harriett Gray and others against Wilkins Tribue and others, in which defendants W. R. Hurley and another filed a cross-petition. From a judgment for defendants W. R. Hurley and another on their cross-action, plaintiffs and the other defendants appeal. Affirmed.

M. D. Priest and Ben. M. Terrell, for appellants. Flournoy, Smith & Storer and Marten & Smith, for appellees.

LEVY, J. The plaintiffs in the court below, in their suit for the partition of a lot of land 209 by 209 feet, which they claimed to own in common with the defendants in the case, alleged that the appellees W. R. Hurley and John Rea were asserting some sort of a claim to the land, which was a cloud on the title, and prayed that they be cited and the title be quieted. The defendants, except appellees, answered and adopted the pleadings of the plaintiffs. The appellees answered disclaiming any interest or claim as to the lot except 109 by 209 feet off of the west side of the same, and as to this pleaded not guilty, and, in a cross-action asserting title to the part not disclaimed and pleading their claim of title thereto, prayed for affirmative relief. Upon the call of the case for trial before a jury, the appellants applied for a continuance, which was by the court overruled, whereupon they asked the court for a nonsuit, which was granted, and the case proceeded to trial upon the cross-action of the appellees. After hearing the evidence, which was principally documentary, the court gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to find in favor of appellees for the 109 by 209 feet claimed by them in their cross-action, and judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict.

With Frank Tribue as the agreed common source of title of all the parties to the suit, appellees showed title by regular and consecutive transfers in writing to them, and which deeds were duly recorded. Frank Tribue, the ancestor of all the parties defendant, and the common source of title, died leaving a will under which all the premises in controversy were devised to Catherine Tribue, and which will was duly probated. Catherine Tribue conveyed all the property, by her deed of October 9, 1889, to J. Peter Smith, and in which a vendor's lien was expressly retained to secure the payment of part of the purchase money. Appellants claim by assignment of error that, there being no testimony showing that this vendor's lien note had been paid, the legal title remained in the vendor, and the court erred in directing a verdict for the appellees. As the record is before us there is sufficient proof of the payment of the note. The record, which is an agreed statement of facts, says: "That subsequently said J. Peter Smith paid off and satisfied a note which was introduced in evidence, of which the following is a copy"—and here the note was described as being of even date with the deed, for the same amount, and maturing at the same time as called for in the deed, and duly signed by J. Peter Smith, the maker of the same. On the face of the note was stamped "Paid" by "Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank, Ft. Worth, Tex." The note being in the possession of the maker after the day of payment, and it being about 18 years old, and marked paid, and when and by whom paid, is prima facie evidence that the maker has paid it. 2 Greenleaf on Evid. § 527. The note having been paid by the vendee, the legal title became vested in him. Stitzle v. Evans, 74 Tex. 506, 12 S. W. 326.

Appellees show title to 109 by 209 feet off of the west side of the lot of land, and in their cross-action only claimed that specific portion of the lot. The court peremptorily instructed the jury, and so entered judgment, for appellees for the 109 by 209 feet. Appellants contend by assignment of error that the court erred in so doing, because there was no pleading to authorize a charge and a judgment for a specific portion of the property. We do not think that it could be held that the court erred in the matter complained of. The property in controversy on the cross-action was by proper construction of such pleading the 109 by 209 feet off of the west side of the lot of land previously described in the plaintiffs' petition. The description thus given was of a specific portion of the land, and it was that only for which the judgment was entered. It is further contended by assignment of error that, appellees having disclaimed as to the east half of the property, the court should have directed the jury to find, and have entered judgment, for appellants for the same. Appellants having taken a nonsuit as to their cause of action, all issues upon their pleadings, except such as related to the cross-action and answer thereto, were withdrawn and retired from the case with their order of nonsuit, and there remained before the court only the cross-action of appellees. The cross-bill only claimed title to a specific portion of the lot, and the title to this specific portion became and was the only issue in controversy on the cross-bill. Any controversy as to the east half of the lot having passed out of the case by the nonsuit of appellants, the court did not err in not charging the jury to find, and in not entering judgment thereon, for appellants for the east half.

We have considered the other assignments of error, and are of the opinion that the same should be overruled.

The motion made by the appellees to dismiss this appeal was, at a former day, ordered to be submitted along with the case and determined with the case. We have considered the motion, and think the same should be overruled. Emerson v. Railway Co., 37 Tex. Civ. App. 110, 82 S. W. 1060.

The judgment was ordered affirmed.

CARRIERS (§ 286*) — PASSENGERS — PERSONAL INJURIES — CONDITION OF PREMISES — DUTY TO KEEP DEPOT OPEN.

Under Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 4521, requiring every railroad to keep its depots lighted and warmed and open to all passengers not less than one hour before the arrival of all passenger trains, and making it liable for damages sustained by its failure to do so, a company would be liable for injuries to a passenger caused by not having its depot open within the required time at a flag station where it sold tickets and maintained a depot for passengers.

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; W. T. Simmons, Judge.

Action by T. A. Rumfield against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Smithfield is an unimportant place in Tarrant county on the line of the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company, a few miles from Ft. Worth. It is so unimportant that the railroad company has established a rule that it will not stop its night passenger trains at the place unless some one flags them. Appellee, who lives a mile or two from Smithfield, had been summoned on a special venire in a criminal case to be tried in Judge Smith's court, and was very anxious to take the early morning train of February 5, 1906, so as to reach Ft. Worth in time for jury service. He did not know the exact hour when the train was due to pass through Smithfield, but knew it was some time very early in the morning. He walked over to the station, getting there about 5 o'clock a. m., but found the building dark and the door locked. He tried to arouse the sleeping agent, but failed. The weather was mighty cold, and he nearly froze while beating a path on the leeward side of the company's property. When he could bear it no longer, he renewed his efforts to get a friendly response from inside the building, and finally, after much kicking on the door and otherwise making a heap of racket, succeeded in waking the drowsy agent, who roared out: "Who in —— are you, anyway?" To this the appellee frankly admitted that he was mighty near froze and had come down there to go to Ft. Worth. At this juncture the evidence would warrant a finding that the agent tucked the covers more snugly about his shivering form, and in language more sulphurous than polite shouted back: "Well, ——, hit the road. I ain't in your way." Appellee steadily refused to do this (at least until the next term of the district court, when he appears to arose, opened the station building, and lighted a fire only a few minutes before the arrival of the train. Appellee never got fully warm until he reached Ft. Worth, and had a long spell of sickness, traceable directly to the exposure of that morning. He sued the railroad company and the jury thought he was damaged $460, and we are satisfied he was, for the company, though it has appealed, has not intimated that he was not injured that much. Of course, the foregoing is based on appellee's version of the affair. The company's agent remembers it differently. He testifies that he is not now in the employ of the company, but is visiting his parents in Eastern Texas; that it was no part of his duties under his employment to make this early train; that it was his duty to meet the 5:20 evening train, and to stay up at night for it if it should be late. This evening train was late on February 4th, and he had remained up until 12 o'clock, or possibly 1 o'clock, to meet it, and for that reason had lost sleep. He did not hear anybody at the depot door on the morning of February 5th until he got up, except about 5 o'clock, when some one rattled on the door, and he said: "What do you want?" The man said he wanted to go to Ft. Worth, and the witness said: "Don't tear the door down." He immediately got up and put on his breeches and opened the door. When he opened the door, a Mr. Newton came in, but appellee turned and walked off. Mr. Newton said he guessed he was huffy. This witness further said he had a fire in the depot that morning, and, when he got up, he put more coal on it. But we are satisfied, in view of the verdict, that this witness' recollection of the events of that morning is not as vivid as appellee's, and forbear further to discuss the testimony.

Spoons, Thompson & Barwise, for appellant. Smith & Latimore, for appellee.

SPEER, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is agreed that the case is one of first impression in this state, and the only insistence of appellant is, in effect, that it had a right to establish reasonable rules for the running of its passenger trains and the conduct of its business generally, and that, in the exercise of such right, it had made no provision for lighting and heating its depot building for the accommodation of persons desiring to take passage on its early morning train. The trial court thought it ought to be left to the jury to determine under all the circumstances whether or not appellant was negligent toward appellee, and so sub-business in this state shall keep its depots or passenger houses in this state lighted and warmed and open to the ingress and egress of all passengers who are entitled to go therein for a time not less than one hour before the arrival and after the departure of all trains carrying passengers on such railroad, and every such railroad company for each failure or refusal to comply with the provisions of this article shall forfeit and pay to the state of Texas the sum of fifty dollars, which may be sued for and recovered in the name of said state in any court of competent jurisdiction, and shall be liable to the party injured for all damages by reason of such failure." Appellee's case falls fairly within this statute. The evidence shows that appellee not only permitted passengers to embark at Smithfield, but would sell them tickets at that place, permitting them to enter its station building, and otherwise treating them as passengers entitled to transportation on those trains. This is practically all appellant could do at any station except further to comply with the provisions of the article quoted as to lighting and heating its depot. The court, therefore, might have submitted only the amount of recovery, and certainly committed no error in submitting the issue of negligence to the jury.

The judgment is in all things affirmed.

STEVENSON v. CAUBLE.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 3, 1909.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 34*)—CONTRACT—CANCELLATION—FRAUD.

Where defendant was induced to buy land described in a deed on misrepresentation by plaintiff's agent that it was land which the agent had shown defendant, it was no defense to defendant's claim for a cancellation of the contract of sale and to recover purchase money paid that, after plaintiff had been shown the wrong land, plaintiff offered to show him the location of the land conveyed, but defendant declined to make any further examination, saying that he was satisfied with what he had seen.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 33*)—CANCELLATION—FRAUDULENT INTENT.

Where a vendor misrepresented the location of the land conveyed, and the vendee was induced to buy land inferior to that shown him, it was not incumbent on the vendee, in order to obtain a cancellation of the contract, to show that the misrepresentations were made by the vendor with a fraudulent intent, though the vendee so alleged.

Appeal from District Court, Howard County; James L. Shepherd, Judge.

Action by G. C. Cauble against J. C. Stevenson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Wagstaff & Davidson, for appellant. Jno. B. Littler and Morrison & Morrison, for appellee.

DUNKLIN, J. G. C. Cauble conveyed to J. C. Stevenson section 7 in block 33, Texas & Pacific Railway Company Survey, in Howard county, for a consideration of $8,400, of which $700 was paid in cash at the time the deed was executed, and the balance was evidenced by promissory notes, some of which were executed by Stevenson, and others, which were outstanding lien notes against the land, were assumed by him. Some of these deferred obligations were paid by Stevenson, but, upon his failure and refusal to pay others that matured, Cauble filed this suit in trespass to try title to recover the land. Stevenson filed his answer disclaiming any title to the land, also a plea over against Cauble alleging that, in the negotiations which culminated in the sale of the land, Cauble had shown him land other than that described in the deed and superior thereto in quality and value, and had fraudulently represented to him that the land so shown him was the land conveyed, that he was induced by such representations to accept the deed, and, by reason of the fraud so alleged, he prayed for a cancellation of the contract of sale and for recovery of the purchase money which he had paid to Cauble. Judgment was rendered in Cauble's favor for the land and denying to Stevenson any recovery on his cross-action. From the judgment refusing his cross-action, Stevenson has appealed, and, by his first assignment, challenges the correctness of the following instruction to the jury, given at plaintiff's request, to wit: "You are instructed that if you find and believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant was deceived by representations made to him about the section 7 or the location thereof, but you also find that, before he purchased, he was put upon inquiry as to the truthfulness of the said representations, he cannot recover therefor, if he failed to make investigation as to whether or not he had been actually deceived."

From the uncontroverted testimony it appears that, at the inception of the negotiations for the sale, Zack Stevens, Cauble's agent, went with the defendant to show him certain sections, including section 7 in controversy, owned by Cauble, for the purpose of making a sale to the defendant. On returning from their trip of inspection they stopped at Cauble's house, where defendant told Cauble he had decided to purchase section No. 7. Cauble and Stevens both testified that in this discussion some question arose as to whether or not Stevens was mistaken in the location of section 7 as he had pointed it out to defendant, that Cauble, who knew the correct location of section 7, then drew a plat of the land showing its true location and offered to take defendant out and show him the exact location of the corners of section 7, but that defendant declined to go or to make any further investigation to discover whether or not Stevens had made a mistake in attempting to point out section 7, saying he was satisfied with what he had seen. It seems that this testimony was the basis for the instruction complained of and quoted above, but in giving it we think there was error which requires the reversal of the judgment. Labbe v. Corbett, 69 Tex. 508, 6 S. W. 808; Buchanan v. Burnett (Tex. Civ. App.) 114 S. W. 406; Conn v. Hagan, 93 Tex. 338, 55 S. W. 823; Land Mtg. Co. v. Pace, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 237, 56 S. W. 377; I. & G. N. Ry. v. Shuford, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 263, 81 S. W. 1189; Mitchell v. Zimmerman, 4 Tex. 75, 51 Am. Dec. 717; 2 Pom. Eq. §§ 889, 892, 893, 895. In the case of Labbe v. Corbett, supra, the court, in holding that a misrepresentation as to the health of sheep, made by Corbett, who sold them to Labbe, the latter relying upon the truth of the representations, would support a plea of failure of consideration for the purchase price of the sheep, used the following language: "If the misrepresentation as to the health of the sheep was made by the appellee, this was known by him to be untrue, for he had testified that he knew the sheep were diseased; so we are relieved from the necessity of determining the effect of an innocent misrepresentation as to a matter, where the party to whom it is made has means to verify its correctness and fails to avail himself of them."

The principle announced in Pomeroy's Equity, supra, seems to be that when one by false representations of facts, although innocently made, induces another to enter into a contract, and such misrepresentations are made the basis for relief sought by the other, it is no defense to the prayer for such relief to show that the person deceived had the opportunity and means of correctly informing himself in the premises, unless it be further shown that he took some steps in making an independent investigation of the facts. In presenting appellant's cause of action to the jury, after submitting the issue whether or not misrepresentations were made by Cauble to Stevenson as to the location of the land, the trial court used the following language: "And you further believe from the evidence that the representations made to Stevenson, if any, were made to induce Stevenson to buy the land, and were false and fraudulent, and were known to be false and fraudulent by the plaintiff at the time they were made, if they were made, and the defendant relied upon said misrepresentations," etc. Under the facts, and upon the authorities above noted, we believe that if the misrepresentations were made by Cauble as alleged by Stevenson, and if Stevenson was thereby induced to buy land inferior to that shown him, it would not be incumbent upon him to further show that Cauble made the misrepresentations with a fraudulent intent; and the fact that Stevenson alleged that such misrepresentations were fraudulent, as well as false, would not call for a different ruling, as contended by appellee. Stevenson alleged in his pleadings that the misrepresentations of which he complained were made by Cauble. Upon the trial he testified that the same were made by Zack Stevens, the agent of Cauble. Appellee objected to such testimony on the ground that it was at variance with appellant's pleadings. The objection was by the court overruled. Appellee then moved to exclude the testimony on the same ground, and this motion was overruled. By cross-assignments of error appellee questions the correctness of these rulings, and those assignments are sustained. Lewis v. Hatton, 86 Tex. 533, 26 S. W. 50; Arndt v. Boyd (Tex. Civ. App.) 48 S. W. 771; Peyton v. Cook (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 781.

Judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MAURY et al. v. McDONALD et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 3, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 6, 1909.)

1. GARNISHMENT (§ 113*)—INDEBTEDNESS—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

Certain garnishees contracted to purchase from defendants a half interest in a timber land contract under which defendants and the garnishees obligated themselves to pay $90,000; the garnishees paying defendants $15,000 and agreeing to pay P. the balance of the purchase money. The contract also provided that defendant should pay the garnishees interest on half of the payments so made to P., and that such payment should be returned when the land was sold. Defendants also gave the garnishees an option on defendants' half and provided that, if they should not exercise the same, the garnishees should loan defendants $15,000 to be secured by a lien on the land payable when sold. A writ of garnishment was served June 6, 1907, and thereafter the garnishees loaned defendants the $15,000 as agreed. Held, that the garnishees were not indebted to defendants in any amount under such contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. § 232; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

2. GARNISHMENT (§ 38*)—"EFFECTS."

A contract for the sale of an interest in timber lands provided that, if the garnishees did not exercise an option to purchase defendants' interest in the land, they should loan defendants $15,000 to be secured by defendants' interest in the land and pay when the land was sold. A writ of garnishment having been served on June 6, 1907, the garnishees elected not to exercise their option, and on August 31st procured a draft payable to one of the garnishees for $15,000, which he retained until September 13, 1907, when he indorsed and delivered it to defendants in performance of the contract. Held, that such draft while in the hands of the garnishee did not constitute "effects" in the hands of the garnishee belonging to the defendants subject to the writ.

3. GARNISHMENT (§ 191*)—DISMISSAL—COSTS—"REASONABLE COMPENSATION."

Rev. St. 1895, art. 253, providing that, where a garnishee is discharged, the costs including reasonable compensation to the garnishee shall be taxed against plaintiff. Held, that "reasonable compensation" included a reasonable attorney's fee for services rendered to a garnishee in preparing and defending the garnishee's answer after it had been controverted.

4. GARNISHMENT (§ 191*)—DISMISSAL—COSTS—ATTORNEY'S FEES—EVIDENCE.

On the dismissal of a garnishment, evidence held to warrant a finding that $750 was a reasonable fee to be taxed in favor of the garnishees for the services of their attorney in filing and defending the garnishee's answer.

5. TRIAL (§ 395*)—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

Where the court's findings construing a contract were based on the contract as written, the court was not required to make other findings based on oral testimony concerning its requirements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 930; Dec. Dig. § 395.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 395*)—FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence is conflicting, the court is only required to find such facts as are deduced from such evidence.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1011*)—FINDINGS—REVIEW.

Where conclusions of the trial court deduced from conflicting evidence are not acquiesced in, they may be revised in a proper case from the statement of facts.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the district court in favor of appellees, as garnishees, in a garnishment proceeding instituted against them by appellants in connection with a suit against F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., a partnership composed of Mrs. Stallforth, a feme sole, and G. Hemminghoffen, doing business under the aforesaid name. Defendants were residents of the republic of Mexico, and in the petition against them were alleged to be indebted to appellants in the sum of $11,600 upon a contract in writing for commissions for the sale of certain timbered lands in Mexico. Defendants Stallforth & Co. were cited by personal service upon them in Mexico under the statute, and judgment by default was rendered against them for the amount sued for; the judgment, however, not to operate as a personal judgment against defendants, but only as a judgment in rem against whatever indebtedness on the part of the garnishees might be attached by the garnishment proceedings. At the same time a writ of garnishment was sued out against appellees which was executed upon each of them on June 6, 1907. In the application for the writ it was alleged that the persons named are indebted to the defendants, or have in their hands effects belonging to them. Each of the garnishees answered under oath fully denying that he was indebted to, or had effects of, defendants in his hands, and that he knew of any persons indebted, etc., and prayed to be discharged with his costs and attorney's fees. These answers were controverted, under oath, by appellants, who alleged as follows: "And controverting the facts set out in said answers, these plaintiffs show: That they have good reason to believe, and do believe, that the answers of the garnishees are incorrect, in that on the 1st day of June, 1907, the said Arch McDonald and R. McDonald, entered into a contract with defendant F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., by the terms of which they bound themselves to pay to the said defendants a sum exceeding in amount $90,000 as the purchase price for what is known as the Pereyra tract of 142,000 acres of land situated in the northern part of the state of Durango, republic of Mexico, about 15 miles from the mining camp of Guanacevi. That on the 1st of June, 1907, the date of said contract, that there was due to one Abel Pereyra the sum of $30,000 United States currency, on account of said land, which the garnishees obligated themselves to pay. That the said garnishees did not have with them at that time sufficient money to make said payment, and at said time the defendant F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., advanced to the garnishees herein the sum of $15,000, which under the terms of said contract was to be repaid to the defendants by the garnishees on the 15th day of September, 1907. That of the total amount to be paid on said contract there had been paid at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment herein only the sum of $15,000, being one-half of the first payment, which the said garnishees obligated themselves to pay to the said F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., leaving now due on said contract the sum of $15,000, advanced by the said Stallforth to the said garnishees in addition to the balance due on the purchase price agreed upon between the parties. Plaintiffs show that the garnishees are now and have been since the writ herein was served upon them indebted to the defendant, or were indebted to said defendant at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment herein, a sum exceeding $75,000, and they have effects of said defendants in their possession and had such when said writ was served on them."

The following issues were made up by the court:

"(1) Whether or not at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment upon the garnishees, or any time thereafter up to the date of filing the answers, the garnishees R. McDonald or Arch McDonald were indebted to the defendant F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co.

"(2) Whether or not the said R. McDonald and Arch McDonald had in their hands or possession at any time between the date of the service of the writ of garnishment herein, and the date of the filing, of the answers herein, any effects of the defendant F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co."

Upon trial without a jury judgment was rendered discharging the garnishees with their costs, including an attorney's fee of $750, and from the judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The trial court, upon request of appellants, prepared and filed, as a part of the record, conclusions of facts as follows:

"(1) I find that on June 1, 1907, R. McDonald entered into a contract with F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., in the republic of Mexico, by the terms of which the said McDonald acquired a one-half interest in a contract or purchase then existing between Stallforth and one Pereyra, covering a large tract of land in Mexico.

"(2) I find that at the time of the execution of the contract the said McDonald paid to Stallforth $15,000, which Stallforth at once paid over to said Pereyra, together with $15,000 more, making $30,000, and covering the first payment due Pereyra under his contract with Stallforth.

"(3) I further find that said McDonald obligated himself by said contract to pay to Pereyra on November 1, 1907, and May 1, 1908, the remaining amounts on the total price, and that Stallforth agreed to pay McDonald interest at said 6 per cent. per annum, payable annually, upon one-half of the payments so made by McDonald to Pereyra; said one-half of said payments to be returned by Stallforth to McDonald when the land is sold.

"(4) I further find that Stallforth gave McDonald an option upon Stallforth's remaining one-half interest at $1 per acre, good until September 15, 1907.

"(5) I further find that McDonald agreed that if he did not exercise said option he would lend Stallforth $15,000 to be secured by lien upon Pereyra land aforesaid, upon which loan Stallforth agreed to pay interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable annually, and to be repaid to McDonald when the land should be sold.

"(6) I further find that said contract between McDonald and Stallforth provided that, if either party should fail to comply with any of the obligations therein, the party so failing should lose whatever amount he had paid under said contract, and forfeit all rights thereunder.

"(7) I further find that said McDonald declined to exercise the option to purchase Stallforth's remaining one-half interest in the land.

"(8) I further find that on September 13, 1907, said McDonald loaned to Stallforth $15,000, taking Stallforth's obligation therefor. By 'Stallforth,' wherever used in these findings, I mean F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co.

"(9) I further find that the said R. McDonald has never at any time been indebted to said Stallforth.

"(10) I further find that Arch McDonald has never at any time been indebted to said Stallforth, and has never had any business transactions with Stallforth, except as agent for his father, R. McDonald.

"(11) I further find from the testimony of the witnesses produced before me, together with my own knowledge of the nature, character, and extent of the services rendered in this case by the attorney for the garnishees, that the sum of $750 is a reasonable and proper allowance to the garnishees for the fees of said attorney, for services rendered and necessary to be rendered herein, including necessary advice furnished the garnishees since the service of the writ of garnishment herein concerning same."

No attack is made upon any of these findings as not supported by the evidence, by the assignments of error, and they are adopted by us as such. The findings of fact are based almost entirely upon a certain written contract between appellees and Stallforth & Co., dated June 1, 1907, which is as follows:

"First. Messrs. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., grant and transfer to Mr. Roderick McDonald, who acquires it, the one-half interest, with the obligations which are correlative to them, granted to them in a contract which they have entered into with Mr. Abel Pereyra, according to agreement executed the 24th of November, 1906, and which exists, deposited in the power of the notary public, Attorney Felipe Arellano, Jr., in this city, by which the said gentleman obligated himself to sell a tract of land situated in the district of Santiago, Papasquino, in the state of Durango.

"Second. Mr. McDonald will deliver to-day to Messrs. F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, which they, with an equal sum which corresponds to the half of their rights, deliver to-day to Mr. Abel Pereyra, as first payment in accordance with the agreement which is mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

"Third. Mr. McDonald obligates himself to pay to Mr. Pereyra, one month before the date stipulated in said agreement, or be it by the first day of November of the current year, and the first of May, 1908, the remaining amounts on the total price; Messrs. F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., recognizing that they are to pay an interest of 6 per centum per annum upon the sum which corresponds to the half which they represent, from now on, in the rights granted them by said agreement, which they shall pay annually as it becomes due.

"Fourth. Messrs. F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., obligate themselves to sell to Mr. Roderick McDonald, who acquires the right to purchase it, the half of which they now represent under the rights derived from the aforesaid agreement, being the price of said sale at the rate of one dollar an acre of land, which he will have to pay them before the fifteenth day of September, next, in this city.

"Fifth. If Mr. McDonald should not make use of the right to purchase, which by the preceding clause he obtains, under the terms therein expressed, he obligates himself to lend to Messrs. F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., the fifteen thousand dollars which under this date they pay to Mr. Abel Pereyra, which sum these gentlemen will return to him with those referred to in the third clause of this agreement, this drawing interest at 6 per centum per annum, which will be paid annually as it becomes due. Which return shall be made when the land is sold.

"Sixth. If Mr. McDonald or Messrs. Stallforth should find a purchaser for the land, who shall offer a price of not less than ninety thousand dollars, he shall notify the other, and he, within the space of thirty days, counted from the date of said notice, shall sell his interest at that price, or purchase the other party's interest at the price offered by the purchaser.

"Seventh. If Mr. McDonald or Messrs. F. Stallforth & Bro., Successors & Co., should fail to comply with any of the obligations which this contract imposes, they shall lose, in favor of whomsoever might have received them, the amounts which they might have delivered, and the rights which they have under this agreement.

"Eighth. The place for the fulfillment of this contract is fixed as this city. Therefore, the contracting parties submit themselves in an expressed manner, renouncing the jurisdiction of their domicile to the authorities of this district and state. This agreement shall be deposited in the hands of a notary in order that it be taken as a public instrument, at the request of any of the contracting parties.

"Additional: The contract executed by this agreement remains subject to its other natural condition, among others, that of the provisions of surety and indemnification."

By their first and second assignments of error appellants assail the judgment of the court on the ground that the contract showed that garnishees had obligated themselves to pay Stallforth & Co. the sums of money therein specified in consideration of the acquiring by them of an interest in the land referred to, and were indebted to Stallforth in an amount in excess of the claim, and further on the ground that the proof showed that Stallforth & Co. had advanced to appellees $15,000 on June 1, 1907, to be repaid on September 15th, as shown by the witness Maury, in connection with the contract. These assignments are based almost entirely upon certain testimony of Maury, one of appellants, as to conversations between himself and each of the appellees, wherein they are claimed to have made statements as to the nature of the contract between themselves and Stallforth & Co., to the effect, in substance: That appellees, in consideration of being allowed to purchase a half interest in the land, on the same terms as Stallforth was to purchase from Pereyra, was to pay the entire purchase money, including a cash payment of $30,000, Stallforth's one-half to be repaid to appellees when the land was sold; that when they met to close the trade appellees were not prepared to pay all of the $30,000, and thereupon Stallforth & Co. advanced to them $15,000 to enable them to make the cash payment, giving appellees an option until September 15, 1907, to purchase their half at $1 per acre, at which time, if appellees did not buy Stallforth & Co.'s one-half, they were to pay Stallforth & Co. the $15,000 so advanced by them to appellees. Appellees denied having made the statements attributed to them by Maury, and Maury himself testified: That he did not know that there was any substantial difference between what appellees told him about the contract, and the contract as it appeared to be set out in the written instrument; that there was no distinction in substance, but only in terms. At all events, the court found upon all the evidence that the contract was as set out in the written instrument, discarding Maury's testimony in so far as it tended to show that it was otherwise.

We must then accept the court's findings based upon the terms of the written contract, and especially is this true in consideration of the fact that appellees denied the statements attributed to them by Maury as to the terms of the contract. Coming then to the findings of the court, based upon the written contract, the facts are clearly established that no reference is made to any advance or loan of the $15,000 by Stallforth & Co. to appellees, or a repayment of that loan, but that, as to the first payment of $30,000, each party paid one-half; appellees giving $15,000 to Stallforth & Co., and they paying it over to Pereyra with $15,000 on their own account. Appellees further obligated themselves to pay to Pereyra, not to Stallforth & Co., the other portions of the purchase money. It seems perfectly clear to us that this amount which appellees were to pay to Pereyra did not constitute such an indebtedness from appellees to Stallforth & Co. as would be subject to garnishment at the suit of appellants. Appellees' rights depended upon this money being paid to Pereyra, in whom was the title to the land, and they protected themselves by the provision in the contract obligating them to pay the money direct to Pereyra. It is true that they obligated themselves to Stallforth & Co. to pay this money to Pereyra, but that did not give Stallforth & Co. the right to demand that the money be paid to them, and certainly no creditor of Stallforth & Co. could require that any of this money be applied to the payment of Stallforth's debt to him, which, under the forfeiture provisions of the contract, would have resulted in an entire loss to appellees not only of their bargain, but of the $15,000 already paid.

As to the $15,000, it may be that the agreement originally was that appellees were to advance the entire $30,000 to make the first payment, and that, finding themselves unable to do so, they only paid $15,000; but at this point the written contract comes in and settles the question as to the agreement between the parties. Nothing is said about a loan or advance by Stallforth & Co. to appellees, or any obligation on their part to pay the whole of the $30,000. It simply appears that each party pays one-half out of his own funds. As to the $15,000, the parties chose to put the matter in the shape of an obligation on the part of appellees to lend that amount to Stallforth & Co. to be repaid, with an interest, at 6 per cent., along with Stallforth's half of the other payments to be made by appellees to Pereyra, when the land was sold. This is the effect of the written contract, and by it must be determined the rights and obligations of the parties. It is not sufficient to change this obligation into one to pay $15,000 owing by appellees to Stallforth & Co. that the obligation is to lend Stallforth & Co. "the $15,000 which under this date they pay to Abel Pereyra." It was nevertheless an obligation to lend money at a prescribed rate of interest and upon prescribed terms of payment, with the correlative rights and obligations arising from such a contract, and not an obligation to pay that much money owing by appellees to Stallforth & Co., upon which a right of recovery, as for a debt, could be based. If appellees had failed or refused to lend the money, the contingency having arisen upon which they agreed to do so, they would have been liable to Stallforth & Co. at most, not for a debt due, but for damages for breach of a contract; the amount of such damages being the actual loss sustained by them by reason of such breach, as a proximate consequence thereof. Again there was no obligation on the part of Stallforth & Co. to borrow, or to accept the loan, at the stipulated rate of interest, and they might have declined to do so without violation of any provision of the contract. From this it follows that a judgment in the garnishment proceedings for the amount claimed by appellants would not have afforded appellees any protection whatever against a forfeiture of their rights under the contract. The court's findings of fact are, in effect, but its construction of the written contract, and it did not err in holding that appellees were not indebted to Stallforth & Co. in any amount, which could be reached by garnishment. The first, second, and third assignments of error, and the various propositions thereunder, are overruled.

It was made to appear that appellees decided not to accept Stallforth & Co.'s offer to sell his one-half of the land, but to lend him $15,000, and procured a draft on New York for that amount payable to R. McDonald, which draft appellee R. McDonald had in his possession from August 31 to September 13, 1907, at which date it was indorsed and delivered to Stallforth & Co. in compliance with appellees' contract to lend them that amount. It is contended by appellants that this constituted "effects of Stallforth & Co. in the hands of the garnishees belonging to Stallforth & Co." and subject to the writ of garnishment. There is no merit in the contention. The fourth assignment of error, presenting the point, is overruled.

What we have said sufficiently disposes of the fifth, sixth, and seventh assignments of error, and the propositions thereunder, which are overruled.

The court heard evidence as to the value of the services of an attorney in filing the answers of appellees, and in representing them in resisting the garnishment proceedings, and allowed them $750 as such attorney's fees. This action of the court is complained of by the seventh and eighth assignments of error; the first denying appellees' right to recover attorney's fees, and the second attacking the allowance therefor as excessive. The statute (article 253, Rev. St. 1895) provides that: "Where the garnishee is distorney's fees. Johnson & Co. v. Blanks, 68 Tex. 496, 4 S. W. 557. Compensation is not to be limited, we think, to the value of the naked service of preparing the garnishee's answer, where the same is controverted, but must also include the value of legal services in resisting the writ, where it appears that the plaintiff has no cause of action against the garnishee. As said by the Supreme Court in the case cited: "That reasonable attorney's fees is a necessary expense in every case, we have no doubt. A person unskilled in the law is not to be expected to prepare a written answer under our statutes which would secure him from liability, although he owed nothing to the defendant in the original proceeding. Besides, many cases arise in which his liability is doubtful, and the advice and assistance of counsel are necessary to shield him from the danger of his having to pay his debt twice. Whatever else it may include, we are clearly of the opinion that the statute was intended to cover a reasonable fee to the garnishee for the services of an attorney in assisting him in the proceeding."

The cases cited by appellants in support of their contention are not in point. Appellees never at any stage of the proceeding became active litigants on their own account any further than the mere denial of indebtedness constituted them such, but confined themselves solely to resistance of appellants' claim that they were indebted to Stallforth & Co., or had effects of theirs in their hands. They sought only to prevent a judgment which they insisted, and the court found, would not have protected their interest in the matter of the contract referred to. In Kelly v. Gibbs, 84 Tex. 146, 19 S. W. 380, 563, the answer of the garnishee was controverted, and upon a trial of the issues thus formed he was unsuccessful. Upon this ground it was held that he was not entitled to recover costs. Moursund v. Priess, 84 Tex. 558, 19 S. W. 775, is to the same effect. In Carlisle v. Sommer, 61 Tex. 124, the answer of the garnishee was contested, and upon a trial of the issues the garnishee was successful. The court says that the trial court erred in rendering, at the time and under the circumstances that it did, a judgment against appellant for attorney's fees. We confess to an inability to understand fully what is here meant. If it supports appellants' contention, it is inconsistent with the later cases of Johnson & Co. v. Blanks supra, Willis v. Heath, 75 Tex. 124, 12 S. W. 971, 16 Am. St. Rep. 876, and other cases. Eastham Bros. v. Blanchette, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 205, 94 S. W. 441. The court heard bers of witnesses examined, all lawyers, the evidence rather preponderates in favor of $1,000 as a reasonable fee.

Maury testified as to certain statements made to him by appellees (which were denied by them), and also as to statements made to him by Ivonski, Stallforth's agent, having relation to the transaction between appellees and Stallforth & Co., and as to the contract between them growing thereout. Appellants requested the court to make specific findings (1) whether such statements were made, and (2) if so, whether the contract was as indicated by such statements or in the purported written contract. The court declined to do so, and appellants excepted and complain of the ruling by their ninth and tenth assignments of error. There was no error in the refusal of the court to make the findings requested. The matter constituted merely evidence introduced by appellants to show the nature of the contract. The finding of the court as to the terms of this contract, based upon the written contract, was all that was required. By such findings the court fully and clearly indicated its conclusion that the written instrument stated the contract between the parties upon which the issues were to be determined. Where the evidence is conflicting, the court is only required to find such facts as are deduced from such evidence. If such conclusions are not acquiesced in, they may in a proper case be revised from the statement of facts. Appellees testified that the written instrument represented the contract between the parties, and denied the statements attributed to them by Maury, and the court found in effect that this was true. This was all that was required.

What we have said sufficiently disposes, also, of the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth assignments of error, complaining of the failure and refusal of the trial court to make additional specific findings of fact. The assignments, and the several propositions thereunder, are overruled.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

3. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 41*) — OUTSTANDING TITLE — EVIDENCE.

A grantor, through his predecessors in title, claimed title to 210 acres of land by adverse possession, and conveyed the whole tract by deed duly recorded. In a suit by the purchaser to try title, evidence was introduced that the grantor at one time paid taxes on 182 acres, and at another time taxes on 163 acres, and the grantor explained this on the ground that he had conveyed the rest of the tract, though no deed was introduced in evidence. Held, that the evidence was insufficient to show any outstanding title to the 210 acres as against the purchaser.

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*) — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In trespass to try title to land, evidence held to sustain a finding that the grantors of plaintiff held title by adverse possession, both under the five and ten year statute of limitations.

Appeal from District Court, Liberty County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Trespass to try title by Annie Thompson Lomax against Emil Hoencke. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stevens & Pickett, for appellant. Jacob C. Baldwin, for appellee.

PLEASANTS, C. J. This is an action of trespass to try title, brought by appellee against appellant and other defendants to recover a tract of 210 acres of land situated in Liberty county and patented to the heirs of John Hartgraves. Plaintiff pleaded title under the five and ten year statute of limitation. The defendant, Hoencke, answered by general demurrer and plea of not guilty, and specially pleaded the coverture and minority of his vendors in answer to plaintiff's pleas of limitation. The other defendants failed to answer, and judgment was rendered against them by default. The cause between plaintiff and defendant, Hoencke, was tried without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff.

The evidence shows that appellant has a complete chain of title to the land from the heirs of John Hartgraves, to whom the land was patented in 1862. In 1880 T. H. Tanner asserted claim to the land and put a few acres in a field. In 1882 or 1883 he built a to the year 1902. On February 7, 1886, T. H. Tanner executed a deed conveying the land to his son, L. M. Tanner. This deed describes the land as the John Hartgraves survey of 210 acres, and also describes it by metes and bounds just as it is described in the patent. The deed was acknowledged on February 12, 1894, and duly recorded in the deed records of Liberty county on February 26, 1894. On March 16, 1907, L. M. Tanner and wife conveyed the land to appellee. When T. H. Tanner first went upon the land, he thought it was vacant land, and L. M. Tanner testified that he thought it was vacant public land at the time he bought it from his father in 1883 and did not know that he was buying the Hartgraves survey; that he intended to pre-empt it until he found out a year or two after his purchase that it had been patented to the heirs of Hartgraves. In May, 1894, L. M. Tanner married, and after his marriage he lived on the place until January, 1902. T. H. Tanner claimed the land at all times prior to the sale to his son, L. M. Tanner, and the latter held and claimed it as his own up to the time he conveyed it to appellee. He paid taxes on it from 1891 to 1906, inclusive, and in 1900 he redeemed it from tax sale to the state for taxes due thereon for the years from 1887 to 1889, inclusive. The receipt for 1899 shows that the taxes were paid on 182 acres of the land, and the 1906 receipt is for taxes on 163 acres. L. M. Tanner testified that the taxes were not paid on the entire tract because he had sold off a portion. The only deed of conveyance shown from him was the deed to appellee, which, as before stated, conveys the entire tract.

By his first assignment of error, the appellant complains of the judgment on the ground that it having been shown by the undisputed evidence that, at the time the Tanners took possession of the land, they thought it was vacant public land, no title by limitation could be acquired by their possession. The assignment is without merit. It is now settled that one can acquire title to the land of another by limitation, notwithstanding the fact that at the time he takes possession he believes the land to be vacant public land and intends to acquire it from the state. If he actually holds and claims the land against all the world except the state, his possession is adverse, and, if continued for the length of time required by the statute, will ripen into title. Village Mills v. Manley (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 102; Morgan v. White (Tex. Civ. App.) 110 S. W. 491. This question, however, does not arise upon the facts of this case, because the evidence before set out shows that the adverse possession of L. M. Tanner continused for more than 10 years after he discovered that the land was not public land, and that it had been patented to the Hartgraves heirs.

The second assignment of error is as follows: "The court erred in rendering judgment for plaintiff, because the evidence shows that, during the time the plaintiff and those under whom she holds attempted to acquire title by limitation, the superior title to the property in controversy was held by the heirs of John Hartgraves, deceased, who were married women and minors, and that this defendant holds title under a part of said heirs, and that the other title is outstanding against the plaintiff." There is no evidence that appellant's predecessors in title were under disability at the time the adverse possession of Tanner began. Mrs. Bynum, one of the appellant's grantors, was married in 1888, but as the evidence shows she was born in 1860, and that the adverse possession of the land began prior to her marriage, her coverture did not affect the running of the statute. In explanation of the tax receipts for 1899 and 1906 showing that he paid taxes on 182 acres for 1899 and 163 acres for 1906, L. M. Tanner testified that he had sold a part of the land. This is the only evidence in the record of an outstanding title to any portion of the land, and we do not think it is sufficient to raise the issue. Having conveyed the entire tract to the plaintiff by deed, Tanner's statement that he had previously sold a portion of the land, no previous deed from him being shown, and no particulars as to what land was sold or to whom, or under what circumstances the alleged sale was made, is insufficient to show any outstanding title to the land.

The third assignment of error is as follows: "The court erred in rendering judgment for the plaintiff, because the evidence fails to show that the plaintiff has had continuous adverse possession of the property in controversy under the statute of limitations for the period of time and manner required to acquire a title by limitation, in that: (a) Said possession has not been continuous and adverse; (b) during the period of said possession the plaintiff and those under whom she holds recognized the land as vacant public domain; (c) the title to the same was in married women under coverture and in minors during said period of pretended occupancy and limitation." The facts before stated, which are undisputed, establish none of the contentions upon which this assignment is based, and it cannot be sustained. We think the evidence is clearly sufficient to show title in appellee under both the five and ten year statute of limitation.

There being no error in the record, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

2. COUNTIES (§ 34*) — REMOVAL OF COUNTY SEAT—GEOGRAPHICAL CENTER—CERTIFICATE.

Under Const. art. 9, § 2, authorizing a county seat to be removed to a place within five miles of the center of the county, and under Rev. St. 1895, art. 813, authorizing the county commissioner to issue a certificate designating the center of the county, a certificate, designating the center of the county at a point within the boundaries of a 320-acre survey, near the center of such survey, is not indefinite by the use of the word "near," since it would be impracticable to determine the exact spot.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 35*) — REMOVAL OF COUNTY SEAT—GEOGRAPHICAL CENTER—ELECTIONS.

Const. art. 9, § 2, authorizes a county seat situated more than five miles from the geographical center of the county to be removed on a majority vote of the county electors to within five miles of the center, and a county seat to be removed to a place not the center on a two-thirds vote. Rev. St. 1895, art. 813, provides that the county commissioners on notification by the county judge that an election is to be held shall designate the geographical center of the county. Article 815 authorizes the judge to count the votes, and declare the result of the election. On notification by a county judge, the commissioners designated the center of the county as near the center of a 320-acre survey. An election was held, and the judge counted the votes, and made an order declaring the result of the election to be that the county seat be removed from W. to A., and the record showed nothing further. Held, that it could not be contended that the order was absolutely void because the judge acted as a court of limited jurisdiction, and the record should have shown that there was a determination that A. was within five miles of the geographical center as designated, since his jurisdiction to declare the result did not depend upon the existence of that fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

4. COUNTIES (§ 35*) — REMOVAL OF COUNTY SEAT—ELECTIONS—GEOGRAPHICAL CENTER.

Neither was it permissible to render the order void for the judge to testify that in making the order he did not determine that A. was within five miles of the center designated, since his finding on a majority vote that the election resulted in favor of A. included a determination that it was within the limits, which determination, though not conclusive, could not be questioned where no evidence was introduced to show that A. was, in fact, not within five miles of the center.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

5. COUNTIES (§ 34*) — REMOVAL OF COUNTY SEAT—DETERMINATION OF GEOGRAPHICAL CENTER.

Held, also, that the commissioners in designating the center of the county were not authorized to exclude from consideration in determining the center that part of the county covered by water, navigable or otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

6. COUNTIES (§ 34*) — REMOVAL OF COUNTY SEATS — GEOGRAPHICAL CENTER — CERTIFICATE.

The certificate of land commissioners in fixing such center is conclusive, and evidence is inadmissible to show that the center so fixed is, in fact, not the geographical center.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

7. COUNTIES (§ 35*) — REMOVAL OF COUNTY SEAT—ELECTIONS—GEOGRAPHICAL CENTER.

Held, also, that since, under the Constitution, a two-thirds vote was required to change a county seat to a place not within the five-mile limit, the finding of the county judge was not conclusive that A. was in fact within the five-mile limit, but, where no attempt had been made to show that A. was not within five miles of the center, the finding could not be attacked because no determination had been made that A. was within the limits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

8. JUDGMENT (§ 739*)—BAR—"ELECTION" CONTEST—ENJOINING THE ISSUANCE OF BONDS.

The word "election," as used in Rev. St. 1895, arts. 1804t, 1804u, authorizing a contest of an election to remove a county seat, means the act of casting and receiving the ballots from voters, counting ballots, and making return thereof; and hence an election contest is no bar to an equitable proceeding brought after the result of the contest to enjoin the issuance of bonds relating to the county seat removal, brought by parties other than plaintiff in the election contest, on the ground that the preparatory proceedings were void.

Appeal from District Court, Chambers County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Suit by T. A. Kilgore and others against H. H. Jackson and others to enjoin the issuance of county bonds. From a judgment for defendants entered on a directed verdict, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Stevens & Pickett and J. R. Davis, for appellants. A. D. Lipscomb, for appellees.

REESE, J. In this case T. A. Kilgore and a number of other plaintiffs, property taxpayers of Chambers county, seek to enjoin the defendants, who are the county judge and four county commissioners of said county, from ordering an election to submit to the qualified voters of the county the questions of the issuance of bonds for the erection of a courthouse and jail, either in the town of Anahuac or in what is called the "Wilcox Addition" to said town, and from making any order whatsoever in regard to such bond issue. Plaintiffs also seek by mandatory writ to compel defendants to rescind their former order removing the county seat from Wallisville to Anahuac, and to return at once to Wallisville the public records, which had been removed to Anahuac, and to re-establish the county seat at the former place. The suit is the aftermath of an election ordered and held in 1907 to determine whether the county seat of Chambers county should be removed from Wallisville, where it had been located for more than 40 years, to the town of Anahuac. At that election a majority of the votes cast—but not two-thirds—were in favor of the removal, and the result was accordingly so declared. There was a statutory contest of the election upon the grounds, among others, that the geographical center of the county had not been properly designated, and that Anahuac was not shown to be, and was not, in fact, within five miles of the geographical center of the county, which was necessary to authorize the removal by a majority vote. The contest was decided against contestants, and, upon appeal to this court, the judgment was affirmed. Wallis v. Williams (Tex. Civ. App.) 110 S. W. 785. In the present case it is alleged that the proceedings and the order of removal were void on the grounds, first, that the land commissioner did not, before the election was held and declared, or at any time, designate the geographical center of the county in the manner provided by statute, and which, it is alleged, was a condition precedent to such election and removal; second, that at no time was any evidence offered before the county judge or the commissioners' court in regard to the location of the geographical center of the county, or the distance of Wallisville or Anahuac therefrom, and no determination of this question was ever made by the county judge or the commissioners' court; and, third, that the town of Anahuac is, in fact, more than five miles from such geographical center, that less than two-thirds of said votes were for such removal. Defendants answered by general denial, general and special demurrers, and pleaded specially the proceedings and judgment in the contest proceedings in bar of the action. Upon trial with a jury, after the evidence and argument had been heard, the court charged the jury to return a verdict for defendants, which was done. From the judgment plaintiffs appeal.

By their first assignment of error, appellants bring in question the action of the court in instructing the jury to return a verdict for defendants, because, as set out in the assignment, the evidence offered, and that erroneously excluded, was sufficient to show that no valid election had been held, and that all acts of the county judge and commissioners' court in the premises were void. The first proposition under this assignment is based upon the alleged insufficiency of the certificate of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, designating the geographical center of the county as provided by article 9, § 2, Const., and article 813, Rev. St. 1895. The certificate of the commissioner in proper form designated the center of the county "to be a point within the boundaries of the R. O. W. McManus 320-acre survey, near the center of said survey." The proposition turns upon the alleged indefiniteness of the designation as being "near" the center of the survey referred to; and it is insisted that this is not a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the law. "Near" is defined by Webster to mean "adjacent to, close by, not far from." "It is a relative term, and its precise import can only be determined by surrounding facts and circumstances." Barrett v. Schuyler County Court, 44 Mo. 202. The land commissioner is required to designate the center of the county "from the maps, surveys, and other data on file in his office." A moment's consideration of the sources from which he must get his information will suffice to show that it is not practically possible that the commissioner should determine with absolute accuracy the precise location of this point. Some certain square inch of ground is, in fact, the geographical center of the county, but the location of this point would be practically impossible of determination. Some margin must be allowed, and it was the intention of the law should be allowed, on this account. Appellants do not contend otherwise. Now we know that 320 acres is a piece of ground, if in a square form, approximately 1,240 yards square. Whatever the form relative to the area of the county it occupies a very small space. A point which would be in the ordinary meaning of the term be "near" the center of this relatively small space would, we think, be sufficiently definite for all practical purposes as a designation of the center of the county, taking into consideration the purpose for which the designation is made, and the means by which the land commissioner is required to determine the question. A more definite designation is not practicable.

The second proposition under this assignment is that appellants as taxpayers have the right to prosecute this action. We do not understand that this is questioned by appellees. The second assignment of error complains of the refusal of the trial court to admit evidence offered by appellants to the effect that at no time prior to ordering the election or declaring the result was any evidence offered before the county judge or commissioners' court in regard to the distance of Wallisville or Anahuac from the center of the county, and that it was never at any time determined that Anahuac was within five miles of the center of the county, or that Wallisville was more than five miles from such point. The election was ordered by the county judge and the returns made to him. He then counted the votes, with the result that there appeared to have been cast for Anahuac 390 votes and for Wallisville 244 votes. After tabulating the votes with the above result, the order of the county judge adds: "Showing a majority in favor of removal to Anahuac of 146. And the result of said election is hereby declared against Wallisville and in favor of Anahuac." The proposition is stated under this assignment that the county judge in this matter was acting as a court of limited jurisdiction; and that it not appearing, from the face of the whole record, that the fact was found to exist that Anahuac was within five miles of the geographical center, which was essential to the exercise of his jurisdiction, his order was an absolute nullity. This view has been pressed upon the court by counsel for appellants, both in oral argument and by printed brief, evidencing diligent and extensive research, but we do not think the proposition sound in the application sought to be made of it here. The unsoundness of appellants' contention lies in the fact that the jurisdiction—that is, the power to hear and determine the matter—does not depend upon the establishment or the existence of the fact as to the distances from Anahuac and Wallisville to the center of the county. Nor was it essential to the jurisdiction of the county judge to declare the result in favor of Anahuac that it should have been established that Anahuac was within five miles of the center. The order for the election and the counting of the votes were jurisdictional facts, and, without these, it might be said that the county judge was without jurisdiction to declare the result, but his jurisdiction to declare the result in favor of Anahuac did not depend upon the existence of facts necessary to a proper decision of the question. If it were so, then the power to determine the existence or not of the fact would depend upon whether the fact existed. We cannot undertake to review the numerous authorities cited by appellants in support of this view of the law, but an examination of many of them show that they are fundamentally inapplicable to the case here presented.

Appellants' second proposition is that, before the county judge could have declared the result of the election in favor of Anahuac upon a majority vote, he must have determined that Anahuac was within five miles of the geographical center as designated by the land commissioner; that, if he did not do so, his order was void, and the court erred in refusing to allow appellants to prove this fact by the testimony of the county judge. We think it is a sufficient reply to this that a finding by the county judge upon a majority vote in favor of Anahuac that the result was in favor of Anahuac, and a judicial declaration of this fact necessarily included a finding of the fact that Anahuac was within five miles of the center of the county. He had the power to determine this question. It was necessary that he should do so in order correctly to determine the result of the election, and, having made the order which he could not properly have made unless the fact existed, he should not not hold that this finding, even if it had been specifically and affirmatively embodied in the order was, or would have been, conclusive upon plaintiffs, but at least it was sufficient to throw upon them the burden of showing that the facts did not exist which authorized the removal upon a majority vote, and this they did not even attempt to do. No evidence was introduced nor offered tending to show that Wallisville was, or that Anahuac was not, within five miles of the geographical center. Appellants' contention rests, not upon the nonexistence of the facts, but upon the alleged failure of the county judge to make inquiry and determine their existence, and to embody in his order a specific finding as to those facts. What we have said disposes of the second proposition under this assignment. Whether any evidence was heard by the county judge or not, the declaration of the result in favor of Anahuac necessarily involves a finding that the facts necessary to such result existed.

We think it is of controlling significance that appellants did not attempt by evidence to contradict the existence of the facts necessary to authorize the removal on a majority vote in so far as such result depended upon the distance of Wallisville or Anahuac from the center of the county as designated by the land commissioner. Appellants offered testimony to show that, excluding all that part of Chambers county covered by the navigable waters of Trinity Bay, the center of the county was more than five miles from Anahuac, and also to show that, including this area, the center could not be located within the boundaries of the McManus survey. This evidence was excluded upon objection of appellees, to which appellants excepted; and the ruling is complained of by the third assignment of error. As to the first question presented, we think it is sufficient to say that the law makes no provision for excluding from consideration in determining the geographical center of the county that part of the territory covered by waters, navigable or otherwise, of the bay which, according to the boundaries of the county, as fixed by the Legislature, are within such territory. We doubt if it is possible for the land commissioner to determine from the maps, survey, and other data in his office the area covered by such waters. As to the second question, it seems to have been the intention of the provision of the Constitution and of the statute to make the certificate of the land commissioner conclusive as to the location of the geographical center. This seems to have been the view taken by the trial court in excluding the evi-defendants, the certified copy of the official map of Chambers county, and the testimony of W. B. Gordor that Trinity (or Galveston) Bay is a body of navigable water over which shipping and commerce of various kinds is carried on.

Under the third, fourth, and fifth assignments of error appellants urge the following proposition: "A county seat cannot be removed to a place not within five miles of the center of the county if it has received less than two-thirds of the votes cast, and although the county judge has declared the result in favor of such place, and removal of county seat thereto has been ordered by the commissioners' court, the result so declared is void, and the attempted removal illegal, and proof is admissible to show that such place is more than five miles distant from the center of the county." We understand appellants' contention under this proposition to be that they should have been allowed to show, first, where the center of the county is located, regardless of the certificate of the land commissioner; and, second, that Anahuac is not within five miles of such point, and that, if such facts are shown, the order of the county judge must be held to be void. The meat of appellants' case seems to be embraced in this proposition. We do not think it sound. The most that can be said for appellants upon this point is that they might have shown that Anahuac was not, in fact, within five miles of the point designated by the land commissioner as the geographical center of the county—that is, that the finding of the county judge necessarily included in his declaration of the result was not conclusive on this point—but this fact appellants did not attempt to prove. We are not inclined to hold that the proceedings and judgment in the contest proceeding brought by parties other than plaintiffs in this case can be urged as a bar to the present proceeding. That was a special proceeding which could only be instituted by residents of the county. Articles 1804t, 1804u, Rev. St. We are inclined to think that the doctrine announced by the Supreme Court in Norman v. Thompson, 96 Tex. 250, 72 S. W. 62, applies to a contest of an election for the location of a county seat. The contest in that case was of a local option election under a statute relating alone to such elections. After quoting the statute (article 3397) the court says: "As used in the foregoing article, the term 'election' means the act of casting and receiving the ballots from the voters, counting the ballots, and making returns thereof. State v. Tucker, 54 Ala. 210. That is the meaning of the word 'election' in ordinary usage, and it must be so construed; there being nothing in the law to suggest that the Legislature intended to use it in a different sense. On the contrary, wherever the word 'election' appears in the acts of the Legislature upon this subject, it seems to have in view those things to be done on the day of the election in contradistinction to the acts which are to be done preparatory to the election." It would appear that the word "election," as used in the statute under which the contest of this county seat election was instituted, was used in the same sense, and, if so, in such contest nothing could have been properly inquired into except what occurred on the day of election, and there could not properly have been adjudicated in that case the issues presented in the present case, which is an equitable action which can be prosecuted by any person affected in his property rights by the levy and collection of taxes for payment of the expenses alleged to be about to be unlawfully incurred by reason of the void proceedings resulting in the removal of the county seat. We think, however, that it is immaterial to the decision of this case, whether or not appellants are bound by the judgment in the contested election case. If that proceeding had never been instituted, still they have failed to show any ground for declaring the order of removal void. It may be remarked here, however, that it was made one of the grounds of the contest that Anahuac was more than five miles from the geographical center of the county, which was decided against contestants. It was held by this court (Wallis v. Williams, supra) that the burden of proof on this issue was upon contestants, but it was also held that the evidence submitted in that case was sufficient to establish that Anahuac was within five miles of the center.

The uncontradicted evidence shows that what is laid down on a plat, made out and recorded before the election was ordered or held, as the Wilcox addition to the town Anahuac, is, in fact, a part of what has been known as the town of Anahuac for 40 years or more. It is at this place, spoken of as Wilcox addition, that the commissioners' court propose to erect the courthouse and jail. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the post office, school, boat landing, business houses, and, in fact, what may be called the town of Anahuac, has always been, and is now, located on what is now this Wilcox addition, which has been known as "Anahuac." This testimony is undisputed, and goes back to a period before the Civil War. It leaves no room for doubt or question that this is the place to which the voters intended that the courthouse should be removed.

There is no merit in the seventh and eighth assignments of error, raising the question of the right of the commissioners to place the court and jail on this "Wilcox addition." None of the assignments of error or the various propositions thereunder present any grounds for reversal; and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

TEXAS & P. RY. CO. et al. v. RANKIN.
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 22, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 230*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK — CONNECTING CARRIERS — BURDEN OF PROOF — INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against three connecting railroad companies to recover damages to a car load of native cattle not subject to quarantine regulations, diverted to and delayed at quarantine pens, the court instructed that, if the jury found that the initial carrier delivered the cattle to the intermediate carrier "in the usual and customary manner for the delivery of native cattle," the burden of proof was on the intermediate carrier to show by a preponderance of the evidence that it in turn delivered the cattle to the delivering carrier "in the usual and customary manner for delivering native cattle." Held, that the instruction was erroneous, as the burden was upon plaintiff throughout the trial notwithstanding the prima facie case made by plaintiff; such prima facie case not creating a presumption of negligence.

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 121*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—RULE AS TO SHIFTING OF BURDEN.

The rule that where a plaintiff, on whom is cast the burden of affirmatively showing negligence, has shown such a state of facts as legally constitutes a prima facie case, defendant is then required to rebut the prima facie case or be cast in judgment, does not mean that such prima facie case creates a presumption of negligence on the part of defendant.

3. CARRIERS (§ 228*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK — ACTIONS AGAINST CONNECTING CARRIERS — INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against connecting carriers for injuries caused by delivering the cattle at the wrong place, an instruction that the burden of proof is upon the initial carrier to show by a preponderance of testimony that it delivered the cattle to the consignee at their destination was error, as the burden of proof was on plaintiff to show the negligence of the carriers.

LEVY, J. The suit was brought against the three railroad companies for alleged damages to a shipment of two cars of steer cattle and one car of calves from Midland, Tex., to Kansas City, Mo. It was claimed by the appellee: That he directed the Texas & Pacific Railway Company in shipping the cattle from Midland, Tex., to bill the steer cattle to Kansas City, Mo., and the calves to Ft. Worth, Tex.; that the said company negligently disregarded said billing instructions and diverted one car of the steer cattle to Ft. Worth and shipped the other car of steer cattle and the car of calves to Kansas City, Mo.; that the car of steer cattle diverted to Ft. Worth were "native" cattle and not subject to quarantine regulations, and were so billed and known by appellants, and, after being negligently delayed at Ft. Worth for two days, were by the appellants finally carried to Kansas City, Mo., and there negligently unloaded in "quarantine pens," which fact lessened their value on the market.

The appellant the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas complains of the following portion of the court's charge to the jury: "If you find that the Texas & Pacific Railway Company delivered said steers to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas in the usual and customary manner for the delivery of 'native' cattle, then the burden of proof is on the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas to show by a preponderance of the evidence that it in turn delivered said steers to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company in the usual and customary manner for delivering 'native' cattle to said Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and upon all other questions the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show by a preponderance of evidence his right to recover." The effect of the charge was to tell the jury that, if the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas did not prove "by a preponderance of the evidence" that it had delivered the cattle "in the usual and customary manner for delivering 'native' cattle" to its next succeeding carrier, a verdict should be returned against it. We think this was error in the case. The suit was one founded on negligence, and the burden was upon the appellee throughout the progress of the trial to prove the facts constituting the negligence alleged; and to require the appellant to prove "by a preponderance of the evidence" that it was not negligent in the respect charged was more onerous than authorized by the rules of law, and misleading to the jury. The very question of negligence in issue before the jury was that of causing "native" cattle not subject to quarantine to be wrongfully placed in "quarantine pens," thereby causing damages to appellee. Appellee argues, in effect, in support of the charge given, that when the cattle were shown to have been received by the initial carrier in good condition and healthy, and were delivered at destination by connecting carriers in bad condition as diseased or "quarantine" cattle, it devolved the duty on the appellant to explain or justify the injury. Under such proof, as stated by appellee, it would be true as a legal contention that there was then devolved upon the appellant the duty, in the sense of being required to offer evidence, in order to escape liability to rebut the prima facie case thus cast on it by the proof of appellee. Such facts stated by the appellee would only be prima facie evidence, and not a presumption of law, that appellant caused the particular injury complained of. It is a rule of evidence, for the guidance of the parties in offering proof in a case and for the court and not the jury, that, where a plaintiff on whom is cast the burden of affirmatively showing the particular negligence alleged has shown such a state of facts as legally constitutes a prima facie case, the defendant is then required to rebut or controvert the prima facie case by evidence; otherwise he will be cast in the judgment. As said by the court in Clark v. Hills, 67 Tex. at page 149, 2 S. W. at page 361: "That a party does not shift to his adversary the burden of proof by making out a prima facie case is clear from what we have said, and is a well-settled principle." As said in the case of Heinemann v. Heard, 62 N. Y. 455: "During the progress of a trial it often happens that a party gives evidence tending to establish his allegation, sufficient it may be to establish a prima facie case, and it is sometimes said that the burden of proof is then shifted. All that is meant by this is that there is a necessity of evidence to answer the prima facie case, or it will prevail. But then the burden of maintaining the affirmative of the issue involved in the action is upon the party alleging the fact which constitutes the issue, and this burden remains throughout the trial." The authorities cited by the appellee in referring to the burden of proof do not undertake to lay down the rule that it is proper to instruct the jury, or that they should be instructed, that when a prima facie case is made out by the plaintiff the burden is then shifted to defendant to rebut same; but the cases undertake merely to state or announce a rule of evidence governing the burden of proof. It is not within the province of the court to so charge the jury on this rule of evidence as being on the weight of evidence.

The appellant the Texas & Pacific Railway Company complains of the court's charge in instructing the jury that "the burden of proof is upon the Texas & Pacific Railway Company to show by a preponderance of testimony that it delivered the calves in question in this suit to the consignees at their destination." This was error. In order to recover on the contract of shipment it was essential for the appellee, in order to make out a case of liability, to show that there was a breach of the contract. Even if the appellant could be held to be an insurer by reason of diversion of shipping route, which we do not undertake to say one way or the other, the breach of the contract to deliver would still have to be proven by appellee.

There are other assignments of error based on the sufficiency of the evidence, which we think would require a reversal of the case; but as the questions may not be presented or arise on another trial, and in view of the disposition made of the appeal, we do not undertake to rule upon the same.

A judgment was rendered in favor of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and they appear and ask an affirmation of the same in their favor, which is accordingly done. The case as to the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas is ordered reversed and remanded for another trial.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

A mine operator failed to construct an appliance to prevent water cars from being pushed into a shaft. An employé engaged in emptying the water cars was killed by falling into the shaft. He had worked around the mouth of the shaft for a number of months, and he knew that there was no appliance to prevent cars from falling into the shaft if pushed therein in the absence of the cage. There was nothing to show that it was the duty of the operators of the cage not to remove it while the employé was emptying the water cars. The absence of the cage was apparent to the employé if he paid any attention. Held, that the employé assumed the risk as a matter of law.

Appeal from District Court, Palo Pinto County; W. J. Oxford, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Ella Holt and others against the Mt. Marion Coal Mining Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

John W. Wray, for appellant. W. P. Gibbs, A. Stevenson, and E. B. Ritchie, for appellees.

CONNER, C. J. Appellee Mrs. Ella Holt is the surviving wife, and the remaining appellees are the surviving children, of James Holt, who on about April 30, 1904, fell into one of appellant's mining shafts, and as a result thereof was killed. They recovered a judgment in the sum of $4,500, from which this appeal has been prosecuted.

Substantially the only question presented to us is the sufficiency of the evidence to authorize the submission of the case to the jury. Appellees thus state the evidence upon which the judgment rests:

"The shaft of defendant's mine was divided into two compartments by a heavy wooden partition; each being about 6x8 feet in size. There were two landings above the surface, one at the ground and one above, called the tippie; the latter being 15 or 18 feet above the former. At the top landing or tippie, the coal, slate, etc., were dumped, and at the ground or lower landing the water was dumped. The mouth of the shaft at the ground landing was fenced on three sides; the side where the water cars were taken off being open, and the fence being of pickets 1 by 4 in size and about 4 feet high. There were large pillars around the mouth of the shaft supporting the tippie, etc., above; also, guides at the sides of the shaft for holding the cage in position. The cages were 4-10 by 6-1, and consisted of a floor and top, the latter made of a solid flat sheet of iron, the floor and top being connected by iron rods at the four corners of the cage. And the roof is a little smaller than the floor, is flat, and is about 6½ feet from the floor. Witnesses Poole and Warren estimated that the roof was 7 or 8 feet above the floor. There was nothing visible about the cage when standing at the landing except the floor and the top, or bonnet. At the ground landing there was a flat sheet, made of iron, some 12x15 feet or more in dimensions, on which was a track corresponding to the track on the cage. According to the witness Warren, the box of the water car was about 6 feet long and 3 feet deep, and the cars about 3½ or 4 feet high, were built of 2-inch stuff and were heavy, especially when wet and soggy. Witness Brookline testified that the trucks of the cars were 12 inches in diameter, and that the cars were 22 inches deep, making a total height of 28 inches. Witness Poole testified that he had made some of the cars, and that they were about 5 feet long and 24 or 25 inches deep and about 3 feet from the ground, and weighed 400 or 500 pounds. Witness Warren testified that it was his understanding that the boss had assigned to Holt the duty of emptying the water cars on the day he was killed. It was some time in the afternoon when he fell into the shaft. He had no regular line of duty, but did whatever was assigned to him to do. Brookline testified that Holt's duties at the time of his death were to take off the water and slate cars and dump them. The slate cars were dumped at the upper landing or tippie. Witness Geyer testified that he was the father-in-law of Holt, that Holt had been at work at appellant's mine more than a year, and that he had never seen him pulling off water cars at any time during that period.

"At the time Holt was killed, there were no bars or gates guarding the entrance to the mouth of the shaft. Witness Poole testified, among other things, as follows: 'Some two or three months before Holt was killed, I had a conversation with Mr. Whittsell, the superintendent, about the matter of putting up some protection there. We were working seven days in the week then, and I asked him one Sunday morning if he could not provide some way to get gates there at the opening where the cars were handled, for the protection of the people who worked about the mouth of the shaft. He told me that after we got to the coal he would fix it so that nothing would fall in. We were then within eight or ten feet of the coal. At the time of Holt's death, if there was any protection or gate there to keep anything from going into the shaft, I don't know it. There was a protection put up there after Holt fell in. I do not remember how long after Holt's death, but it was only a few days.' Witness Geyer testified that between Monday and Friday following Holt's death a bar was placed at the entrance of the shaft. Witness Walter Warren, weighing clerk for appellant at the time, testified that there were bars at the entrance of the shaft to prevent the cars from running back into the shaft when the cage was not in position, but did not know whether they were there the day Holt was killed or not, and that when the bar was in position nothing could go into the shaft, a car nor anything else. Witness Brookline, mine foreman of appellant at the time, testified, in substance, to the same facts; also, that the men had orders to close the gate every time they pull a car off the cage, even if the car is off only for a moment. Following the death of Holt, marks were found on the flat sheet where the accident occurred that appeared to have been made by Holt trying to hold back the car which was precipitated into the shaft. Witness Poole testified that they commenced about 4½ feet from the shaft and ended about three feet from it. Holt wore heavy miner's shoes with heavy roundhead-ed tacks in them. James Holt testified that he examined the landing, etc., about three hours after Holt's death, and that the surface was slick and wet, and looked slippery. In returning the water car to the cage, Holt, or any one doing that work, would push the car, and would be more or less in a stooping position, and in pushing the car back to the shaft it would be between him and the opening. Witness Poole further testified as follows: 'It would be owing to what kind of a start a man gave the car, as to how much force it would take to stop it in returning to the cage. If he pushed it fast, he would have to hang on to it pretty hard to stop it. It has considerable weight and would be hard to hold. I am not sure about the track of this water car, but I think it was on a level all the way from the landing to the dumping place. I have sometimes used considerable effort to stop the car.' Further, that he had handled the water cars himself when not doing other work, and that at the time of the trial the company was not using the cars, but was using pumps instead."

After careful consideration we feel constrained to sustain appellant's first assignment of error, complaining of the court's refusal to give to the jury a special requested instruction to find for appellant. The only negligence alleged that has any support whatever in the evidence is the "failure of the defendant to construct a good and safe appliance or stops to prevent said water car from being pushed into said shaft." Assuming this to constitute negligence, the absence of such "appliance or stops" must have been perfectly obvious to the deceased. The evidence is undisputed that he had worked around the mouth of the shaft a number of months, and, if he never before was engaged in emptying water cars, he must have known, without greater experience than the day had afforded him, of the weight of the water car, the condition of the platform upon which it was operated at the surface, the fact that there were no stops, and that the car would inevitably fall into the mouth of the shaft if pushed therein in the absence of the cage. There is nothing in the evidence indicating that it was the duty of those operating the cage not to remove it while the deceased was emptying the water car, and its absence, with any degree of attention, must have been apparent to James Holt before the car fell. Indeed, actual knowledge of the absence of the cage is indicated by the hobnail marks on the flat iron sheet at the mouth of the shaft. The dangers arising out of this situation, it seems to us, were such as were apparent to any person of sound mind acting with due care, and of the experience the deceased was shown to have. So that we are forced to the conclusion that we must attribute to James Holt not only a knowledge of the facts relied upon as establishing negligence on appellant's part, but also knowledge of the dangers arising therefrom. Hence, under a long line of decisions, he assumed the risks of the situation so known to him, and appellees are without right of recovery. See Klutts v. Gibson Bros., 37 Tex. Civ. App. 216, 83 S. W. 404; Smith v. Armour, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 633, 84 S. W. 676; Bryan v. Intr. Ry. (Tex. Civ. App.) 90 S. W. 696; T. & P. Ry. v. Bradford, 66 Tex. 732, 2 S. W. 595, 59 Am. Rep. 639; Railway v. Somers, 78 Tex. 441, 14 S. W. 779; Lake v. Furnace Co. (C. C. A.) 160 Fed. 892; Nat. Biscuit Co. v. Nolan, 138 Fed. 12, 70 C. C. A. 436; Railway Co. v. Burton (Tex. Civ. App.) 115 S. W. 368; Railway v. Hynson (Tex.) 109 S. W. 930; Ramm v. Railway (Tex. Civ. App.) 92 S. W. 427, 428.

In addition to what we have above said, it is by no means clear from the evidence that want of stops for the water cars had any causal connection with James Holt's death. The fact that he fell into the shaft was not a necessary sequence of the car's fall. If he was in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, as we must attribute to him, certainly he would have let the car go and saved himself. There is nothing in the evidence to indicate that he was in front of the car, and thereby thrown in. It may have been that, without observing the absence of the cage, he gave the car considerable momentum, that some part of his clothing caught upon some projection of the car, and that he was thus dragged to his death. Or it may have been that the deceased did not observe the absence of the cage until the car was near the mouth of the shaft, and that in his effort to prevent the car from falling he slipped and fell in after it. But no person seems to have seen James Holt immediately preceding his fall, or to know just what he was doing, or how the unfortunate occurrence happened, so that it can only be conjectured, and the case on the issue of proximate cause seems to fall within the principle applied by our Supreme Court in the case of the Tex. & Pac. Ry. v. Shoemaker, 98 Tex. 451, 84 S. W. 1049.

On the whole we conclude that the court should have given the peremptory instruction requested, and that the judgment must be reversed and here rendered for appellant.

NORTHERN TEXAS TRACTION CO. v. HUNT.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 13, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 10, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL TO GIVE INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY CHARGE GIVEN.

It is not error to refuse a requested charge embraced in the charge given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

2. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—COLLISIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in an action for injuries in a collision with a street car, authorizing a verdict for defendant on plaintiff's act in driving suddenly in front of the car proximately contributing to the injury, whether the act was negligently done or not, was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 268; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—COLLISIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFORMITY TO ISSUES.

Where, in an action for injuries in a street car collision, defendant limited the issue of contributory negligence to plaintiff's act in driving suddenly in front of the approaching car without looking or listening, an instruction submitting the phase of contributory negligence because of plaintiff's failure to look or listen for an approaching car after he went on the track was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 268, 269; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

4. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—COLLISIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS.

In an action for injuries in a collision with a street car, a petition, which alleges that plaintiff was traveling to his home and was riding on the track or partly thereon, and an answer, which alleges that plaintiff was proceeding along the street near to the track, are sufficient to authorize an instruction submitting the question of plaintiff's driving in close proximity to the track.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—REVIEW.

An assignment that the court erred in giving a charge because of the absence of evidence on which to base it, not followed by any statement of the evidence, may be disregarded on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

6. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—COLLISIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries in a collision with a street car, defendant pleaded and proved that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in driving suddenly in front of the approaching car, an instruction authorizing a verdict for plaintiff on the issue of contributory negligence, if he at and just before the happening of the accident was in the exercise of ordinary care, referred to the act of his driving suddenly in front of the moving car and was justified by the pleadings and evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 268; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

7. STREET RAILROADS (§ 98*)—USE OF STREETS BY PEDESTRIANS—CARE REQUIRED.

A person need not always look and listen for approaching cars before going on a street railroad track, though in a given case ordinary care may require the exercise of such diligence; but the measure of ordinary care may be satisfied by the exercise of either the sense of hearing or sight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 208; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

8. STREET RAILROADS (§ 111*)—COLLISIONS—PETITION—EVIDENCE.

A petition, in an action for injuries in a collision with a street car, which alleged that the car was being propelled at the rate of 15 miles per hour in violation of a city ordinance forbidding a greater speed than seven miles an hour, was sufficient, in the absence of an ex-

MEASURE OF DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in an action for personal injuries, authorizing a recovery of such sum as the jury believed to be a fair and reasonable compensation for plaintiff's injuries, and that the jury in determining the reasonable compensation might consider the impairment, if any, plaintiff would suffer in the future, in the use of his arm injured in the accident complained of, correctly charged on the measure of damages, in the absence of any requested charge on the subject.

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; W. T. Simmons, Judge.

Action by Phineas W. Hunt against the Northern Texas Traction Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Capps, Cantey, Hanger & Short, for appellant. McLean & Carlock, for appellee.

SPEER, J. Appellee recovered judgment against appellant for personal injuries received by being run over by one of appellant's street cars in the city of Ft. Worth, to revise errors in which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The grounds of negligence alleged and submitted were that the defendant company was operating its car at a speed in excess of the speed allowed by an ordinance of the city of Ft. Worth, and that its operatives were negligent in not keeping a lookout to discover the plaintiff and warn him of the approach of the car from his rear. In addition to the general issue, the defendant pleaded that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in turning suddenly and sharply immediately in front of its moving car without looking or listening for its approach. It is well to note the following paragraphs of the court's charge, since objections are lodged against them, or they support the trial court's rulings in refusing requested charges:

"(6) Or if you should find and believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was driving with his horse and a buggy south on St. Louis avenue upon or in close proximity to defendant's track on said street on the occasion of said accident, and that the defendant's motorman in charge of one of its moving cars approached the plaintiff from his rear and failed to keep proper and sufficient lookout for persons who might be using said street as the plaintiff then was, and failed to give sufficient warning of the approach of said car (if you should find he did so fail to do in the respects last mentioned), and if you further find that such act or omission, if any, on the part of the said defendant's motorman, was negligence under the circumstan-defendant under other instructions herein given you."

"(8) If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, without looking or listening for an approaching car from behind, drove suddenly on the track in front of said car and was guilty of negligence in so doing (if you believe he did so act), and that such negligence, if any, on his part proximately contributed to cause said accident to occur, then you will find for the defendant without regard to any other issue in the case.

"(9) If, on the other hand, you believe the plaintiff at the time or just before said accident happened did look or listen for an approaching car and did not drive suddenly in front of said car and was not guilty of negligence in these respects, and if you further believe that plaintiff at and just before the happening of said accident was in the exercise of ordinary care, then you will find against the defendant on its plea of contributory negligence of the plaintiff."

Appellant's first assignment of error is overruled because the requested charge on which it is based was sufficiently embraced in the charge already quoted, and because, for another reason, that it authorized a verdict for the defendant if the plaintiff's act in driving suddenly in front of defendant's car proximately contributed to his injury, whether such act was negligently done or not.

The second and third assignments are overruled because the phase of contributory negligence therein sought to be submitted was not raised by the pleadings in the case, the appellant having limited that issue to the act of appellee in driving suddenly in front of its moving car without looking or listening. It is nowhere alleged that appellee was guilty of negligence after he went on appellant's track in failing to look or listen for an approaching car.

Complaint is made of the sixth paragraph of the charge above quoted because it is said it was error to submit the question of appellee's driving in close proximity to the track when he had not pleaded such a case. Appellee's allegations on this point were "that plaintiff was traveling south to his home and was riding in his buggy as aforesaid on the track of said street railway, or partly on the same." But if this be not sufficient of itself to authorize the charge, the appellant itself nevertheless did plead "that plaintiff was proceeding south along said St. Louis avenue near to the tracks of this defendant on said street," etc. A buggy so near to the tracks of a street car company as to be struck by one of its cars, as appellee's was, is evidently in close proximity to the track, and the issue was therefore fully raised by the pleadings and evidence.

Appellant next insists that the court erred in the ninth paragraph of his charge in authorizing a verdict against it upon the issue of appellee's contributory negligence if he at and just before the happening of the accident was in the exercise of ordinary care; there being no evidence, so it contends, upon which to base such a charge. We would be justified in disregarding this assignment, seeing that it is not followed by any statement of the evidence from the record; but to consider it involves us in no difficulty, because appellant's interpretation of the charge is entirely too restricted. The time during which the charge requires appellee to have been in the exercise of ordinary care evidently refers to the act of his driving suddenly in front of appellant's moving car, as the issue was pleaded by appellant, and, as thus interpreted, the charge finds ample support both in the pleadings and the evidence. Nor can we say the charge is erroneous in permitting a verdict in favor of appellee if he looked or listened, instead of having required him to look and listen. We know of no law, either statutory or otherwise, that requires a person to look and listen for approaching cars before going upon a street railway track. In a given case ordinary care might require the exercise of such diligence, but, again, the measure of ordinary care might be satisfied by the exercise of either the sense of hearing or seeing. It is a question of fact and not of law at all.

There was no error in permitting appellee to introduce in evidence the ordinance of the city of Ft. Worth relating to the speed of street cars, since the general allegation of appellee's petition that appellant's street car was being propelled at the rate of 15 miles per hour, in violation of the ordinance of the city of Ft. Worth, which forbids and makes penal the running at a greater rate than seven miles per hour within the corporate limits of said city, was sufficient, especially in the absence of an exception.

Neither do we find any fault with the charge of the court as to the measure of damages. It merely authorized a recovery of such sum of money as the jury might believe to be "a fair and reasonable compensation" for appellee's injuries. We fail to see how any harm could come to appellant by the court's telling the jury that in determining this reasonable compensation they might take into consideration the impairment, if any, appellee would suffer in the future in the use of his arm. This in no wise violates the principle announced in F. W. & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Morrison, 93 Tex. 527, 56 S. W. 745, as we understand that decision. Abstractly, reasonable compensation is the rule of damages in all cases and can never be affirmatively erroneous; but, if the measure is not sufficiently definite, the omission in the charge should be supplied by a requested instruction.

We find no error in the judgment, and it is, accordingly, affirmed.

TEXAS & PACIFIC COAL CO. v. KOWSIKOWSKI.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Feb. 13, 1909. Rehearing Denied March 13, 1909.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where the cause of injury is under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if proper care is used, it affords reasonable evidence that the accident arose from want of care, and the question of negligence should be submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 808; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—QUESTION FOR JURY—NEGLIGENCE ON PART OF MASTER.

Evidence, in an action for the death of a trapper by the derailment of coal cars in defendant's mine, held sufficient to make defendant's negligence a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1026; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge authorizing the jury to allow a father such sum for the death of his minor son as would fairly compensate him for the pecuniary loss sustained, though technically erroneous as placing no limitation as to the period of time for which recovery could be had for loss of services, was not prejudicial to defendant, where no special charge on the subject was requested, and the son's wages up to the time of his maturity could not have been less than the amount of the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4228; Dec. Dig. § 1068.*]

Appeal from District Court, Palo Pinto County; W. J. Oxford, Judge.

Action by Frank Kowsikowski against the Texas & Pacific Coal Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John W. Wray, for appellant. W. P. Gibbs and E. B. Ritchie, for appellee.

CONNER, C. J. Appellee instituted this suit against appellant in the district court of Palo Pinto county, Tex., on the 22d day of October, 1907, alleging that appellant was operating a coal mine in Palo Pinto county, that his son was injured by derailment of coal cars caused by a defective switch, from which he died, that he was 16 years of age at the time, and contributed to the support of the family, etc., claiming damages in the sum of $10,000. Appellant answered: (1) By general denial; (2) that plaintiff hired his son to appellant to perform the very duties he was engaged in at the time of his death; (3) that in the performance of his duties the decedent gave the signal for the motorman going north to come; (4) that the derailing of the motor, resulting in the accident, was caused by the negligence of the decedent in not properly setting the switch; (5) that, if there was any defect in the switch, it was the duty of the decedent to give immediate notice, in which he failed. On the trial of the cause, the jury found for the plaintiff and assessed his damages at $600, for which a judgment was rendered.

The principal question pressed upon us in appellant's behalf is whether under the evidence the court should have peremptorily instructed the jury in appellant's favor as it requested. It is insisted that "the evidence totally failed to establish negligence on the part of appellant." The deceased was engaged as a trapper in one of appellant's coal mines at Thurber. The coal as mined was loaded on cars drawn by an electric motor operated by a motorman along lateral tunnels, and thence along main tunnels which terminated at the hoisting point, where the loaded cars were taken to the surface, unloaded, and returned. The deceased was employed in the north main entry, which extends north and south. From this main entry along each side there were a number of lateral tunnels, and it was the duty of deceased, who was but about 16 years old, among other things, to observe approaching trains, to arrange the switches to and from the laterals, and see that no train from a lateral was allowed to enter the main tunnel while a train on the main tunnel was running or about to run to or from the hoisting point. The switches were constructed of adjustable iron points some 18 inches or 2 feet long, fastened at the larger end on the inner sides of the main track by a rod or spike driven into the wooden cross-ties. The points were loose and adjusted to the rails, working on the rod or spike as a pivot, by the hand of the trapper so as to keep the main track clear or to admit of an entrance from the laterals, as the occasion should require. At the time in question, the deceased was at the junction of the main entry and the third lateral tunnel on the west. On the lateral track a train of coal cars had approached and stopped within about six feet of the main track. At the southern terminus of the main entry, some 300 or 400 feet away, a train of coal cars was starting for the hoisting point. The deceased was observed doing something with the switch point that was adjustable to the east rail of the main track. It must have been defective or out of order in some way, as the deceased, after pounding or striking upon it several times with a rock or something, picked it up and dropped it in the middle of the track, then hurriedly turned to the west, and endeavored to do something, not shown by the evidence, with the west switch point, when, to avoid the approaching train from the south, he jumped to the west at or near the front of the motor car standing on the lateral. He would thus have escaped injury, but for the fact that the train on the main line was derailed at this point, and the deceased was caught between the two motors and so injured that he died. The evidence fails to show affirmatively what, if anything, was wrong with the west switch point, or how long the east switch point had been out of order, or whether report of any defect had ever been made to the mine boss whose duty it was to repair. It also fails to show the speed of the train on the main track, save that the only eyewitness who testified said: "He come pretty quick." Nor does it affirmatively appear whether the deceased gave any signal, or whether the train on the main track gave any warning of its approach.

We are of opinion that the case on the merits is one falling within the rule applied in Washington v. M., K. & T. Ry. Co., 90 Tex. 314, 38 S. W. 764. The rule as quoted and approved in the case referred to is that: "Where the particular thing causing the injury has been shown to be under the management of the defendant, or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation, that the accident arose from want of care." There can be no pretense that the derailment of appellant's train was such as would happen in the ordinary course of mining operations. It was clearly within appellant's power, if true, to have shown that the speed of the approaching train was no greater than usual, and hence could not have reasonably been expected to result in or contribute to the accident. If warning of the approaching train was given by the operating motorman, or if deceased saw or heard it in time to have given an answering stop signal, the motorman, or some other one or more of appellant's employees that the evidence shows were present, could doubtless have so testified. If, in fact, the defect in the east switch point had nothing to do with the derailment, as appellant contends, it could and should have been made plain. The evidence tends to show that, in order for the main track to be clear, it was necessary to have the switch point pressed away from the east rail, and the west switch point pressed closely to the west rail. Appellant made no effort to show that the switch points were so in position, and hence that the deceased was unnecessarily trying to adjust them. We cannot assume that he was acting without ordinary care beyond the scope of his duty. Nor did appellant offer any witness to show the actual condition of the west switch point before or after the accident. Appellant's contention that it was without defect or want of repair rests alone upon a mere failure in the evidence to show otherwise. So with every other material contention made by appellant. They all, save when not refuted by evidence tending to show otherwise, rest upon mere inferences or upon mere silence on the subject. So that on the whole we think the evidence on the issue of appellant's liability required the submission of the case to the jury, and that in the absence of explanation, as in many particulars they are, the circumstances are sufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment.

The only further contention is that the court erred in giving the following charge on the measure of damages: "If, under the law as herein given you and the evidence submitted to you, you should find for the plaintiff, you will allow him such a sum of money, paid now, as will fairly compensate him for the pecuniary loss he has sustained in the death of the said Mike Kowalski." It is insisted that the charge is erroneous in that it placed "no limitation as to the period of time for which the plaintiff was entitled to recover for the loss of services of the deceased." If it be admitted that the charge quoted is technically erroneous, as under some circumstances it undoubtedly would be, we yet think it without prejudice in this case. Appellant requested no special charge on the subject, and it is undisputed that the deceased boy was but 16 years old at the time of his death. It is also further admitted that he had been receiving $1.13 a day, which was placed to the credit of appellant, with whom the deceased was living. So that appellant, as the father, was undoubtedly entitled to recover, if entitled to recover anything, the wages of his son up to the time of his maturity, some four or five years hence, the present value of which, in the natural order of events, and without reference to prospect of increase in wages, could not have been less than the amount of the verdict and judgment in this case.

We conclude that the judgment should be affirmed.

FT. WORTH LIGHT & POWER COMPANY et al. v. MOORE.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 8, 1909. On Rehearing, April 29, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURY TO EMPLOYE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

An experienced line man in the employ of a telephone company injured, while climbing one of its poles, by placing one hand on a messenger wire, which he knew to be grounded, and the other one on an iron step, in contact with which, as he could have seen, was an electric light wire of the city, which at such time should have been dead, but which was charged through contact, at a distance, with the wire of a third company, owing to its negligence, assumed the risk from the negligence of the telephone company in not keeping the city wire away from the step, it being the rule with such electricians to deal with each wire as if it were charged, and he, though ignorant of the presence of electricity in the city wire, having equal facility with his master for knowing thereof.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 754*)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR — NECESSITY — REFORMATION OF JUDGMENT.

Though on the verdict plaintiff had a right to a judgment against both defendants, jointly and severally, for all the damages awarded, yet he, not having complained below of its being for part only of the damages against one defendant, and for the balance against the other, may not, on the judgment being reversed as to one defendant, have it reformed so as to be for the full amount against the other defendant, which, though perfecting appeal and filing assignments of error below, filed no brief in the appellate court.

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; M. E. Smith, Judge.

Action by John Moore against the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff against the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company and the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company, each of which perfected an appeal; that of the Telegraph and Telephone Company alone being prosecuted. Reversed as to the Telegraph & Telephone Company.

A. P. Wozencraft, William D. Williams, and D. A. Frank, for appellants. McLean & Carlock, for appellee.

HODGES, J. John Moore, plaintiff in the court below, filed this suit in the district court of Tarrant county against the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company, the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company, and the city of Ft. Worth, claiming damages in the sum of $25,000 for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him in July, 1907, while in the service of the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company, and occasioned by certain concurrent acts of negligence on the part of all the defendants. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the appellee for the sum of $4,000, which the jury apportioned as follows: Three thousand dollars against the appellant Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company, and $1,000 against the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company. Separate appeal bonds were executed by each of these defendants, and assignments of error filed in the trial court; but the telephone company alone has filed briefs in this court.

The issue upon which we think this case should be disposed of is presented in the first assignment of error, in which the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment is questioned. It is claimed by the appellant telephone company that the testimony of the appellee as to the conditions under which the accident occurred discloses a situation showing that he assumed the risk of the danger he encountered, and the consequent injuries therefrom. The testimony shows that on the morning of July 19, 1907, the appellee and another employé of the telephone company were sent out to put in a telephone near where this injury occurred. After they had ascertained that the occupants of the premises wanted the telephone, the appellee, of his own accord, began to ascend one of the telephone poles, for the purpose of making an inspection in connection with the work in which he was then engaged. This pole stood near the crossing of one of the streets in the city of Ft. Worth. There were many telephone wires running east and west strung to this pole. Iron spikes were driven into the north and south sides of the pole for use in climbing it. The city of Ft. Worth had two wires on the same side of the same street, also running east and west. The city wires were suspended from city poles, but were not attached to the telephone pole. They hung about 25 feet above the ground and below the telephone wires, one of the city wires passing on the north side of the telephone pole, and the other on the south side. A few inches outside of the city wires, and at the same level, two light and power wires, which did not belong to the defendant light and power company, also straddled the telephone pole, running parallel with the city wires. These light and power wires were suspended from the same pole which carried the city wires, but were not attached to the telephone pole. There was testimony from which the jury were justified in concluding that the city wire on the north side of the telephone pole was in contact with one of the iron steps about 25 feet above the ground, and that this contact had existed for some time before the accident, though how long it is not clear. The appellee ascended the telephone pole till he got about 25 feet from the ground, and had to swing himself partially to the south side in order to avoid contact with the city's north wire; the wire on the south side of the pole being farther off than on the other, and more easily permitting the passage of his body without contact.

In detailing the circumstances immediately attending the accident, the appellee testified: "I was going up this pole to test a pair of wires to connect this phone that we were going to put in. When this occurred I had not reached the place where I was going to do the work. I was just ordinarily like a man climbing a pole—one foot up, reaching up with my hand, you know, and climbing up. It was the right hand that I think came in contact with the live wire, and the left hand was down about 18 inches on the next step below on the opposite side, against a messenger wire, the support of the cable—it is a heavy wire to hold up one of those cables, which is connected with the ground—and it was my right hand that grasped the other side or the opposite side. With my left hand I had hold of a step also, but this messenger wire was tied around the pole just above this step. I was holding to those steps to climb the pole. Those were the steps that were provided for that purpose. I didn't succeed in grasping the step with my right hand before I was shocked. I could not tell how I caught the wire, for just as I saw I had touched, you know—and that noise—and that is the last thing I remember. I don't know whether I grasped it, or what I done. I just reached up, and as I reached up I laid my hand on the step. This noise—I heard something like a bug passing my ear, and I fell. * * * I didn't know there was any wire resting upon that step at all. In climbing the pole those wires that were hanging there—there were four of them, two on each side of the pole—I was going up and faced toward the pole this way, and the wire on this side lay up near the pole. Those two and the two on this side swung off farther from the pole. They were two of the city's wires, and two of the electric light wires. The electric light wires of the power company was on the extreme side. The city wires was the near ones. One city wire was on this side, and one on this side; and those on this side of the pole were swung off something like a foot or more, while this lay up close to the pole, tolerably close, something like three or four inches. I could see that from the ground before I went to ascend the pole. Naturally, a man climbing a pole, where there are steps that way on one side of the pole, he will throw himself around and swing and reach that way in order to put himself up between the wires in the most space where he will keep himself as clear as much as possible, and that is the way I was; that was my position in going up this pole. When I went to pass up between the wires I swung myself around to the south side of the pole, and for that reason I could not see the step around here where I taken hold. * * * The messenger wire that the cable is on has got a connection to the ground, but it goes on probably a half mile before it gets to it, and before it gets to the office it has several connections to the ground. These connections are made to the ground all along. When I had hold of this step where the messenger wire was put just above it, my finger went against this messenger which was connected with the ground; that was my left hand. My right hand went up and taken hold of this step, with this city incandescent wire lying against, or which was lying against, the wire. The step I put my right hand on was on the north side of the pole, and the other one was on the south side. The Citizens' wire was something like 15 or 18 inches away from the pole on each side."

The evidence from other sources tended to show that the city wire was in contact with the iron step on the north side of the pole, and that the insulation on that wire had worn off at the point of contact, and thus permitted a current from it to be communicated to the step. It was also shown that the city did not use its wires during the daytime, but only for purposes of illumination at night, and on this particular occasion the current for that purpose from the city's plant had been shut off, and there was no danger from contact with this wire, unless charged from some other and unauthorized source. Those city wires were therefore during the daytime supposed to be harmless, unless accidentally charged. There was testimony to show that on the day of this accident, and also the day previous, there was a contact between a wire of the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company and this city wire, some distance away from where this injury occurred. It resulted from the wire of the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company dropping from its fastening and lying across the city wire. The fall was caused by a wooden pin supporting a glass insulator rotting and giving way. In this way, it is claimed by the appellee, a current was communicated to the city's wire, and this was the cause of the shock received by him at the time, and caused him to fall.

As to his knowledge of the conditions existing at the time he was injured, and his duties under the circumstances, we gather the following from appellee's testimony: He was a man of mature years, and an experienced lineman; had been in the business about nine years, and was thoroughly familiar with all of the duties and responsibilities incident to the capacity in which he was then employed; had previously been an inspector, but was not then working as such. He was also fully acquainted with the system of wires among which he was called upon to work upon this occasion, and knew the conditions existing at the point where he fell, except that he disclaims any actual knowledge of the fact that the city wire was in contact with the iron step upon which he placed his right hand in climbing the pole. He had never climbed this particular pole before, but had seen others climb it in safety, and from that inferred that he could also climb it with safety. Before starting up the pole he could, and did, see the situation of the wires on each side of the pole, except as to the contact before mentioned. He saw the four wires which did not belong to the telephone company swinging loosely, and several feet below the telephone wires—two on each side of the pole he was to climb. He knew that two of them belonged to the city, and the other two to the Citizens' Company, as it is called. He also knew the uses to which each system of wires was put; and there is nothing to indicate that he did not further know, in a general way, their respective routes and connections over the streets of the city. While he says he could not tell whether the city wire was lying on or against the iron step when he was standing on the ground, he admits that he could, and did, see that it was in very close proximity to it.

As to his duty in protecting himself against dangerous places, and inspecting the situation in which he was called to work, he says: "When I go out and repair a wire, it is my duty to see if I can get up a pole safely or not. It is my duty to see that it is safe for me to climb the pole. It is, of course, my duty, when I go out there to repair or put up a telephone in the manner in which I did on this occasion, to see whether it is safe for me to climb the pole or not. It is my duty, and no one else's; it is my own alone. And when things look safe to me, I go ahead. It is my duty to see that where I am going to work looks safe." Again he says: "It is considered by electricians that every wire is considered charged that you are liable to come in contact with. You are supposed to stay clear of all of them. In going up a pole amongst a lot of telephone or electric wires, in most cases you are to deal with each wire as if it were charged with electricity." He thus testified, in response to the question as to whether or not he could see the wire resting upon the pin or step upon which he was to put his hand: "Well, I say that I didn't see it. I didn't say that I could not have seen it; I simply say that I didn't see it. If I had climbed up there and crawled around the pole and looked in there, I could have seen it. I could not have seen it from where I was without I swung around the pole. I threw myself around far enough on the south side of the pole that I could not see the step, and yet that was a step which was immediately close to a hot wire, but that is not supposed to be a hot wire. It is capable of carrying a heavy current, and did carry a heavy current when it was in use, but it was supposed to be a dead wire in the daytime. I regarded it as dangerous, and swung out of its way. That is what I was trying to do. I swung out of its way to keep from hanging my clothes or tools and bothering me about climbing. I swung out of its way so, in case there was anything the matter with it, to keep it from coming in contact with me or hanging on my tools." Upon the same subject he again says: "At the time I got the shock I was still climbing up the pole, and I grasped the step with my right hand. The city's wire was lying against that step, or I suppose it was lying against it. Well, no suppose about it, for it was against it. Prior to the time I got the shock I didn't notice it was lying against it. I didn't see it against it; but I knew it was close to it, though, or bound to be, for I could see that just from going up the pole; but I was not afraid to take hold of it. The city's wire was not charged in the daytime."

As to his knowledge and appreciation of the danger of the situation, he says: "When I saw it hanging there in that condition I knew that it was — that a man could possibly get hurt from it. Yes; I knew a man could possibly get hurt, unless he used ordinary care in swinging himself around as I did. The wires were not as close on the other side as on that side; they cleared the pole something like a foot. I was guarding myself against coming in contact with them on the south side. I was swinging myself around here." Again he says: "When it came time to go up there [meaning the pole], I went up, notwithstanding that I knew in advance that those wires were in the condition that I had thought previously was dangerous, but I was using all the care I could to keep from coming in contact with them. I didn't directly undertake by my own skill and care to avoid a danger which was obvious, and which I knew before I undertook to climb that pole. I climbed it because I seen those wires there, and they looked clear. I didn't know it was dangerous when I climbed it. I said that a man could possibly come in contact with it before, and coming in contact with hot wires is a dangerous thing; and there was a space where I could possibly come in contact with hot wires. I went up there, and undertaken to keep myself clear from the wire." In still another place he says: "I knew it was somewhat dangerous to an extent. Just from observation you could see that an accident could occur there. The way I taken chances on that was by seeing other men go through the same place. Of course a man takes chances to a certain extent. I taken the chances there in a certain way. That way was that I had seen other men ascending the same pole, and not get hurt; and yet just from observation, and from the way things had been going on, I thought it was safe, as it had been there so long to my knowledge. Q. I didn't ask you that; and you testified awhile ago that you thought it was dangerous, and you might get hurt there. A. I said that it looked dangerous, but, seeing other men go through there, it led me to believe it was safe." Appellee further testified that his left hand touched the messenger wire which was grounded some distance from that pole at the time. His right hand came in contact with the charged electric wire. He received a shock which caused him to fall from the pole. He says that, had he not made a closed circuit in that way, he would not have sustained any shock by his right hand coming in contact with the electric wire. And he further says that he did not look out for the messenger wire at all; it was right down on the side where he was supposed to take hold.

We deem it unnecessary to narrate any of the testimony of any of the witnesses which tended to contradict the statements of the appellee. The injuries sustained by the fall form the basis of the suit. Inasmuch as we dispose of the case upon the first assignment of error, it will have to be done on the assumption that his testimony shows that he is not entitled to recover.

The acts of negligence here charged against the telephone company are that it failed to furnish the appellee with a safe place in which to work. Narrowed to a more specific detail, it charged the failure of the appellant to provide some suitable method for preventing the electric wires of the city from coming in contact with the step on the pole which the appellee climbed, and from which he fell. It is not contended that the city wires becoming charged with an electric current at this unexpected hour was due to the negligence of this appellant, but this dereliction is attributed to the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company, and was the basis for the judgment rendered against that company in the trial below.

The general rule that the master owes the servant the duty to exercise ordinary care to provide a safe place in which to perform his labor is too elementary to need discussion. It is also well settled that the servant cannot recover on account of a negligent failure of the master to perform this duty, when such failure is known to the servant, or could have been ascertained by him in the exercise of that degree of care and circumspection which an ordinarily prudent person would use for his own safety under the same or similar circumstances. St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Hynson (Tex.) 109 S. W. 929; T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Bradford, 66 Tex. 732, 2 S. W. 595, 59 Am. Rep. 639; Bonnet v. Ry. Co., 89 Tex. 76, 33 S. W. 334. We do not understand that counsel for appellee controvert this general proposition; but they insist that, in order to preclude a recovery by the servant, he must also know of the existence of the danger likely to result from such dereliction of the master, or that the danger must be so apparent that it would be seen and appreciated by a person of ordinary prudence. As an abstract question we may concede this to be correct. But it finds a practical application in cases where inexperienced servants sustain injuries from defective appliances or places of work, and where the facts show that they were incapable, by reason of their inexperience, of appreciating the peculiar dangers to which they were exposed. In cases of experienced employes the existence of the defect, or abnormal condition, is generally considered sufficient to indicate the dangers that may necessarily or probably result therefrom, and the knowledge of the latter will generally be presumed from the knowledge of the former. If the servant be experienced in his particular line of work, he will be charged with a knowledge of such dangers as either necessarily or in the ordinary course of events are likely to result from the abnormal situation of which he knows. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Bradford, supra; Railway Co. v. Hynson, supra; G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Williams, 72 Tex. 159, 12 S. W. 172; Railway Co. v. Somers, 78 Tex. 439, 14 S. W. 779; Ray v. Hodge, 74 N. H. 190, 66 Atl. 123; 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, pp. 669, 1162.

The facts here show that the appellee was an experienced lineman, having been engaged in the business nine years, and had worked in other departments of the telephone service. There is nothing to indicate that he did not have equal knowledge with that of any other employé in the service of the telephone company concerning the entire situation which confronted him on this particular occasion, and of the dangers that were likely to result from it. He saw the condition of the wires before he undertook to ascend the pole. If he did not at that time observe that the city wire was in actual contact with the iron step over which he had to pass, he undoubtedly did see that it was in such close proximity that contact was possible, and even highly probable. This was a circumstance sufficient to put him upon notice of that situation. He must have realized, then, according to his own admissions, that the situation was dangerous for one attempting to climb the pole to the telephone wires above; but, as he says, he was willing to take the chances, believing it safe because he had seen another some time before that pass through the same network of wires in safety. As he ascended the pole and came nearer the charged wire on the step, there was nothing except his own indifference that prevented him from observing the actual situation—that the wire was in contact with the step. He says he did not; but that alone will not absolve him from the duty of using his senses to discover what must have been in plain view. Ry. Co. v. Hynson, supra. If he did see it, or if his situation with reference to it was such that he could have seen it had he taken even ordinary precaution for his own protection, he cannot now excuse himself because he did not suspect the danger which he encountered. It was the contact of the wire with the step for which the telephone company in this instance is sought to be held responsible, and not for the unexpected current of electricity in the unused city wire. As to the presence of electricity in the wire, the servant had equal facilities with the master for knowing.

In the Bradford Case above referred to the court said: "If the master and the servant stand upon an equal footing with respect to knowledge of the danger, then in case of an accident as a result of the danger the master is exonerated." Here the appellee testified that he knew a wire was liable to fall on the city's wire and communicate to it a current of electricity. If it was negligent on the part of the telephone company not to foresee and provide against such accidents as did in this case occur, it was also a lack of ordinary prudence on the part of the appellee, when he knew of the situation, not to anticipate the same results. We have discussed the question of knowledge on the part of the servant in this case upon the assumption that the appellant telephone company was guilty of the negligence charged, the finding of the jury being in favor of the appellee upon that issue. The principles of law considered and applied are those which govern the relative duties and rights of the master and servant under those conditions where the servant owes no duty to inspect, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the place in which he is required to labor is safe, beyond that which is imposed by the dictates of ordinary prudence. These are not applicable where, under the contract of employment, or the peculiar character of the service to be performed, the servant assumes, in whole or in part, the duty of inspection, either for his own safety alone or for the benefit of the master. When this is the condition under which he works, he cannot rely wholly upon the assumption that the master has provided him a safe place. It becomes a party of his duty to see that it is safe. 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 414. We think the testimony of the appellee justifies the conclusion that by the terms of his employment he assumed, to some extent at least, the duty of ascertaining for himself if the place in which he was required to work was safe for that purpose. He says that it was his duty, and his alone, to see that he had a safe place in which to work when he went out to perform that class of labor. If so, it is difficult to imagine a situation that would come more completely within the range of those of which he was expected to take notice than that here shown to have existed. It is but natural and reasonable to expect that a lineman, having to work in positions above the ground, difficult of access and removed from the ordinary opportunities for inspection, should be expected to rely less upon the presumption that the master had provided him a safe place, and more upon his own power and opportunities for observation. Flood v. Western Union Tel. Co., 131 N. Y. 603, 30 N. E. 196; McGorty v. Tel. Co., 69 Conn. 635, 38 Atl. 359, 61 Am. St. Rep. 62; Sias v. Consol. Lighting Co., 73 Vt. 35, 50 Atl. 554.

We think the evidence very conclusively shows that the appellee was under a greater duty to look out for his own safety in the places he was called upon to work than that which generally rests upon the servant. Whether the act of permitting the electric light wire of the city to remain in contact with the step be regarded as negligence on the part of the telephone company or not, we think it was a situation of which the appellee under the circumstances assumed the risk. He either knew, or should have known, where he was placing his hands, and the wires with which he was likely to come in contact. Such a precaution was not only imposed by what he says was his duty to see that the place in which he was to work was safe, but by ordinary prudence as well.

Without passing upon any of the other assignments of error, we think that as to the appellant Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company this case should be reversed, and judgment here rendered in its favor. The case is therefore ordered reversed and rendered.

On Rehearing.

In the motion for a rehearing counsel for appellee insist that we erred in holding that appellee assumed the risk of the dangers incident to coming in contact with the wire, even if the evidence is sufficient to show that he knew the situation of the wires before and at the time he received the shock which caused him to fall. They contend that there is not sufficient evidence to support the conclusion that he knew of the presence of the danger which he encountered. We do not intend that the language used in the original opinion should be construed as going far enough to say that, because the appellee knew of the condition of the wires, he must necessarily have known of the lurking danger resulting from one of them being charged with a current of electricity. A knowledge of a situation does not always carry with it the knowledge of a danger. But it is not necessary, to rest the conclusion we have reached, that the appellee knew of the danger likely to result from the abnormal condition which confronted him, upon a knowledge of the condition alone. He testified that electricians considered all wires with which they came in contact as charged, and dealt with them accordingly. He further says that he regarded the situation as dangerous, and swung out of the way of the wire for the purpose of avoiding the danger. He did not purposely come in contact with it, but did so accidentally, and without observing its exact location on the iron step. Again, it is clear from his testimony that he would not have received the shock had he not, at the time he placed his hand upon the iron step, also put his other hand in contact with a messenger wire which he knew to be grounded. He was an experienced lineman, and knew all the dangers incident to coming in contact with charged wires; was fully acquainted with the power and dangers of the electric current. The only fact about this situation of which he can be heard to plead ignorance is that the wire with which he came in contact at the time carried a current of electricity; but this, we think, becomes unavailable in view of his admissions of the rule, recognized and observed by his class of workmen, to treat all such wires as charged, and that at the time he swung himself around to the south side of the pole he was then undertaking to avoid contact with this wire for that very reason. It must be borne in mind that this current which caused his shock was not due to any negligence or conduct on the part of the appellant telephone company, or from any cause over which it had control. The conditions which produced it were as much within the knowledge of the appellee as that of the appellant company. Where the servant has equal knowledge with the master of the dangers incident to his work, he takes the risk upon himself if he goes on with it. G., H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Lempe, 59 Tex. 19. In the case cited the court said: "There are some circumstances which will vary these rules, or rather create exceptions to them, but the present case is not brought within any of such exceptions. One of these is where the defects in the machinery or the premises about which the servant is employed are obvious, but the danger is not apparent. In such cases the master is held liable because the master should have taken steps to ascertain whether the defects render them unsafe. Wood on Mas. & Serv. § 336. Of this character are all cases where there is some fault in machinery, or of a track of a railroad, which are as obvious to the servant as to the master, but which, from want of experience or knowledge on the part of the former, he cannot determine that the defect will be productive of danger to him. He may know that certain appliances usually connected with an engine are lacking, or that some of the rails of the track are warped or out of place, yet if he did not know, or could not reasonably have known, that in the one case there was imminent peril of an explosion, and in the other of the cars being thrown from the track, he could recover if injured by such accidents. On the other hand, if he knew, or should reasonably have known, that such defects would necessarily subject him to risk from such occurrences, he has no cause of action against his master. Id. § 355, and cases cited. The difference is between going into the service or continuing in it 'knowing that the instrumentalities employed are unsafe and dangerous,' and knowing that defects exist, but not that they necessarily render the employment of a perilous character. It is sought by appellee's counsel to bring this case within the above exception, and to that end he cited several reported cases; but, with the above distinction in view, all the authorities cited by him are easily explained, and rendered consistent with the law as announced in this opinion."

Here the appellee knew of the condition of the wires and their situation with reference to the pole, and knew that the wire which caused his shock belonged to the city, and the purposes for which it was employed; and he will also be presumed to know as were generally dead during the daytime, they might not be so under any and all circumstances, and, further, that where wires belonging to other companies crossed the city's wires, just such accidents as did occur were likely to happen. There was no failure to perform any duty due from the master to the servant, in this instance, of which the appellee did not have full knowledge. He, therefore, stood in the attitude of knowing the negligence of the master, and had equal facilities with the latter of knowing all the dangers that would necessarily result from that situation. The motion for a rehearing is therefore overruled.

There is also a motion filed in this case asking that we reform and affirm the judgment of the trial court for the full sum of $4,000 against the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company, one of the defendants below. The verdict rendered by the jury in the trial court was as follows: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff, John Moore, judgment in the sum of $4,000; $3,000 against the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company, and $1,000 against the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company; and we find in favor of the defendant city of Ft. Worth." Upon this verdict judgment was rendered for the plaintiff as follows: "It is therefore ordered and adjudged that said verdict be in all things approved and made the basis of judgment herein, and that the plaintiff, John Moore, is entitled to recover damages, and does hereby recover, on account of his suit against the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company and the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company, defendants, in the aggregate sum of $4,000, of which amount $3,000 shall be recovered against the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company, and $1,000 against the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company." The light and power company perfected its appeal, and filed assignments of error in the court below, but filed no brief in this court. It is stated in this motion that the light and power company had an agreement by which its appeal was to be considered as being presented in the brief of the telephone company, but no such agreement was filed in this court, nor were there any allusions to such made until after the decision of the case. It does not appear that the appellee made any effort in the court below to have the form of the judgment corrected and rendered as he seeks to have done in this court, nor is there any complaint by him in the record in any form of the judgment rendered. On the contrary, he appeared in this court by brief, and also in oral argument by his attorney, and asked for an affirmance of the judgment as renany action upon our part is rendered wholly unnecessary. The appellee, however, has elected to treat it as restricting his right of recovery against each of the defendants according to the apportionment which the court undertook to make in following the verdict of the jury. Upon a verdict such as that here returned we think the plaintiff in the suit had the right to a judgment against both defendants jointly and severally for the entire damages awarded. S. A. & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Bowles, 88 Tex. 640, 32 S. W. 880; San Marcos Electric Light & Power Co. v. Compton (Tex. Civ. App.) 107 S. W. 1153. The question here presented is not whether the judgment should have been so rendered by the trial court, but whether at this stage of the proceedings this court has the right to reform and so render it. Had cross-assignments of error been presented by the appellee calling in question the correctness of the form of the judgment rendered, or the action of the court in refusing to reform and enter a joint judgment against both of the defendants jointly for the entire sum, we would then have been clothed with all the authority necessary to pass upon the question; but this was not done, and the question is for the first time raised by this motion, made after the case on appeal has been decided, and during the pendency of the motion for rehearing.

The only errors which this court can review are those presented by appropriate assignments or cross-assignments, or such as appear upon the face of the record. Rev. St. 1895, art. 1014; Applebaum v. Bass (Tex. Civ. App.) 113 S. W. 174, and cases cited. It has also been held that a codefendant cannot assign error unless he also appealed. Anderson v. Silliman, 50 S. W. 576. A party not appealing cannot have a judgment amended. Succession of Thomas, 114 La. 695, 38 South. 519; Ware v. Couvillion, 112 La. 43, 36 South. 220. The right to consider and correct fundamental errors, or such as appear upon the face of the record, is restricted to those only which affect the rights of the party who has appealed. All others are presumed to be satisfied with the judgment as rendered. The Supreme Court has the same right to consider errors appearing upon the face of the record as have the Courts of Civil Appeals. Texas Brewing Co. v. Templeman, 90 Tex. 277, 38 S. W. 27. Yet in the Bowles Case above referred to, where that court was called upon to review a judgment presenting a similar situation, it was said: "The correctness of the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals in awarding judgment against the defendants separately for $5,000 each is not presented to this court verdict is excessive, and the question is for the first time raised upon appeal, not having been called to the attention of the trial court, the error will be considered as having been waived. Petri et al. v. First Nat Bank, 83 Tex. 424, 18 S. W. 752, 29 Am. St. Rep. 657; Simmons v. Rhodes (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 903. The Ft. Worth Light & Power Company, against which it is sought to have this judgment here rendered for an additional amount of $3,000, has not prosecuted in this court the appeal which it perfected, and it may be that this failure was due to the fact that it was content with the judgment rendered against it, and relied upon the conduct of the appellee as a waiver of any further claim against it for damages.

We do not think this court has the right to do more than to affirm the judgment as rendered against the Ft. Worth Light & Power Company, which is accordingly done. In all other respects the motion is overruled.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; E. B. Muse, Judge.

Action by J. B. Edwards against the Rapid Transit Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Finley, Knight & Harris, for appellant. Mathis & Freeman and Carden, Starling & Carden, for appellee.

TALBOT, J. This is an action for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by appellee while serving the appellant in the capacity of a street car conductor. The defendant railway company answered by general and special exceptions to plaintiff's petition, a general denial, and pleas of contributory negligence and assumed risk. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,400 this appeal is prosecuted.

Conclusions of Fact.

Appellee had been in the employ of appellant about two months, and about 11 o'clock at night on the 20th of August, 1906, while standing on the "running board" of one of pany, standing on a spur or side track, owned by said railway company, which was near to, and lying parallel with, appellant's street car track, and was injured. The coal car had been standing near appellant's track the entire day of August 20, 1906, and up to the time appellee was injured. There was a bulge in the coal car near its center, and, by actual measurement made the next day after the accident, by one of appellant's employees, it was discovered that at this point the coal car came within 12 inches of the handles that extend up and down on the side of the street car. At the end of the coal car the distance between that car and the street car as the latter passed was 16 inches. Prior to 6:40 o'clock p. m. on the day appellee was hurt, the car under his control had been going north in passing the coal car, and during that time the running board of his car was on the opposite side of said car from the coal car, and he was in no danger of coming in contact with the coal car. At 6:40 o'clock p. m. of that day, however, the course of his car was changed, and ran south in passing the coal car, and while so running the running board in use was on the side next to the coal car. After the car began to run south, and perhaps the first time it passed the coal car, he noticed the coal car on the spur track, but did not know how close it was to appellant's track or the street car he was operating, and could not have known of its proximity to the street car without a close examination or measurement of the distance between them. Just before appellee was injured the cord used to operate the register that records or registers the fares collected became fastened in some way, and it was necessary for appellee to step up in the car to fix it. After loosening the cord so it would operate the register, he stepped down on the running board, and started to go forward to flag the street car over a railroad crossing, and just as he did so he was struck by, or came in contact with, the coal car, and received the injuries of which he complains. Neither the coal car, nor the spur track upon which it was standing, was under the control of appellant, and there is no direct testimony that appellant had actual knowledge of the close proximity of said car to its street car track or cars as they passed it. Appellant did, however, have an inspector, whose duty it was to make trips over its line of street railway and ascertain if there were any obstructions on or too near its track, and by the exercise of ordinary care the dangerous nearness of the coal car to its track could have been discovered. The failure to use such care, and to have the from said car.

Conclusions of Law.

The first assignment of error is that "the court erred in overruling defendant's motion to quash the jury panel for the week, drawn under the law enacted by the Thirtieth Legislature Acts 1907, p. 269, c. 139), the ground of such exception being the unconstitutionality of said law." The proposition urged is that, as the act complained of provides a special jury law and system for counties which have cities aggregating in population 20,000, as shown by the United States census of 1900, and excludes from the operation of such law for all time all other counties in the state, it is an unreasonable and arbitrary discrimination, a special, and not a general, law, and violative of the Constitution of this state. There was no error in this action of the court. In the case of Northern Texas Traction Co. v. Danforth (Tex. Civ. App.) 116 S. W. 147, we had occasion to pass upon this question, and there held, upon the authority of Smith v. State, 113 S. W. 289, decided by the Court of Criminal Appeals of this state, and in which a very able and exhaustive opinion was written upon the subject by Judge Brooks of that court, that the law assailed was not unconstitutional. This ruling seems to have been approved and sustained by our Supreme Court, for that they recently denied a writ of error in the Danforth Case.

It is assigned that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury at defendant's request, to return a verdict in its favor. The contention is (1) that the uncontroverted evidence showed that defendant was not guilty of any negligence resulting in plaintiff's injury; (2) that the uncontroverted evidence showed conclusively that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to any injury he may have received; (3) that the uncontroverted evidence showed conclusively that plaintiff assumed the risk of any danger incident to the location of the coal car upon the track of the Santa Fé Railway Company. We do not think that either of these propositions can be maintained. On the contrary, we are of opinion that the evidence was amply sufficient to require the submission of each of the questions involved to the jury for their decision, and, as indicated by our conclusions of fact, warranted their findings, which are necessarily embraced in their verdict, against appellant upon each of them. The mere fact that appellant did not actually know of the close proximity of the coal car to the street railway track before the accident was not sufficient to acquit it of the charge of negligents at the time of the accident, whose duty it was, among other things, to look after everything that would hinder the service of the cars; that if there was any obstruction on the tracks, to look after it and keep the cars running. Appellee testified that appellant had inspectors to look after the tracks when he was injured, to see that they were clear. C. L. McManus, freight agent for the Santa Fé Railroad at Dallas, testified that if he had had any knowledge of the fact that there was a coal car on the Santa Fé track where the accident occurred, dangerously close to appellant's railway track, he would have taken action in respect to moving that car immediately, and as a matter of precaution would have stationed a man there to flag and warn the street car people. Whether under the circumstances appellant was guilty of negligence in failing to discover the situation of the coal car, and to remove or request its removal by the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company was clearly a controverted issue, and its withdrawal from the jury would have been error. Nor would the fact that appellant did not have control of the coal car or Santa Fé track necessarily relieve it of liability. As said by this court in the case of Railway Company v. Ellen Williams, 117 S. W. 1043, decided at a former day of this term (March 6, 1909), and unreported: "If an accident occurs from two causes, both due to negligence of different persons, but together the efficient cause, then all the persons whose acts contribute to the accident are liable for an injury resulting, and the negligence of one furnishes no excuse for the negligence of the other." Therefore, notwithstanding the Santa Fé Railway Company was guilty of negligence in placing the coal car so close to the railway track of appellant, the jury were justified in concluding that appellant failed to use ordinary care to discover and have said car removed, and that such negligence, concurring with the negligence of the Santa Fé Railway Company, proximately contributed to cause appellee's injuries.

So, too, the undisputed fact that appellee knew before the accident that the coal car was standing on the track of the Santa Fé Railway Company near appellant's railway track did not, as a matter of law, charge him with contributory negligence, or impose upon him the assumption of the risk of danger from said car. He testified, in effect, that he saw the car there that evening about 6:40 or 7 o'clock p. m., but had not noticed it that night after dark; that it was drizzling rain, most of the curtains of the car drawn down, and very dark; that while ordinarily there would be nothing to prevent a man from seeing cars standing on the Santa Fé track, yet if the curtains of the street car were down, and it was raining, he did not think a man would discover the cars. He further stated that just before he was injured he had flagged two railroad crossings, that the cord that rings the register of fares got hung, and that, after getting up in the car and fixing it, he stepped down on the running board with a view of flagging a third crossing, and as he did so he was struck by the coal car and injured. Before this he did not know of the dangerous nearness of the coal car to the street railway track, and the evidence tends strongly to show, if not conclusively so, that he could not have known of it without a close examination for that purpose. This he was not required to do. It was the duty of appellant to exercise that degree of care required of it by law to have its railway track in proper condition for the use of appellee, and to this end it devolved upon it to make such inspections thereof as were essential to constitute such care. This duty appellee had a right to assume had been properly performed, and the fact that he might have discovered by an investigation the dangerous proximity of the coal car to the street railway track does not affect his right to recover. Of course, it was appellee's duty to use, while engaged in the performance of his duties, that care for his own safety which a person of ordinary prudence would have used under similar circumstances, and he will be charged with a knowledge of those things, and held responsible for a failure to exercise those precautions which such a person would ordinarily know and exercise, whether he negligently failed to observe and exercise them or not. Therefore, as said in Peck v. Peck, 90 Tex. 10, 87 S. W. 248: "It is thus that he may be charged with knowledge of a defect and danger arising from negligence of the master, not because he is under obligation to make inquiry or examination as to the master's performance of duty, but because the thing is such that with common prudence he ought to see, or know, it in doing his own work." Recognizing these principles, and putting the matter in the most favorable light for appellant warranted by the evidence, it cannot be said that contributory negligence on the part of appellee or his assumption of the risk or danger incident to the location of the coal car upon the Santa Fé track was so conclusively established as to require us to reverse the judgment of the lower court on either of those grounds.

It does not appear that appellee had actual knowledge of the dangerous proximity of the coal car to appellant's track; and, unless that fact was sufficiently obvious to charge him with knowledge of it by reasonable observation, he will not be held to have assumed the risk of injury from it, nor is he to be held guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in stepping down upon the running board of the street car without previously, or at the same instant, looking to see whether he was in danger from the coal car. Whipple v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 19 R. I. 587, 35 Atl. 306, 61 Am. St. Rep. 796. In the case cited it is held that the dangerous proximity of a telegraph pole, placed near a railway track, which inclined towards it at the top, so that the space between the pole and the ladder on the side of the freight car which the plaintiff was climbing at the time injured was 15½ inches, was not an obvious defect.

Appellant requested the trial court to charge the jury as follows: "You are instructed that under the uncontroverted evidence plaintiff knew of the location of the cars of the Santa Fé Railway Company on its track, and you are therefore instructed that it was the duty of plaintiff to exercise ordinary care to avoid coming in contact or collision with such cars, and if you find and believe from the evidence that he never looked to see if he was opposite said cars, and never used any means whatever to ascertain the immediate danger of a collision with said car, then he would be guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and it would be your duty to return your verdict for the defendant." The refusal of this charge is made the basis of appellant's fourth assignment of error. This charge, we think, was upon the weight of the evidence, and properly refused. There was evidence that appellee observed the coal car standing on the Santa Fé track some three or four hours before the accident resulting in his injury occurred, but it certainly did not conclusively appear that the proximity of the car, or the danger of coming in contact with it, was obvious, or that appellee must necessarily have known of such proximity and danger in the discharge of his duties. Unless it did so appear from the evidence, appellee had the right to assume, as heretofore stated, that appellant had exercised the care defined by law to furnish him a track free from obstructions, and reasonably safe for his use in the performance of the work required of him. The charge in question is so framed that, had it been given, the jury would have thereby been misled into the belief that it was appellee's duty to examine and ascertain whether or not the car was dangerously near the street railway track, and that if he failed to do so, he could not recover. Whether under all the facts and circumstances of the case the appellee failed to exercise ordinary care for his own safety was an issue of fact for the jury; and this issue by the general charge, and especially by a special instruction given at the request of appellant, was fairly submitted.

Nor did the court materially err in refusing to give appellant's special charges Nos. 7 and 8, to the effect that there was no evidence before the jury that any authorized agent of appellant had notice of the location of the coal car, or participated in placing it upon the Santa Fé track before the accident, or that it had control over the placing or removal of said car, and therefore was not charged with such control, and that the jury should not consider any claim of appellee that it had such notice. These charges were probably upon the weight of the evidence, and clearly calculated to induce the jury to believe that, if appellant had no actual notice of the placing of and location of the coal car on the Santa Fé track, under no circumstances would it be liable for the injuries sustained by appellee. Such is not the law. It was appellant's duty to exercise ordinary care to discover the exact location of said car, and such care to have it removed. Failing in this, it could not escape liability on the ground that it had no actual notice that the car was there, and no authority to control it. The evidence shows that, had appellant exercised ordinary care, it would have discovered the close proximity of the car to its track, and that upon the giving of notice of that fact to the agent of the Santa Fé Railway Company's agent at Dallas immediate steps would have been taken by him to remove the car.

We have found no error requiring a reversal of the case, and the judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

On Rehearing.

In this motion we are asked to make additional findings of fact, which we do as follows: In the vicinity of Moser's Foundry, by which the defendant's cars passed upon its track, there were three railway crossings in rather close proximity to each other. The car of the Santa Fé Railway Company which injured the appellee was located upon the track of that company alongside defendant's track, and between the second and third railroad tracks, and appellee was familiar with the location of all the crossings and of Moser's Foundry. Appellee knew that the coal car with which he came in contact was located between the second and third tracks and near the foundry, and at the time of the accident he knew he was between the second and third tracks, and that he was near the foundry. The distance between the second and third tracks was 100 to 150 feet. As appellee stepped down on the running board, just immediately before he was injured, he did not look to see if the car that he came in contact with was standing there. Whether he could have seen the car had he looked is not entirely free from doubt. He testified on that point as follows: "I suppose the street car had a headlight on the front of it.

These headlights throw a light on either side of the track, and down the track for some distance. I don't know as I could have seen one [car] if I had looked. I suppose I could have if I had been looking that way, and had not been attending to my duties. If I had been looking for cars, I guess I could have seen it. The lights on the car that I was running were dim at the time I got hurt." We see no reason to change our views as expressed in the original opinion. Whether the appellant was guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of appellee's injuries, and whether appellee, under all the circumstances of the case, was guilty of contributory negligence, were issues of fact for the determination of the jury.

The motion for rehearing is overruled.

A purchaser, taking possession of land under a contract of sale, cannot, without repudiation of the title of his grantor, hold adversely against him.

2. DEEDS (§ 56*)—DELIVERY—SUFFICIENCY.

A mother conveyed to her sons land on consideration of $1,800, payable to her heirs at her death, and on the further oral promise to pay certain rents. A deed was signed and acknowledged, and placed in a trunk belonging to one of the sons, and the sons took possession of the land, and some of the rents were paid. Held, that there was a sufficient delivery of the deed to authorize the foreclosure of a vendor's lien to secure the payment of rent.

A mother conveyed to her sons by deed lands on consideration of $1,800, payable to her heirs on her death. Orally it was agreed, as a further consideration, that they would pay a certain portion of the crops on the land as rent during her lifetime. Held, that the oral agreement, not being of necessity incapable of performance within a year, was not within the statute of frauds.

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 284*)—FORECLOSURE OF LIEN—VERDICT.

A grantor sued for rents, a portion of the consideration for the conveyance of the land to her two sons, one of whom had abandoned his interest, the other taking possession, and claiming the whole by adverse possession. The petition claimed rents for four years, at $400 per year, on all the land. The verdict rendered was: "We, the jury, find for plaintiff $200 for each year, 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907, to wit, $800, and said lien is hereby foreclosed." Held, that the verdict could not be considered, as finding that the rent was allowed for an undivided one-half interest in the land, and not on the whole land, so as to render erroneous the foreclosure of the lien on the whole land to secure the payment of the rents.

Action by Mrs. R. J. Tipton against Mrs. Angeline Tipton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Morrow & Smithdeal, for appellants. W. E. Spell and Vaughan & Hart, for appellee.

BOOKHOUT, J. This case was originally filed March 29, 1904, by Mrs. Rebecca J. Tipton against Mrs. Angeline Tipton, widow of E. G. Tipton, and Myra E. Tipton, Allie Tipton, and Bessie Ann Tipton, children of E. G. Tipton, to recover rents on a 115-acre tract of land. On December 5, 1907, the same plaintiff filed against the same defendants a similar suit for rent accruing subsequent to the filing of the first suit. The suits were consolidated, and as consolidated it was a cause for debt and foreclosure of vendor's lien, the amount of the debt being represented by the value of the rents for the tract of land described in plaintiff's petition, and for the years therein stated, the land having been conveyed by appellee to E. G. Tipton, deceased.

Error is assigned to the court's refusal to give appellant's special charge as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that in the year 1881 the plaintiff herein made a deed describing the land in controversy, and conveying the same by said deed to E. G. Tipton and Robert Tipton, and that, as a part of the consideration therefor, E. G. Tipton was to sign notes for a part of the purchase money, payable at the death of R. J. Tipton, and that he was to pay R. J. Tipton during her lifetime a fourth of the cotton, and a third of the grain grown on the premises, and further believe from the evidence that after said deed was made, to wit, about the year 1882, or before that time, the said Robert Tipton abandoned said premises, and that said premises were taken possession of by E. G. Tipton, and further believe from the evidence that E. G. Tipton refused to sign the notes and repudiated the contract to sign the same, if you believe he had agreed to sign the same, and that he failed and refused to pay to R. J. Tipton a third of the grain and a fourth of the cotton, and repudiated the contract to pay the same, if he had made said contract, claiming to own the same, and that he continued in possession of said premises from the said year 1882 up to the time of his death, to wit, on the — day of —, 1902, and that during said time he used, occupied, enjoyed, and cultivated said premises, and claimed to own the same, and held the same adversely to any claim of the said R. J. Tipton, then and in that event you are instructed that said E. G. Tipton acquired a title to the said premises by virtue of the 10-year statute of limitations; and, if you so believe, you are instructed that no vendor's lien could exist in favor of the plaintiff herein." There was no error in refusing said charge. Prior to 1881 R. J. Tipton, appellee, was the owner of 115½ acres of land in John Berry survey in Hill county. Some time in the year 1881 she conveyed the same to her two sons, R. T. Tipton and E. G. Tipton, for the consideration of $1,800, for which they were to execute their notes, payable to the respective heirs of R. J. Tipton after her death. As a further consideration, they were to pay to the grantor as rent one-third the grain, and one-fourth the cotton, raised each year upon the land during the lifetime of the grantor. No part of the cash consideration was ever paid. R. T. Tipton and E. G. Tipton took possession of the land under the terms of the agreement, and paid the rent in grain and cotton, according to contract, for several years. R. T. Tipton executed his notes as stipulated in the agreement, but E. G. Tipton failed to sign them. The deed was not to be recorded until the death of Mrs. R. J. Tipton, the grantor. At the close of the year 1883, or the first of 1884, R. T. Tipton abandoned the land, and E. G. Tipton took possession of all the land, claiming it as his own. E. G. Tipton, not having paid the consideration for the conveyance to him by R. J. Tipton of an undivided one-half interest in the land, the superior title to said one-half remained in R. J. Tipton, the grantor, and limitation did not run in his favor as against such grantor. Istes v. Browning, 11 Tex. 237, 60 Am. Dec. 238; White v. Cole, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 277, 29 S. ance. The trial court submitted the 10-year statute of limitation as to one-half of the land, and no complaint is made to his action in so doing.

It is contended that the trial court erred in refusing appellant's requested charge reading: "If you believe from the evidence that on the — day of —, 1881, the plaintiff, Mrs. R. J. Tipton, was the owner of the tract of land in controversy, and that at or about said date she and E. G. Tipton and R. T. Tipton made a contract, the effect of which was that the plaintiff R. J. Tipton was to convey to the said E. G. Tipton and R. T. Tipton the tract of land in controversy, and that they were to pay, as consideration therefor, the sum of $1,800 at the death of R. J. Tipton, and in addition were to pay one-third of the grain, and one-fourth of the cotton, grown on the premises during the life of R. J. Tipton, and if you further believe from the evidence that the said deed was signed and acknowledged by the said R. J. Tipton for the purpose of conveying said land to E. G. Tipton and R. T. Tipton, but further believe from the evidence that the said deed was not delivered to the said E. G. Tipton and R. T. Tipton, but that the same was retained by R. J. Tipton, and that it was her intention to retain same, and not deliver same, then and in that event you are instructed that the contract and transaction between said R. J. Tipton and her two sons, E. G. and R. T. Tipton, if you find there was such transaction, did not pass the title to said land from the said R. J. Tipton; and, if you so find, then you are instructed that, even though you may find the plaintiff herein is entitled to recover rents under other charges given you by the court, she would not be entitled to the foreclosure of any lien upon the land in question as security for the payment of said rents." The petition alleged the execution and delivery of the deed by R. J. Tipton to her two sons, E. G. and R. T. Tipton. The deed was signed and acknowledged by her. The deed was placed in E. G. Tipton's trunk. R. T. Tipton and E. G. Tipton took possession of the land and paid the rent in accordance with the terms of the contract between them for about two years, and up to the time R. T. Tipton moved off the land. The uncontroverted evidence in our opinion shows a delivery of the deed. The charge was properly refused.

These remarks apply also to the third assignment of error, and the same is overruled.

Error is assigned to the court's action in refusing appellant's special charge as follows: "You are instructed that even though you may believe from the evidence that E. G. Tipton promised and agreed, that he would pay to Mrs. R. T. [J.] Tipton one-fourth of the cotton and one-third of the grain grown on the premises in controversy during the lifetime of the said R. J. Tipton, you are nevertheless instructed that the undisputed evidence showing said contract not to have been in writing, the same is void for the reason that the same could not be performed within one year from the date of the making of said contract." This charge was properly refused. The contract was performable upon the death of Mrs. R. J. Tipton, and this was a contingency which might have happened within one year. It is only when the contract may not be performed within a year that the statute of frauds denounces it as void. Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 2543, subd. 5; Thouvenin v. Lea, 26 Tex. 612; Thomas v. Hammond, 47 Tex. 42; Lennard v. Lumber Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 383.

The third paragraph of the court's charge reads: "You are instructed that you must first determine from the evidence in this case whether or not, at the time of the execution of said deed, the plaintiff, Mrs. R. J. Tipton, entered into an agreement with E. G. Tipton and R. T. Tipton by which it was agreed between them that, as a part of the consideration of said land, in addition to that expressed in the deed, the said E. G. Tipton and the said R. T. Tipton should pay to the plaintiff annually as the rents on said premises one-fourth of the cotton and one-third of the grain during her life; unless you believe from the evidence that such agreement was made and entered into, then you will find for the defendants." It is contended that this is error, in that it authorized a recovery on account of an alleged verbal agreement to pay rents on the land, which, according to the pleading of the plaintiff and the evidence in the case had been conveyed to the defendants' ancestors by warranty deed, reciting a cash consideration, and reserving no rent or other right in the premises. The claim of the plaintiff is not based on a claim solely for rents, but also the additional fact that such rents, under the contract between the parties, were to be paid as a part of the consideration for the conveyance of the land, and constituted a vendor's lien on the land. The charge was correct, and in accord with the opinion on the former appeal of this case, 105 S. W. 830.

Complaint is made of the seventh paragraph of the court's charge, reading as follows: "The evidence introduced before you of the witness Mrs. Clementine McClendon, to the effect that the plaintiff, a few days after the death of the deceased, E. G. Tipton, executed a deed to her purporting to convey the land in controversy to the said Mrs. Clementine McClendon, and her testimony to the effect that she brought suit against the defendant in this case for the land in controversy, and that she lost said suit, and her further testimony that she reconveyed said land to the plaintiff, was admitted only on the issue affecting the credibility of the said Mrs. Clementine McClendon, and, on the issue showing a motive to testify as she did, and as to whether the same does affect her credit as a witness, or does show a motive to testify, are questions altogether for your consideration, and you will not consider said testimony for any other purpose." There was no error in giving this charge. The suit by appellee was not for a recovery of the land, but for the recovery of a part of the debt, representing part of the consideration to be paid for the conveyance of the land. The deed executed by appellee to Mrs. McClendon, the suit brought by her, and the result of the suit, were not admissible to prove plaintiff's case; the appellee not claiming the debt sued for, or the lien through Mrs. McClendon. The evidence to which the charge refers could only be considered as affecting the credibility of the witness.

It is insisted in the ninth assignment of error that the court erred in foreclosing a lien on the entire tract of land described in the petition, because the same is contrary to the charge of the court and the verdict of the jury. The petition sought to recover rent for four years at the rate of $400 per year on all the land. The verdict was as follows: "We, the jury, find for plaintiff $200 for each year 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907, to wit: $800.00, and said lien is hereby foreclosed." It is argued that the verdict shows that the jury found this sum for the rent of an undivided one-half of the land, and that the court erred in foreclosing the lien on the whole tract. To sustain this argument we would have to assume that the jury found that appellants acquired title to an undivided one-half of the land under the 10-year statute of limitations, and, further, that the verdict shows that they only found for plaintiff the rent for one-half the land. We cannot assume that such was their finding. The evidence as to the yearly value of the rents was controverted. There is nothing in the record to show affirmatively that the jury found for appellants an undivided one-half of the land under the 10-year statute of limitations. The verdict authorized the judgment.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Where, on appeal in an action for breach of contract, the transcript of the testimony contains a statement that the contract was put in evidence but it is not made a part of the record, and the transcript states that the contract was correctly set forth in the pleadings, the court may assume that the contract put in evidence was correctly set forth in the petition.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—HARMLESS ERROR—JUDGMENT.

Where, in an action against connecting carriers for damages to a shipment of horses, the evidence was sufficient to sustain a judgment against the delivering carrier for all the damages, it cannot be heard to complain on appeal that the judgment was against it for only one-half of the damages, and the receiving carrier cannot complain of a division of the damages as the interstate commerce act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, § 20, 24 Stat. 386 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3168]), as amended in 1906 (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 593 [U. S. Comp. Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; Irby Dunklin, Judge.

Action by J. H. Fenley against the St. Louis, San Francisco & Texas Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Andrews, Ball & Streetman and H. M. Chapman, for appellants. Bryan & Spoons, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. Appellee shipped a lot of horses from Carthage, Mo., to Ft. Worth, a distance of about 500 miles. The horses were received by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company at Carthage, and transported over a line of road controlled by it to the point where same connected with a line of road controlled by the St. Louis, San Francisco & Texas Railway Company. The latter company then transported them on and delivered them to the consignee at Ft. Worth. While transporting the horses, the carriers so negligently delayed and handled them as to depreciate their market value in Ft. Worth in the sum of $860. In accordance with the verdict of a jury so apportioning the damages, a judgment for one-half of the sum thereof was rendered in favor of appellee against each of the carriers. The complaint made on this appeal is that the evidence showed that a greater proportion of the damages than one-half thereof was due to the negligence of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company, but otherwise did not show how much thereof was due to its negligence and how much to the negligence of the other appellant, and therefore that the finding of the jury and judgment of the court apportioning the damages as stated was contrary to the evidence, in that they were against the St. Louis, San Francisco & Texas Railway Company for one-half thereof, and not supported by the evidence, in that it was not sufficient to authorize an apportionment of the damages to be made at all.

In his petition appellee alleged that the horses were delivered to appellants and to each of them at Carthage, and that they and each of them undertook and agreed to transport and deliver them to the consignee thereof at Ft. Worth. In the answer of appellants it was alleged that the contract was between appellee and the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company alone. In the transcript of the testimony admitted on the trial is a statement that the contract covering the shipment of horses was put in evidence; but it is not a part of the record on this appeal. It is merely mentioned in said transcript as being "correctly set forth in the pleadings in this case." If we assume, and in the condition stated of the record we think we should assume, the fact to be that the contract put in evidence was correctly set forth in appellee's petition, it is clear that neither of the appellants has a right to complain of the apportionment made of the damages; for such a contract would authorize a judgment against each of them for the entire amount of appellee's damages. But, if such an assumption should not be indulged, we still would be of the opinion that appellants' contention should be overruled. It does not appear from the evidence that a greater proportion than one-half of the damages was due to negligence of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. Appellants' contention that it does so appear is based on the assumption that the evidence shows that that company transported the horses much the greater portion of the distance between Carthage and Ft. Worth, and that much the greater part of the delay and rough handling resulting in the depreciation in the value of the horses at Ft. Worth occurred on its line; but, while the record may be said to show at what points between Carthage and Ft. Worth the delays and rough handling of the horses occurred, it does not show at what point between those places the initial carrier's control of the shipment ended, nor at what point the delivering carrier's control of same commenced. In the absence of such a showing, we do not think it can be said that the testimony established that a greater part of the delay and rough handling occurred while the shipment was being transported by one of the carriers than occurred while it was being transported by the other. If in determining such a question we should take notice without proof thereof of the line of railway in Texas operated by the St. Louis, San Francisco & Texas Railway Company, we hardly think we should take such notice of the distances between stations on such line of railway, or assume that that company did not control and operate any part of the line of railway over which the horses were transported while beyond the limits of the state, but while on their way to it.

Nor do we think we should take notice of the line of railway controlled and operated by the other appellant in another or other states over which the horses may have been transported. In this condition of the evidence, it not appearing that by the contract covering the shipment the respective carriers were exempted from liability for damages occurring off its own line, nor that appellee or some one representing him was required to and did accompany and care for the horses, evidence that the horses were delivered to one of the carriers at Carthage in good condition, and that they were delivered at their destination by the other in a damaged condition, prima facie was sufficient to authorize a finding against the delivering carrier for all the damages. G., C. and S. F. Ry. Co. v. Cushney, 95 Tex. 812, 67 S. W. 77; G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Edloff, 89 Tex. 458, 34 S. W. 414, 35 S. W. 144; T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Tom Green County Cattle Co., 15 Tex. Civ. App. 147, 38 S. W. 1138; 3 Hutch. Car. § 1348. In the Edloff Case, supra, the court said: "When the plaintiff showed the goods to have been in a damaged condition when tendered to him by the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railroad Company at Dallas, he made a prima facie case against said company for the full amount of the damage. In order to escape liability in whole or in part, it devolved upon said company to show that such damage as it disputed its liability for occurred on another line. Simply showing, as it has done in this case, that the goods were damaged to some extent, without showing how much, when delivered to it, does not defeat or in any wise meet plaintiff's prima facie case." As therefore the judgment in this case might have been against the St. Louis, San Francisco & Texas Railway Company for all the damages, irrespective of whether it alone or jointly with the other appellant contracted to transport the horses the entire distance from Carthage to Ft. Worth or not, it should not be heard to complain that the judgment was against it for only one-half the sum of the damages. Nor do we think the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company, if it should be assumed that, by the terms of the contract, it became liable only for damages due to its negligence while handling the horses, is in a better position than the other appellant is in to complain of the judgment. The twentieth section of the Interstate commerce act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 386 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3169]), as amended in 1906 (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 593 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 909]) declares "that any common carrier, railroad or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one state to a point in another state shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed." 2 Hutch. Car. p. 600. The statute quoted would have authorized a judgment against said St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company for all the damages found by the jury. In any view of the case, therefore, it should not any more than the other appellant be heard to complain of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed

Appeal from Hardeman County Court; H. W. Martin, Special Judge.

Action by W. W. Lane against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reformed and affirmed.

O. H. Yoakum and Decker & Clarke, for appellants. M. M. Hankins and D. E. Magle, for appellee.

FLY, J. This is a suit for damages arising from the negligent handling of certain cattle shipped by appellee from Quanah, Tex., to St. Louis, Mo. A verdict for $250 was rendered in favor of appellee, and from the judgment based thereon this appeal is perfected.

The first assignment of error complains of the admission in evidence of the depositions of C. A. McCormack; the grounds of objection being that the questions propounded were inserted by the notary who took the depositions, and because neither the original interrogatories nor certified copies were offered with the depositions. The assignment is not followed by a proper statement of the facts necessary in order to enable a court to pass upon the assignment. Mere references to the record do not constitute the statement required by the rules. Haley v. Davidson, 48 Tex. 615; McManus v. Wallis, 52 Tex. 534; Canal Co. v. McFarland (Tex. Civ. App.) 100 S. W. 435. This court is empowered under such conditions to totally disregard the assignment of error and to consider it as abandoned. Cooper v. Hiner, 91 Tex. 658, 45 S. W. 554. In this connection it may be stated that a perusal of the record does not sustain the claim that the interrogatories were those of the notary, and not those of the parties, and it also appears that on a former trial the depositions had been recognized as proper ones by appellants, and no motion to suppress the depositions was ever made. It was not claimed that the questions had not been correctly copied by the notary from the original ones.

cattle market on December 5, 6, and 7, 1905, which knowledge he gained from reference to the National Live Stock Reporter, which he kept in book form in his office, and the evidence was properly admitted. Railway v. Gunter, 89 Tex. Civ. App. 129, 86 S. W. 939; Railway v. Startz, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 85, 94 S. W. 212; Railway v. Bennett (Tex. Civ. App.) 103 S. W. 1115; Railway v. Kar-rer (Tex. Civ. App.) 109 S. W. 440. The statement of facts fails to sustain the state-ment of appellants that the witness con-sulted any records except the National Live Stock Reporter.

Appellee swore that he was present when his cattle were sold, and that certain ac-counts of sale which were handed him by commissionmen in St. Louis gave the cor-rect weights and prices of the cattle. The accounts of sale were not hearsay and were properly admitted in evidence. Appellee personally knew the weights and prices.

The court did not err in giving the charge complained of in the fourth assignment of error. The jury was informed of the care that devolved upon appellants in handling the cattle, and that if they had not exer-cised that care they would be guilty of neg-ligence. The domain of the jury was not invaded thereby. It amounted merely to a definition of "negligence." A similar charge was approved in the case of Railway v. Vaughn, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 195, 23 S. W. 745, cited by appellant. The charge did not men-tion any facts that would constitute negli-gence, but was general in its nature. It is very different from the charge condemned in Calhoun v. Railway, 84 Tex. 226, 19 S. W. 841.

To sustain the fifth assignment of error would deprive a trial judge of the power to apply the law to the issues of a case and permit him only to give abstract disserta-tions on the law and allow the jury to blind-ly apply such abstractions as they might see fit. The charge complained of in no manner invades the province of the jury.

The court erred in rendering judgment for interest from the date of the infliction of the damages, when the jury had not found for such interest. Interest as damages might have been allowed by the jury, under prop-er instructions by the court; but the court could not render judgment for such damages without having a basis for the same in the verdict. The interest was not a legal inci-dent of the sum found by the jury, and could not be added by the court. This is a mat-ter, however, that can be remedied by this court.

Action by the Bank of Mineral Wells against Alice Flynn and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

McCall & McCall and J. T. Daniel, for ap-pellants. A. Stevenson and Penix & Rans-pot, for appellee.

DUNKLIN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered by the district court of Palo Pinto county in favor of the Bank of Mineral Wells against Alice Wohleb (née Alice Flynn) for seven hundred dollars on a check in that sum dated December 20, 1904, drawn by Alice Flynn, then widow of Wil-liam Flynn, on the Merchants' & Farmers' National Bank of Weatherford, Tex. The check was drawn in favor of W. E. New-brough, who indorsed and delivered the same to appellee January 3, 1905, for a valuable consideration paid by appellee. Newbrough was a practicing attorney at law and receiv-ed the check in part payment for services rendered by him to William Flynn in pro-curing a contract to build two bridges in Palo Pinto county, which was awarded Flynn by the commissioners' court of that county. The two bridges were constructed under and by virtue of the contract; a portion of the work being done after Flynn's death. Mrs. Flynn duly qualified as administratrix of the community estate of herself and husband, William Flynn, and the suit was against her as such and also against her in her individual capacity. Paul W. Flynn, Nellie Flynn, Fred Flynn, Van Flynn, and Enid Flynn, children of William and Alice Flynn, were also made parties defendant in the suit; but the judgment of the court was in their favor. After the institution of the suit, Alice Flynn married Henry Wohleb, and judgment was against her in the name of Alice Wohleb. In her answer to plaintiff's petition, she pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, alleging that at the time the suit was instituted she and her codefendants were residents of Parker county, and by exception challenged the sufficiency of the petition because it failed to show that suit was instituted at the first term of court which convened after the draft was dishonored. Controverting the merits of the petition, she alleged that the draft upon which the suit was based was given by her to cover a balance which at the time it was given she supposed to be due Newbrough for services rendered William Flynn under a written contract of employment, and which contract Newbrough and his agents induced her to believe was valid and binding. She further alleged that by said contract of employment Newbrough engaged to procure votes for a bond issue to build the bridges, to bribe influential citizens to advise and favor the project, and to assist Flynn in procuring the contract for the work, and that the contract was therefore contrary to public policy and void.

Following is the written contract of employment executed by William Flynn and W. E. Newbrough and introduced in evidence by defendant Alice Wohleb: "The State of Texas, County of Palo Pinto. * * * This writing and agreement made and entered into on this the 27th day of February, 1904, by and between William Flynn and W. E. Newbrough, witnesseth: That said Flynn hereby agrees to pay said Newbrough the sum of $750 each for each bridge across the Brazos river that may be awarded to said Flynn by the commissioners' court of Palo Pinto county during the year 1904, as compensation for his services as an attorney already performed and to be performed in assisting said Flynn in obtaining said contracts, said compensation to become due and payable as follows: $750 of said amount upon the award of the contract or contracts and the approval of the county bonds issued to pay for said bridge or bridges and in the event of two bridges being awarded to said Flynn then the remaining $750 to be paid to said Newbrough on the date of the acceptance of the first of said bridges by said court and payment therefor. Said Newbrough hereby agrees to accept said above-named compensation as therein stated and to use his best efforts by all rightful and legal means to assist said Flynn in obtaining said contracts. It is hereby agreed and understood that this agreement is made and accepted in lieu of any and all other agreements heretofore made by the parties hereto and said former agreements are to be null and void. Signed in duplicate on the day and date first above written. Wm. Flynn. W. E. Newbrough."

Mrs. Wohleb testified upon the trial, without contradiction, that, when Newbrough first presented his claim for the $700, he explained to her "that it was for his services to Mr. Flynn in using his (Newbrough's) influence to secure from the commissioners' court of Palo Pinto county certain contracts for the erection of bridges in that county." She did not at that time give Newbrough the draft sued on, but testified that a few months later Newbrough's attorney came to collect the claim, and, relying upon his assurance of the validity of the claim, she gave him the draft in controversy, but afterwards countermanded its payment upon advice of her attorney that the claim was void.

J. L. Cunningham was introduced by defendant as a witness, and testified that he was a member of the firm of the Bank of Mineral Wells, and that Newbrough solicited him to assist Flynn in securing from the commissioners' court contracts to build the bridges, representing that Flynn had authorized him to offer Cunningham $200 for such assistance. This witness further testified that petitions requesting the commissioners' court to submit to a vote of the county the question of building the bridges were circulated by Newbrough in different portions of the county. It was proven by uncontroverted testimony that Newbrough appeared before the commissioners' court on several occasions, assisting in estimating cost of the bridges, the resources of the county available for purposes of building the same, and later urging the acceptance of Flynn's bid for the work. It was further shown that Newbrough, as attorney for Flynn, appeared before the Attorney General in Austin, and, by argument and upon additional evidence procured by him, secured that officer's approval of the bonds issued for the building of the bridges in question. The testimony of this witness was not controverted.

The court instructed the jury peremptorily to return a verdict in favor of plaintiff against defendant Alice Wohleb for the amount of the draft, and in this we think there was error. We are of opinion that the contract above referred to is contrary to public policy and void. The case of Providence Tool Co. v. Norris (by the United States Supreme Court) 2 Wall. 45, 17 L. Ed. 868, is strongly in point. That was a suit the United States government, and Justice Field, rendering the opinion of the court, said: "The question then is this: Can an agreement for compensation to procure a contract from the government to furnish supplies be enforced by the courts? We have no hesitation in answering the question in the negative. All contracts for supplies should be made with those, and with those only, who will execute them most faithfully and at the least expense to the government. Considerations as to the most efficient and economical mode of meeting the public wants should alone control, in this respect, the action of every department of the government. No other consideration can lawfully enter into the transaction so far as the government is concerned. Such is the rule of public policy, and whatever tends to introduce any other elements into the transaction is against public policy. That agreements like the one under consideration have this tendency is manifest. They tend to introduce personal solicitation and personal influence, as elements in the procurement of contracts, and thus directly lead to inefficiency in the public service, and to unnecessary expenditures of the public funds." See, also, Richardson v. Scotts Bluff Co., 59 Neb. 400, 81 N. W. 309, 48 L. R. A. 294, 80 Am. St. Rep. 682; Mills v. Mills, 40 N. Y. 543, 100 Am. Dec. 535; Burke v. Child, 21 Wall. 441, 22 L. Ed. 623. In the case of Mills v. Mills, supra, the court says: "It is not necessary to adjudge that the parties stipulated for corrupt action, or that they intended that secret and improper resorts should be had. It is enough that the contract tends directly to those results." In the case of Burke v. Child, supra, the following language is used in the opinion of the court: "We have said that for professional services in this connection a just compensation may be recovered; but, where they are blended and confused with those which are forbidden, the whole is a unit and indivisible. That which is bad destroys that which is good, and 'they perish together.'"

Appellee contends that it was an innocent purchaser of the draft for a valuable consideration, without notice of any defense against the payment thereof. The evidence showed that the check was drawn December 20, 1904, that a short time thereafter Mrs. Wohleb notified the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Weatherford to refuse payment of it, that its payment was accordingly refused by that bank, and that W. H. Eddleman, president of the latter bank, and also one of the partners of appellee the Bank of Mineral Wells, was notified of Mrs. Wohleb's refusal to pay the draft, before it was acquired by appellee on January 3, 1905. We are of the opinion that notice to W. H. Eddleman was there cited; 1 Lindley on Partnerships, bottom page 352.

The trial court should have instructed a verdict in favor of appellant Mrs. Alice Wohleb as well as in favor of the other defendants, and, as it is the duty of this court to render such judgment as should have been there rendered, the judgment of the trial court is reversed and here rendered in favor of appellants.

On Rehearing.

On original hearing we held that notice to W. H. Eddleman, one of the members of the partnership firm of the Bank of Mineral Wells, of Mrs. Alice Wohleb's countermand of the draft which was sued on, was notice to and binding upon the firm, and that the firm could not be heard on its plea of innocent purchaser of the draft, and in support of which plea evidence was introduced upon the trial.

We were constrained to reach this conclusion by reason of the general rule, announced without exception in all the decisions which we could then find, that notice to a member of a partnership firm of any fact pertaining to the business of the firm was binding upon the firm. Since rendering that opinion we are convinced that in that holding we were in error. In 30 Cyc. p. 530, after announcing the general rule above stated, the following language is used: "If the notice relates to an individual transaction of the notified partner, or to one outside the scope of the firm business, it ought not to be imputed to his copartners." In the case of Baldwin v. Leonard (by the Supreme Court of Vermont) 39 Vt. 260, 98 Am. Dec. 324, one Leonard was sued for the price of goods purchased from the firm. His defense was that he purchased same as agent of another, and should not be held liable personally therefor. The proof showed that the member of the firm who made the sale knew nothing of the agency of Leonard, although another member of the firm, who took no part in the sale and did not know of it until after its consummation, had been told previously by Leonard that he expected to call at some future time and purchase the goods, and that the same would be purchased by him as agent for another. The court held that this knowledge of the latter member of the firm was not binding upon the firm, and that Leonard was liable personally for the value of the goods purchased by him. In Bienenstock v. Ammidown, 155 N. Y. 47, 49 N. E. 321, it is said: "The rule of law which attaches a responsibility to the status of a partnership relation for the acts of a copartner, within the scope of business transactions, is founded upon a just view of the requirements of public commercial interests.

To extend its operation to the extent of imputing the notice or knowledge of a copartner acquired in transactions outside of the partnership business, and which were had for his individual benefit, to the other, would be to convert the rule into an instrumentality of injustice." We think the quotation last made applies with force to the case at bar. As found in our original opinion, the check which was purchased by appellee was drawn by Mrs. Wohleb on a bank in Weatherford, and the latter bank, through Eddleman as its president, was notified by the drawer to refuse payment. In this manner Eddleman received notice of the dishonor of the draft, but he had no notice that it would be sold to the Mineral Wells Bank, and the managers of the latter bank had no notice that Eddleman had been informed of the dishonor of the draft. We therefore believe that this transaction should constitute an exception to the general rule originally announced, and that notice to Eddleman that the draft had been countermanded was not notice to appellee.

We still adhere to our former ruling that the contract between Newbrough with Flynn was contrary to public policy and void, but the fact that a balance supposed to be due on that contract was the consideration for the draft sued on would be no defense to its payment in the hands of an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice that the draft was founded upon an illegal consideration. Campbell v. Jones, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 265, 21 S. W. 723.

Appellee's motion for rehearing is therefore granted, and the cause remanded for another trial.

DALLAS CONSOL. ELECTRIC ST. RY. CO. v. CHAMBERS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 17, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 8, 1909.)

1. JURY (§ 58*)—DRAWING PANEL—VALIDITY OF ACT.

Acts 30th Leg. 1907, p. 269, c. 139, relating to the selection of a jury in counties with cities having a certain population, is constitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—QUESTION OF LAW OR FACT.

Where there is a failure to perform a duty prescribed by statute, or when the facts are undisputed and such that only one conclusion can be drawn from them, then the question is one of law, and it is not error to so instruct the jury; but where the act done or omitted is not prescribed by statute, or the facts not conclusive, then it is for the jury to say whether it is negligence or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-353; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where under an ordinance it is the duty of a street railway company to keep a vigilant watch and to stop the car as soon as possible upon the appearance of danger, an instruction that it was the duty of the motorman to have such control of his car as would enable him to so stop the car was erroneous, as it was a question for the jury to determine whether he had such control, and, if not, whether such failure was negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 253; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

4. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—NEGLIGENCE—STOPPING CAR—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where a city ordinance requires signal lights for cars after sunset, but does not prescribe the power or strength thereof as to the distance the light shall be thrown, it is error to instruct that the motorman should not have been running his car at a greater rate of speed than would have enabled him to have stopped the car within the distance covered by the light thrown by his own headlight, as this was a question for the jury to decide.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

5. STREET RAILROADS (§ 81*)—OPERATION—CARE REQUIRED.

Under an ordinance requiring vigilant care of a motorman to prevent accident, it is error to charge that the law requires of the motorman such watchful care as will prevent accidents or injuries to persons who, without negligence on their part, may not be able to get out of the way of the passing car, as the company is not an insurer against accidents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 172, 174; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 228*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ABBREVIATIONS.

The use of the abbreviation "etc." in a charge on damages is not to be commended, as the court should specify what things he means, and not leave it to the jury to speculate as to other things he has reference to.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; E. B. Muse, Judge.

Action by R. L. Chambers against the Dallas Consolidated Electric Street Railway Company for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. H. Walne and Finley, Knight & Harris, for appellant. H. P. Lawther and Chas. M. Ming, for appellee.

RAINEY, C. J. This is a suit to recover damages for personal injuries, instituted by appellee against the appellant. The petition alleged, in substance, that appellee was riding across the street at the intersection of Live Oak and Hawkins streets, when a car operated by appellant along Live Oak street was negligently caused to collide with him, which resulted in his being injured. Appellant answered by general denial and contributory negligence. A trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee.

The first assignment of error complains of the court for not quashing the jury panel, the contention being that the law enacted by the Thirtieth Legislature (Acts 1907, p. 269, c. 139), under which the jury were drawn, is unconstitutional. In the case of Traction Co. v. Danforth (Tex. Civ. App.) 116 S. W. 147, we passed upon this precise question, and there held the said act of the Legislature was not unconstitutional, and a writ of error was refused by the Supreme Court; therefore said assignment is not well taken.

Complaint is made of the following paragraph of the court's charge: "You are instructed that while a street railroad company has the right to run its cars on a public street, yet the public have also the right to travel thereon, and at street crossings the rights of both to cross are equal, and that the duty is imposed upon both to exercise such care and precaution to avoid accidents as a reasonable prudence would suggest. The degree of care required by the law of a street railroad company is proportioned to the danger attendant upon its operation at the time and place in question, and increases with the increase of the danger, and in the case of a motorman upon an electric car traversing the streets of a city the law requires such watchful care as will prevent accidents or injuries to persons who, without negligence on their part may not be able to get out of the way of the passing car. In this case it was the duty of the motorman to keep a vigilant watch for all vehicles and persons, either on the track or moving towards it, and upon the first appearance of danger to stop the car in the shortest time and space possible, and to have such control over the speed of his car as would enable him to so stop said car. It was the motorman's duty to give warning of the approach of the car to Hawkins street by ringing the gong on the car. It was the duty of the defendant company to have said car provided with a signal light of sufficient power to give timely notice of the car's approach to Hawkins street, and the motorman should not have been running his car at a greater rate of speed than would have enabled him to have stopped said car within the distance covered by the light thrown forward by his own headlight. The failure on the part of the defendant company or its motorman to perform any or all of the duties above named, if you find from the evidence that there was such failure, was negligence, as said term is used in this charge with reference to the defendant street car company."

Where a duty is prescribed by statute, and there is a failure to perform such duty, or "where the facts are undisputed and such that only one conclusion can be drawn from them, then the question is one of law," and it is not error for the court to so instruct the jury; but where the act done or omitted is not prescribed by statute or the facts not "conclusive," then it is for the jury to say whether it is negligence or not. Railway Co. v. Murphy, 46 Tex. 357, 26 Am. Rep. 272; Railway Co. v. Hill, 71 Tex. 451, 9 S. W. 351.

The charge violates the principles announced in some particulars. After instructing the jury as to the duty prescribed by the city ordinance to keep a vigilant watch and to stop the car as soon as possible upon the appearance of danger, it adds, "and to have such control over the speed of his car as would enable him to so stop said car." This last sentence is not contained in the ordinance. It might be argued that the car could not be stopped as soon as possible unless he had control of the speed of his car, but it was a question for the jury to determine whether or not he had such control, and, if not, whether such failure was negligence.

The charge further instructs the jury that "it was the duty of the defendant company to have said car provided with a signal light of sufficient power to give timely notice of the car's approach to Hawkins street, and the motorman should not have been running his car at a greater rate of speed than would have enabled him to have stopped said car within the distance covered by the light thrown forward by his own headlight." The city ordinance requires a signal light for cars after sunset, but it does not prescribe the power or strength thereof as to the distance the light shall be thrown. Nor does it prescribe within what distance the car must be stopped. It was therefore a question for the jury to determine whether or not it was negligence in the motorman, if the car was not stopped in the given distance.

The charge told the jury that the law requires of the motorman such watchful care as will prevent accidents or injuries to persons who, without negligence on their part, may not be able to get out of the way of the passing car. This charge makes the street car company insurers against accident. The ordinance requires vigilant care of motormen to prevent accident, but not such care as will absolutely prevent it. This is a greater burden placed on the company than the law imposes. The care imposed by law is ordinary care; that is, such care as persons of ordinary prudence would use under similar circumstances. "Ordinary care will require the exercise of a very great degree of vigilance under some circumstances, and the amount of vigilance and caution to be used will vary according to the situation of the parties and the surrounding circumstances. But the standard by which the acts are to be judged does not change; it remains the same." For a full discussion of this principle, see Railway Co. v. Smith, 87 Tex. 348, 28 S. W. 520. In said paragraph all the acts therein specified are denominated negligence by the court. In so far as the acts therein named were not made negligence by the statute or ordinance, the charge was erroneous, and as to these it should have been left to the jury.

The court charged the jury, if they found for plaintiff, to assess damages for "loss of time, any sum of money paid out or debts incurred by him for the services of physicians, for medicine, etc." The use of the abbreviation "etc." in a charge is not to be commended. Doubt often arises by its use to determine what other things it includes. The court should specify what things he means, and not leave the jury to speculate as to the other things he has reference to.

For the errors in the charge pointed out, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded.

ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RY. CO. OF TEXAS v. A. A. JACKSON & CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 24, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 169*)—CONNECTING CARRIERS—WHO ARE.

A railway company engaged in shifting cars delivered to it by a carrier to the house tracks of consignees is not a connecting carrier, but is the agent of the carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 734; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 110*)—CARRIAGE OF PERISHABLE FRUIT—CARE REQUIRED.

A carrier receiving for transportation a refrigerator car loaded at New York in March with perishable fruit destined for Texas must use ordinary care to protect the fruit by keeping the car ventilated and properly iced, though the bill of lading showing that the car is loaded with perishable fruit is silent on the subjects of ventilation and icing, and though it is customary among shippers of fruit from New York to Texas, during the seasons when the weather is so warm that it becomes necessary to ice the cars before shipping the same, to cause instructions to be placed in the bill of lading in reference to icing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 508; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 134*)—CARRIAGE OF FRUIT—INJURIES—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action against a carrier for damages to perishable fruit during transportation, the evidence showed that the fruit when shipped was in good condition, and was properly packed in a refrigerator car, and that the only reason for its failure to reach the point of destination in sound condition was the failure of the carrier to keep the car ventilated and iced, the evidence showed the negligence of the carrier and not the character of the fruit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 185*)—CARRIAGE OF FRUIT—LIABILITY OF TERMINAL CARRIER—PRESUMPTIONS.

In the absence of any evidence on the subject, the presumption is that damages to freight during transportation resulted from the negligence of the last connecting carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 835; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

Appeal from Dallas County Court; W. M. Holland, Judge.

Action by A. A. Jackson & Co. against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas appeals. Affirmed.

Crane, Gilbert & Crane, for appellant. Lenke & Henry, for appellee.

BOOKHOUT, J. This is a suit filed by appellee in the county court of Dallas county against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company, and appellant, the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas for damages. The substantial allegations in appellee's petition are as follows: On March 5, 1904, the firm of Austin & Dye, of Medina, N. Y., shipped to appellee at Dallas, Tex., 174 barrels of apples in car ARL No. 8,549, which car was a refrigerator car properly equipped for the preservation of the apples contained in said shipment. That said car of apples was transported by the defendant St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company from Memphis, Tenn., to Texarkana, Tex., and there delivered to its codefendant, St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas, the appellant herein, which transported same to Dallas, Tex., at which last-named point it delivered said car to its codefendant, the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, who delivered said car to appellee at Dallas, Tex., on March 17, 1904. That said apples were in sound condition when delivered to the railway company at Medina, N. Y., but that when delivered to appellee at Dallas, Tex., a large amount of same were rotten and of no value whatever. That the rotten condition of said apples and the damage thus caused to same was due to the negligence of said defendants in failing and refusing to ice said car while in their possession, when the temperature of the atmosphere was high, and in failing and refusing to properly adjust the ventilators; that said car was fully equipped with ventilators and with ice bunkers designed to hold ice for the proper preservation of perishable goods contained therein. That by reason of said negligence the interior of said car became heated on the southern part of its journey, and that by reason of said ventilators being closed said apples received no fresh air and were caused to be heated and spoiled. Appellee claims damages in the sum of $282.52. The appellant, St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas, answered by general demurrer, general denial, and specially answered that this suit grew out of a shipment of a car load of apples from Medina, N. Y., to Dallas, Tex., and was an interstate shipment. That it originated at Medina on March 5, 1904, under a through bill of lading issued by the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad from Medina, N. Y., to Dallas, Tex., pursuant to directions of appellee. That among other things, said bill car load of apples, and was transported in the same car in which they were loaded at Medina, N. Y., to Dallas, its destination. That while in appellant's custody said car of apples was handled with care and dispatched with promptness and expedition. That same was delivered to appellee after 8 o'clock p. m. on March 16, 1904, at Texarkana, Tex., and was forwarded from that station to its destination, Dallas, Tex., at 1 o'clock a. m., March 17, 1904, and that it arrived at Dallas at 7:40 p. m. on March 17, 1904, and was promptly delivered to appellee in like condition as when it was received by appellant. That plaintiff was both the consignor and the consignee in this shipment, but that he gave no directions for icing the car, either at the point of origin or while in transit, nor did he give directions, as it was his duty to have done; concerning the opening of the ventilators in said car, if he had wanted any such course pursued by any carrier having the custody of such shipment. Appellant further averred that, if the carriers handling said shipment between the point of origin and destination were to have iced or re-iced said car in transit, it was the duty of appellee, and the custom of the business of shippers of apples or other perishable fruits, to have noted on the way-bill accompanying such shipment his directions for icing and re-icing of said car in transit, of all of which plaintiff was advised at the time of making this shipment, and he could and would have refused to pay the charges for the icing or re-icing of said car if it had been done without his direction as aforesaid. That there was no request to ice or re-ice said car, and no notice of appellee's desire that it should be done, if he did so desire it done, on the waybill or bill of lading under which this appellant received and transported said car. When said cause was called for trial, appellee dismissed as to the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company. A trial was had before the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment against appellant in favor of appellee in the sum of $202.50, with interest from the 19th day of March, 1903, at the rate of 6 per cent. Appellant perfected an appeal to this court.

The first assignment complains that the court erred in rendering judgment against it. The contention is made that the evidence conclusively showed that this car of apples was delivered by appellant to the Texas & Pacific Railway Company at 7:15 a. m., and that the said Texas & Pacific Railway Company delivered same to appellee at 4 p. m. on the same day, and nowhere did appellee overcome the legal presumption that the appellee at Dallas, Tex. The appellant transported said car from Texarkana to Dallas, and delivered said car to the terminal railway company at Dallas, which terminal railway company, in turn, delivered to the Texas & Pacific Railway Company to be shifted by the last railway company to the house track of the appellee on the line of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company. The Texas & Pacific Railway Company in placing the car upon the unloading track was not a connecting carrier within the meaning of the statute, but acted as the agent of the appellant. Railway Co. v. Young (Tex. Civ. App.) 107 S. W. 127; T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Scoggins, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 526, 90 S. W. 521.

Again, it is contended that the evidence conclusively shows that the damage to said apples was directly and proximately due to the failure of appellee and its agents to give directions to the carriers handling the shipment to re-ice the same in transit, and to open the ventilators, and the court should have rendered judgment in favor of appellant. The shipment was made on March 5, 1904, from Medina, N. Y., to Dallas, Tex. It was made in a refrigerator car which did not contain any ice. At the time it was cold at Medina, the temperature being 10 degrees above zero. Appellee's agents superintending the shipment did not give any instructions in reference to icing the car, and none were contained in the freight bill. The failure to open the ventilators of the car and to ice the car after the climate became too warm to safely transport them was the cause of the damage to the apples. The question arises, is it the duty of a carrier transporting perishable shipments to use reasonable diligence to protect said shipments from changes in the weather, provided the shipper has exercised the precaution to use a car by which the carrier would be enabled to regulate the temperature of the car, notwithstanding the shipper has failed to give the carrier instructions regarding same? In discussing this question, Mr. Hutchinson, in his third edition on Carriers, § 646, uses the following language: "In short, the conclusion to be drawn from all the cases upon this subject is that, whenever the situation or condition of the goods, from accident or from any cause, becomes such as to require especial care or attention, the carrier must put himself in the place of their owner, and do for them all that might reasonably be expected of a prudent and careful person, and, if necessary, it would be his duty to incur any expense in their preservation which their value would justify and which their condition might make necessary. His contract and his obligation is not only to carry the goods, but to carry them safely; and when they become exposed to the danger of deterioration or destruction from their own inherent infirmity, or from any cause for which the carrier is not accountable, the law makes it his duty to employ at least a reasonable degree of skill and diligence to preserve them, and, if he fail to do so, it will be accounted negligence, and he will be liable for the loss, though the actual proximate cause of it may be one for which, but for his negligence, he would be in no wise responsible."

The case of Beard v. Illinois Central R. R., 79 Iowa, 518, 44 N. W. 800, 7 L. R. A. 280, 18 Am. St. Rep. 381, was a shipment of butter delivered at West Union, Iowa, to a carrier to be shipped to New Orleans, La. No directions were given to the carrier by the shipper as to icing or re-icing the car for the protection of the butter. It was in a damaged condition when delivered to the consignee at New Orleans. In discussing the liability of the carrier under such circumstances, that court used language as follows: "We will proceed to inquire as to the duty of defendant upon receiving the butter in a car from the Cairo Short Line for transportation to New Orleans, without directions or instructions as to the character of the car in which it should be carried. A carrier's duty is not limited to the transportation of goods delivered for carriage. He must exercise such diligence as is required by law to protect the goods from destruction and injury resulting from conditions which, in the exercise of due care, may be averted or counteracted. He must guard the goods from destruction or injury by the elements; from the effects of delays; indeed, from every source of injury which he may avert, and which, in the exercise of care and ordinary intelligence, may be known or anticipated. Unknown causes, or those which are inherent in the nature of goods, and cannot be, in the exercise of diligence, averted, will not render the carrier liable. The nature of the goods must be considered in determining the carrier's duty. Some metals may be transported in open cars. Many articles of commerce, when transported, must be protected from rain, sunshine, and heat, and must have cars fitted for their safe transportation. Live animals must have food and water, when the distance of transportation demands it. Fruit, and some other perishable articles, must be carried with expedition and protection from frost. So the carrier must attend to the character of the goods he transports. He is informed thereof by inspection of the freight bills, or other papers accompanying the shipment. In the case before us the marks on the package and the waybill disclosed that the subject of the shipment was butter. The employes of defendant were endowed with intelligence which taught them that the season was summer, when warm weather prevailed; that butter in common cars would be greatly injured by the ordinary heat of the climate; and that the butter, as it approached its destination, would be subject, by reason of the change of latitude, to greatly increased heat from the weather. All these things are familiarly known to all men. Surely, the law will presume that defendant's employes had full knowledge thereof. The law required the defendant, having received the perishable cargo involved in this suit, to exercise the care and diligence necessary to protect it, and, if improved cars for the transportation of articles of commerce liable to injury from heat were in use, it was defendant's duty to use such cars in carrying the butter."

The learned judge delivering the opinion cites many cases supporting the principles therein announced. We are impressed with the reasoning in that case, and are of the opinion that it is applicable to the facts of this case. It is true that it was the custom among shippers of fruit from New York to Texas, during the seasons when the weather is so warm that it becomes necessary to ice the cars before shipping the same, to cause instructions to be placed in the bill of lading in reference to icing the car. But it is not the custom to place instructions in the bill of lading where the car is not iced before starting on its journey. The car in which the apples were shipped was not iced when it started on its journey, and the weather at Medina was cold, the temperature being 10 degrees above zero. The billing by the railroad put the agents of the carrier upon notice that the car was loaded with perishable property, and it was the duty of the carrier to use ordinary care to protect it from injury. There was evidence that when the car reached Texarkana, at which point appellant received it, its employe having charge of the car knew that the car was a ventilated car, but he made no inspection of the same to see whether it needed ventilation, or to see whether or not the goods were hot or whether the car needed icing, although it is admitted that facilities for icing the car existed at the time at Texarkana. The maximum temperature on the day the car passed through Texarkana was 75 degrees.

It is also contended that the damage to the apples was not due to negligence of appellant in handling same, but the loss, if any, was from decay, due to the inherent character of the apples, the said fruit being what is commonly known as "cold storage apples," which the evidence showed spoil rapidly. The evidence shows that the apples when shipped were in good condition and were properly packed, and the only reason for their failure to reach Dallas in sound condition was the failure of the carrier to keep the car ventilated and properly iced.

It is contended that the evidence showed conclusively that no part of the damage oc-sumption is that the damage resulted from its negligence.

The judgment is affirmed.

WEBB v. J. L. WIGINTON & CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 24, 1909.)

1. SEQUESTRATION (§ 21*)—WRONGFULLY SUING OUT WRIT—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

To entitle a party to exemplary damages for the wrongful suing out of a writ of sequestration, both malice and want of probable cause must exist.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sequestration, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

In a suit for possession of rented property, wherein defendants reconvened for maliciously and wrongfully suing out sequestration, the court charged that, in order to find that the writ was sued out maliciously, the evidence need not show that the plaintiff had actual enmity towards defendants, but that if he had rented the property for a term, and, knowing that he had rented it for a term, he sued out the writ, it would be malice. Held, that such charge was on the weight of evidence, in that it told the jury that certain facts would constitute malice, while malice was not alone sufficient to award exemplary damages in the absence of the want of probable cause, which was a question for the jury under the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 439-466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

3. SEQUESTRATION (§ 21*) — ACTION FOR WRONGFULLY SUING OUT — MISLEADING CHARGE.

The charge was misleading, in that the jury had the right to conclude the existence of malice alone was sufficient to authorize a recovery for exemplary damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sequestration, Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

Appeal from District Court, Hill County; W. C. Wear, Judge.

Action by J. C. Webb against J. L. Wiginton & Co. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed on condition that defendants remit a part of the damages recovered on a plea in reconvention.

Collins & Cummings, for appellant. Morrow & Smithdeal, for appellees.

RAINEY, C. J. Appellant brought this suit on September 18, 1907, against the appellees to recover the possession of a store building which it was claimed had been rented to appellees, who held possession thereof, they claiming their lease had not expired, though in fact it had expired September 1, 1907. A sequestration was sued out by appellant on the ground, in effect, that he feared they would make use of their possession of said premises to convert the fruits and revethe malicious and wrongful suing out of the sequestration. A trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for both actual and exemplary damages, from which this appeal is taken.

We will only discuss one of the assignments of error, as that one only presents error, which is as follows: "The court erred in giving special charge No. 1, requested by the defendant, which is as follows: 'In order to find that the writ of sequestration was sued out maliciously, it is not required that the evidence should show that the plaintiff had actual enmity towards the defendants; but if the plaintiff had rented the property to the defendants for a term and not by the month, and knowing that he had rented it for a term, sued out the writ of sequestration, the same would be malicious.'"

To entitle the awarding of exemplary damages for the wrongful suing out of a writ of sequestration, both malice and the want of probable cause must exist. Culbertson v. Cabeen, 29 Tex. 247; Lynch v. Burns (Tex. Civ. App.) 79 S. W. 1084. In the case of Culbertson v. Cabeen, supra, where the question of malice and probable cause are discussed, the court says: "'In a legal sense,' says Mr. Greenleaf, in his work on Evidence, vol. 2, § 453, 'any unlawful act done willfully and purposely to the injury of another is, as against that person, malicious.' It need not imply malignity, nor even corruption, in the appropriate sense of these terms. Any improper motive constitutes malice in the sense it is here used. Drake, Attachment, § 733. The question of malice is for the jury, to be determined from the facts and circumstances proved. And so the question of probable cause, though a mixed question of law and fact, may ordinarily and properly be submitted to the jury, and the existence of probable cause may be implied by the jury from such facts and circumstances as lead to the inference that the party was actuated by an honest and reasonable conviction of the justice of his suit, or, with reference to this case, of the existence of the facts on which he based his application for the attachment. But in order to have this effect, it should appear that such facts and circumstances, or so much of them as was sufficient to induce the belief, were communicated or known to the party before he commenced his proceedings."

The special charge requested and given, under the circumstances, was upon the weight of the evidence; that is, it tells the jury that certain facts would constitute malice, but malice alone is not sufficient upon which to award exemplary damages in the absence of the want of probable cause. It takes both elements to warrant the finding of exemplary damages. Whether or not the want of probable cause existed under all of the facts and circumstances in evidence, should have been submitted to the jury for their determination. The court's main charge told the jury if the writ was sued out willfully and maliciously to find exemplary damages against plaintiff. Nothing was said therein about the want of probable cause as an element necessary for such finding. The special charge was misleading, in that they had the right to conclude the existence of malice alone was sufficient to authorize a recovery for exemplary damages. This charge was error, and will cause a reversal, unless the amount of the judgment for exemplary damages, $215, is remitted in 15 days, in which case it will be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

GARBER v. ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RY. CO. OF TEXAS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 17, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 317*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—RATE OF SPEED—ORDINANCES.

A railroad company is liable for injuries at a crossing caused by running its trains through the town at a speed greater than six miles an hour in violation of an ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1009; Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 318*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE—RINGING BELL.

A railroad company is liable for injuries at a crossing caused by its violation of an ordinance requiring the engine bell to be rung continuously within the corporate limits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1002; Dec. Dig. § 318.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 305*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—BLOWING WHISTLE—FRIGHTENING TEAM.

A railroad company is liable for injuries at a crossing caused by negligently blowing the whistle, thereby frightening plaintiff's mules and overturning his wagon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 969; Dec. Dig. § 305.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 345*)—FRIGHTENING ANIMALS—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Where plaintiff alleged negligence on the part of defendant railroad company in running its train over a crossing at a speed greater than six miles an hour, in failing to keep the bell ringing continuously within the corporate limits, in violation of ordinances, and in negligently blowing the whistle so as to frighten plaintiff's mules, he was entitled to recover on proof of negligence in either respect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1114; Dec. Dig. § 345.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 345*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—ISSUES.

In an action for injuries caused by plaintiff's mules being frightened at a crossing and turning over his wagon, allegations as to the presence of a house near the crossing, which shut off the view, raised no issue of negligence, except as its presence made it more necessary, for the protection of travelers, to keep within the speed limit and continuously ringing the bell, as required by ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1118; Dec. Dig. § 345.*]

6. RAILROADS (§ 344*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—PLEADING—VIOLATION OF STATUTES.

Allegations, in an action for injuries at a crossing, that defendant's trainmen failed to blow the whistle on approaching the crossing, as required by ordinance, did not allege the violation of the statutory duty to sound a whistle 80 rods from the crossing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1111; Dec. Dig. § 344.*]

7. RAILROADS (§ 351*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries at a street crossing claimed to have been caused by frightening plaintiff's mules by a sudden blast of the whistle, while the train was running without continuously ringing the bell, as required by ordinance, and in excess of the limit of speed fixed by ordinance, it was error to instruct that plaintiff could not recover if the failure to ring the bell and the excessive speed did not cause the accident, since the violation of the ordinance in those respects might have contributed to the injury by increasing the danger from the sudden blasts of the whistle.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1199; Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

8. RAILROADS (§ 351*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries at a street crossing claimed to have been caused by running the train in excess of six miles an hour in violation of an ordinance, evidence was admitted that the ordinance was not enforced, and the customary rate of speed was greater than six miles an hour, an instruction that plaintiff could not recover unless the "excessive" speed was the cause of the accident was calculated to mislead the jury to believe that plaintiff could not recover if the speed of the train did not exceed the usual speed, though it was greater than six miles an hour.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1199; Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

9. RAILROADS (§ 317*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—ACTIONS—DEFENSES.

That a speed ordinance was customarily violated, and the train operatives were not prosecuted therefor, was not a defense to an action for injuries at a crossing caused by running the train in violation of the ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1010; Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

10. RAILROADS (§ 347*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries at a crossing claimed to have been caused by the violation of an ordinance limiting the speed of trains to six miles an hour, testimony that the city had never prosecuted violations of the ordinance was irrelevant and harmful, as tending to lead the jury to believe that the nonobservance of the ordinance was not negligence if violations thereof had never been prosecuted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1133; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

11. RAILROADS (§ 347*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries at a crossing claimed to have been caused by exceeding the speed limit and failing to ring the bell, in violation of ordinances, and by negligently blowing the whistle at the crossing, thus frightening plaintiff's mules, testimony by one who was at a distance from the place of the accident

— INSTRUCTIONS — APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries at a crossing caused by plaintiff's mules being frightened by a sudden blast of an engine, where the evidence showed that the train was running in excess of the speed permitted by ordinance, and that plaintiff looked and listened, but did not know of the train's approach until a moment before his team became frightened, when the train was within 20 feet of the crossing and the mules were within 15 feet of the track, a charge that if plaintiff knew he was approaching the crossing, and that a train might pass at any time, and permitted the wagon to be driven up to the track without protest, when one of ordinary prudence would have protested or gotten out of the wagon, he could not recover, was inapplicable under the evidence, and prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1204, 1208; Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

13. RAILROADS (§ 327*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS — CARE REQUIRED BY TRAVELER.

A traveler has an equal right with a railroad company to use a street crossing, and he is not required to stop his team or get off the wagon unless he knows that a train is approaching.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1050; Dec. Dig. § 327.*]

14. RAILROADS (§ 309*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS — CARE REQUIRED BY COMPANY.

A railroad is only required to use ordinary care to prevent crossing accidents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 981; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

15. RAILROADS (§ 351*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS — INSTRUCTIONS — MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries at a railroad crossing claimed to have been caused by running the train in excess of the prescribed speed limit and failing to continuously ring the bell, as required by ordinance, a charge that it was the company's duty to use ordinary care to avoid accidents at a railroad crossing was in conflict with another charge that the company was negligent if it violated the ordinance, and was misleading.

Rainey, C. J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from District Court, Hunt County; T. D. Montrose, Judge.

Action by J. B. Garber against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas. From a judgment for defendant; plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

B. Q. Evans, for appellant. E. B. Perkins and Templeton, Crosby & Dinsmore, for appellee.

TALBOT, J. This is the second time this case has been before us. See 108 S. W. 742. It is a suit instituted by the appellant against the appellee to recover damages on account of alleged personal injuries charged to have been sustained by the appellant through the negligence of appellee's servants in the oper-two spans of mules, a train of defendant passed the crossing and the mules became frightened at the train, overturned the wagon, and injured him. The specific grounds of negligence alleged, as we understand the petition, are: (1) That the train was, in violation of a valid ordinance of the city of Greenville, being run at a greater rate of speed than six miles per hour; (2) that the train was being operated in violation of a city ordinance of said city requiring the bell of a moving engine, while in the corporate limits of the city, to be kept continuously ringing; (3) the negligently giving of a quick and sudden blast of the whistle on the engine when within about 40 feet of the street crossing (the mules of plaintiff then being within 15 or 20 feet of the crossing), thereby frightening the mules and causing them to overturn the wagon. The defendant, railway company, answered by general denial and plea of contributory negligence. The judgment from which the former appeal was prosecuted was in favor of the plaintiff, but the last trial resulted in a judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The first assignment of error complains that the trial court committed affirmative error in failing to submit separately and as distinct grounds of recovery the several negligent acts alleged. We think this assignment is well taken. An inspection of the court's charge discloses that only the two first-mentioned grounds of negligence charged in plaintiff's petition were submitted for the consideration of the jury, and those two conjunctively. The charge should, in our opinion, have been so framed as to authorize a recovery, if the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence in either of the respects alleged, and such negligence was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. The allegations of the petition charging defendant with negligence in running the train in question at a greater rate of speed than six miles an hour, and in failing to keep the bell on the engine continuously ringing, in violation of the city ordinance, and in giving a quick and sudden blast of the whistle when so near the crossing and plaintiff's mules, show independent causes of action, the establishment of either of which would entitle plaintiff to a verdict, if he was otherwise entitled to recover. We do not think it conclusively appears, as contended by appellee, that the sounding of the whistle near the crossing was proper, or that it was not the cause of the alleged accident. We do think, however, that the allegation of the petition relating to the presence of the house near the street and railroad track, of speed prescribed by the ordinance, and to give notice of the approach of trains by ringing the bell, as is also prescribed by the ordinance. We are further of the opinion that the allegations of the petition were not sufficient to charge the defendant with a violation of the statutory duty to sound the whistle 80 rods from the street crossing. The allegation is "that, at the time they approached the crossing, they were not ringing the bell and had failed to blow the whistle or to give any other notice of their approach to said crossing as required by said ordinance." (Italics ours.) The language, "as required by said ordinance," clearly limits the charge contained in the sentence of failure to ring the bell or blow the whistle, to that required by the ordinance, and does not charge a violation of our statute on the subject.

Appellant's third and fourth assignments complain, respectively, of the giving of the following special charges requested by the defendant:

"(1) Even if you should believe from the evidence that the bell of the engine was not being rung as it approached the crossing where the alleged accident occurred, you would not be authorized to find for the plaintiff on that ground unless you further believe from the evidence that the failure to ring the bell was the cause of the alleged accident.

"(2) Even if you should find from the evidence that at the time of the accident the train was running at a rate of speed greater than six miles per hour, you would not be authorized in finding for the plaintiff on that ground, unless you further believe from the evidence that the excessive speed of the train was the cause of the alleged accident."

We are inclined to think these charges should not have been given. In the case of St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Garber, 111 S. W. 227, which is a companion case to the case at bar, we held, upon testimony practically the same as that disclosed by the record in this case, that there was no error in refusing charges identical with those under consideration. We said in that case that: "The evident object of requiring the bell of an engine to be rung while the engine is in motion in the corporate limits of a city is to give notice to those who may be approaching a street crossing of the approaching of trains, that they may avoid the probable danger of placing themselves too near such trains, and that the failure on the part of the railway company in this instance to ring the bell, in compliance with the ordinance of the city of Greenville, may be said to have been a concurring cause proximately contributing to the accident in question. That, with reference to the running the train in the corporate limits of the city at a greater rate of speed thereby induced to give the sudden blast of the whistle, as described by the witness, and appellee's team took fright at such blast of the whistle and overturned the wagon, such excessive rate of speed may also be said to have been a concurring cause proximately contributing to the accident. That the charges under consideration ignored this phase of the case and were therefore inapplicable." For the same reasons we think the charges ought not to have been given in the present case. It is true that in the case cited we further predicated our ruling upon the ground that the court's main charge in that case covered the issues sought to be submitted by the special charges; but we are of the opinion that the reasons given in the above quotation are sufficient to justify our conclusions in the matter.

We are further of the opinion, however, that the second of said special charges, in view of the testimony relating to the usual rate of speed made by trains in approaching and passing over the street crossing, was calculated, by the use of the word "excessive" to characterize the speed at which the train must have been running in order to justify a finding favorable to the plaintiff on the issue of propelling the train at a greater rate of speed than 6 miles per hour, to mislead the jury. There was evidence offered by appellee, and admitted by the court, tending to show that the speed ordinance had not been enforced by the city authorities, and that the train, which is claimed to have frightened appellant's team, was running at the usual rate of speed, which was from 8 to 12 miles per hour. The use of the word "excessive" in this charge, when the charge is interpreted in the light of the testimony referred to, was calculated, we think, as argued by appellant's counsel, to induce the jury to believe that, although they should find that the train, in this instance, was running at a greater speed than 6 miles per hour, yet if it did not exceed the usual speed of 8, 10, or 12 miles per hour, they could not find for plaintiff on that issue. The violation of the speed ordinance could not be justified on the ground that it was customary for trains to exceed the rate of speed allowed by said ordinance, and that the operatives had not been prosecuted therefor. Of course, in the absence of testimony tending to show violations of such an ordinance and acquiescence therein on the part of the city, the term "excessive speed" would naturally be construed to have reference to and mean any speed in excess of that prescribed by the ordinance.

Appellant's eighth assignment of error complains of the court's action in permitting limits of the city at a greater rate of speed than six miles per hour. We think this assignment is well taken. The testimony was irrelevant and harmful. Its effect was to lead the jury to believe that, if the city had not prosecuted train operatives for a violation of its speed ordinance, the nonobservance of said ordinance did not constitute negligence. As above stated, appellee could not excuse its failure to observe the ordinance on the ground that its agents had not been prosecuted for its violation. So, too, the testimony of the witness Fayette Norman, to the effect that if he was down somewhere about Stonewall street crossing of the appellee and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad, and heard a whistle blow up in the neighborhood of the Mineola overhead bridge, and situated where he could not see the engine or train that sounded the whistle, he could not tell what road the engine or train was on, is immaterial; but as the failure to blow the whistle at the distance from the crossing prescribed by our statute was not alleged as a ground of recovery, and therefore not an issue in the case, the error in admitting this testimony is probably of no serious consequence.

Complaint is made of the following special charge given at the request of the appellee, namely: "If you believe from the evidence that, as the wagon plaintiff was riding on approached the crossing where the alleged accident occurred, plaintiff knew he was approaching such crossing, and that a train might be expected to pass the crossing about that time, and that, with such knowledge, he permitted the wagon to be driven up to the crossing without protest on his part, and that he could have prevented the wagon from being so driven up to the crossing, or have gotten off of the wagon in time to avoid being injured, and, if you further believe that a person of ordinary prudence situated as plaintiff was, under the circumstances surrounding him, would have protested against the wagon being driven up to the crossing, or would have gotten off of the wagon, and if you further believe that the plaintiff's failure to protest against the wagon being driven up to the crossing, or his failure to get off the wagon, caused or contributed to cause the accident of which he complains, then you should find for the defendant." We are of the opinion the evidence did not call for the giving of this instruction, and that it was prejudicial. Whether or not the bell on the engine was being rung, or any other signal given to warn persons traveling along the street and intending to pass over the crossing of the approach of the train, was a controverted issue; but it approach and presence near the crossing until a moment before the mules became frightened and overturned the wagon. It appears that there was a house located on the west side of the street and north of the railroad track, and that it stood about 20 feet from the street and about 30 feet from the railroad track. Appellant testified that as he approached the crossing he looked and listened for "any trains that might be coming," that there was an opening between the house next to the railroad and the city barn north of the house through which a person could see to the west, that when he passed this opening he looked through this opening and did not see any train, and that he did not know what time trains passed there. He further testified: That the first thing he knew of the train it was right at the east end of the house, and about 20 feet west of the crossing, and at that time he, on the wagon, was in front of the house going south; the lead or front mules being within about 15 feet of the railroad track. That about the first thing he heard was a little short whistle, and the train dashed right out from behind the house, frightened the mules, and they jumped forward, turned right fast around, and turned the wagon over. The charge complained of does not make the duty therein imposed upon appellant, in the exercise of ordinary care, to protest against the wagon being driven up to the crossing, or to get off the wagon, to avoid injury from the train, depend upon knowledge on his part of the approach of the train and probable danger of getting too near the railroad track, nor upon the exercise of ordinary care to discover the approach of the train, but solely upon his knowledge that he was approaching the crossing, and that a train might be expected to pass the crossing at any time. We do not think the failure of appellant to do the things mentioned or enumerated in the charge can, under the evidence, be accounted negligence on his part. His right to use the crossing was equal to appellee's right to use it, and, in the exercise of ordinary care to protect himself from injury from its passing train, he would not be required to stop his wagon and team or to get off the wagon, in the absence of knowledge on his part of the approach of the train or negligence in failing to discover its approach.

Nor do we think the special charge requested by appellee, and the giving of which is made the basis of appellant's twelfth assignment of error, that "it is as much the duty of one driving on a public street to use ordinary care to avoid accidents at railroad crossings as it is the duty of train the case, except that phase of it presented by the allegations that, when the engine reached a point about 40 or 60 feet west of the street crossing, the engineer negligently gave a quick and sudden blast of the whistle, which frightened appellant's mules and caused them to overturn the wagon. It is not questioned that the general rule is that train operatives, like travelers on the highway, are required to use only ordinary care to prevent accidents at public crossings; but in the case at bar two grounds of negligence alleged, and upon which appellant sought to recover, are, as has been seen, that the train was being run, in violation of ordinances of the city of Greenville, at a greater rate of speed than six miles per hour and without ringing the bell on the engine. Now, as we understand the law, the duty of train operatives to observe the ordinances of a city, like their duty to comply with the requirements of a statute, is absolute, and the failure to do so is negligence per se. This rule is recognized in the learned trial judge's general charge, but the special charge in question instructed the jury, in effect, that it was the duty of appellee's servants, in operating the train alleged to have frightened appellant's mules, to exercise ordinary care only to prevent injury to him. As applied to the causes of action alleged for a failure to comply with the city ordinances, the special charge was doubtless in conflict with the general charge upon the same subject and calculated to mislead the jury. Therefore it should not have been given.

Mr. RAINEY, Chief Justice, does not concur in this last conclusion, but is of opinion that the special charge is applicable, whether the ground of negligence be a violation of an ordinance of the city or arises otherwise. He does, however, agree to a reversal of the judgment upon the other grounds stated in this opinion.

Assignments of error not discussed disclose no reversible error.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded.

SOUTHWORTH v. PECOS & N. T. RY. CO.†
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 8, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 6, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 321*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—INJURY TO ALIGHTING PASSENGER—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a carrier for injuries to plaintiff's wife while alighting, the court charged defining "ordinary care," and stated under the circumstance "and deemed highest degree of care" as that care which a person possessed of the highest degree of care and prudence engaged in the same employment would have exercised under the same circumstances, and charged the jury to find for plaintiff on the issue of negligence in causing the train to jerk, if, after the train had come to a standstill, it was caused to suddenly move with a jerk, stating that it was negligence in defendant to cause it to so move, but to find for defendant unless they believed that the jerking and moving, if there was such, was negligence as the term was defined in the charge. Held, that the charge was not misleading as giving the jury to understand that the only duty defendant owed the passenger was to exercise such care for her safety as a person of ordinary prudence would have exercised under the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1326-1337; Dec. Dig. § 321.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—NEGLIGENCE—STANDING ON CAR PLATFORM.

It is not negligence as matter of law for a railway passenger to stand on the platform or steps of a car while it is approaching a station.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1376-1378; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a carrier for injuries to an alighting passenger, where there was no evidence or claim that defendant did not exercise proper care in stopping the train at the station, error in a charge that if the injured person left her seat and stood upon the platform before the train was stopped and fell as a result of the sudden stopping of the train, plaintiff could not recover, was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 232*)—INSTRUCTIONS—FORM OF VERDICT.

A charge that, if the jury should find for the plaintiff, the form of their verdict should be, "We, the jury, find for plaintiff," and, if they should not find for plaintiff, then their verdict should be "We, the jury, find for the defendant," was not objectionable as misleading them to believe that they were not free, if they disagreed, to report the fact to the court and to refuse to find for either party.

Appeal from District Court, Potter County; J. N. Browning, Judge.

Personal injury action by H. A. Southworth against the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The suit was by appellant for damages for personal injuries to his wife, alleged to have been suffered by her as the result of appellee's negligence in failing to have some one to assist her as a passenger in alighting from one of its trains, and in causing the train, while she was attempting to alight therefrom, after it had stopped at the station, to suddenly move and jerk, throwing her from the steps of the car against the same and to the ground. The appeal is from a judgment in appellee's favor, in accordance with the verdict of a jury.

Appellant's wife was a passenger on one of appellee's trains when it reached Amarillo from Texico. With her was her son, seven years of age, and her daughter, nine years of age. Mrs. Southworth testified: That, after the train had reached the station at Amarillo and stopped, she and her children attempted to alight from same; that appellee had no one at the steps to assist them to alight; and that, as she followed her children down the steps of the car, carrying in her hands a grip weighing 40 or 50 pounds, the car suddenly was jerked or moved, causing her to become overbalanced and to fall from the steps, whereby she was injured. The daughter testified: That she and her mother and brother were standing on the platform of the car as the train approached the station; that when the train "came to a full stop" the witness and her brother alighted therefrom; and that "the train jerked while her (my) mother was going down the steps." McDonald, a witness for appellant, testified that Mrs. Southworth was on the first step below the floor of the train, and that she fell as the train stopped. Mrs. McGillvray, Miss McGillvray, and Mrs. Wynn, also passengers on the train, and witnesses for appellant, each testified that she alighted from the train at Amarillo immediately after it stopped at the station, and did not notice that the train moved after it stopped there, and thought it stood perfectly still. The testimony of Bryant and Monfort, witnesses for appellee, also was to the effect that the train was standing still when appellant's wife fell from the steps or platform of the car. The witness Monfort, who was the conductor in charge of the train, further testified that when Mrs. Southworth fell he was going towards the steps of the car to assist passengers in getting off the same, and in another instant would have reached the steps, "in ample time," he added, "to assist people in getting off who had not left their seats before the train came to a stop."

L. C. Barrett and J. M. Jones, for appellant. Madden & Truelove, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Appellant's contention that the court submitted, as an issue in the case to be determined by the jury, a question as to whether Mrs. Southworth was a passenger on the train or not, in face of uncontradicted and conclusive evidence that she was such a passenger, is not supported by the record. On the contrary, the court in his charge assumed that she was a passenger on the train.

The court in his charge defined "ordinary care," and, after telling the jury that a failure to exercise ordinary care "is negligence in the sense that the term 'negligence' is used in this charge," further instructed them that "negligence, as applied to the acts or omissions, if any, of defendant, its servants and agents, in connection with the accident in question, is the doing of that which a person possessed of the highest degree of care and prudence would not do, or the failure to do that which such person would not omit to do under the circumstances; and by the term 'highest degree of care' is meant that degree of care which a person possessed of the highest degree of care and prudence engaged in the same kind of employment would have exercised under the same circumstances." Proceeding in his charge to submit to the jury an issue as to whether appellee had been guilty of negligence in causing the train to suddenly move or jerk after it had been brought to a standstill, the court, after cautioning the jury to "bear in mind the foregoing definitions," etc., on other conditions specified, instructed them to find for appellant, if they believed the train "was caused to suddenly move with a jerk," and that it "was negligence in defendant, or its servants," in causing it to so move; but, on the other hand, to find for appellee on this issue, unless they believed that the jerking and moving of the train, if it was jerked and moved, "was negligence as that term is defined in this charge." Appellant urges that appellee owed to his wife as a passenger on its train the care which a very prudent and cautious person would have exercised under the circumstances, and that the instruction was misleading, in that the jury might have understood, from the language just quoted from the charge, that the duty appellee owed to his wife was only to exercise such care for her safety as a person of ordinary prudence would have exercised under the circumstances. Assuming that the jury was composed of men of ordinary intelligence, we think it should be said that they could not have been misled by the inexact way in which the instruction was worded in the particular complained of. They had been specifically told by the court that the word "negligence," when referred to in the charge as a test by which to determine the character of an act or omission on the part of appellee in connection with the accident, meant a failure to use the care which a "person possessed of the highest degree of care and prudence engaged in the same kind of employment would have exercised under the same circumstances." The sufficiency of the definitions given by the court is not questioned by any of the assignments of error.

In the seventh paragraph of the court's charge, the jury were instructed to find for appellee if they believed Mrs. Southworth left her seat in the car and went to the platform thereof before the train had stopped at the station, and, because she was on the platform or the steps thereof, fell as a result of the sudden stopping of the train, and not as a result of a sudden jerking thereof after it had stopped. If the evidence had made cannot be said as a matter of law that it is negligence for a passenger to stand on the platform or steps of a car while it is approaching a station. Railway Co. v. Johnson (Tex. Civ. App.) 103 S. W. 241; Choate v. Railway Co., 90 Tex. 82, 86 S. W. 247, 87 S. W. 319. But there is no evidence in the record tending to show that appellee did not exercise proper care in stopping the train. No witness testified that it was "suddenly" stopped, nor to any fact or circumstance indicating that it was not stopped in the ordinary and proper way. As, therefore, a recovery could not have been had by appellant for negligence by appellee predicated upon its manner of stopping the train, the error in the instruction on that phase of the case should be treated as harmless.

With reference to the form of their verdict, the court instructed the jury: "If you find for the plaintiff, the form of your verdict will be as follows: 'We, the jury, find for plaintiff.' * * * If you do not find for the plaintiff, then your verdict should be: 'We, the jury, find for the defendant.'" The effect of the instruction, it is contended, was to tell the jury to find for appellee if they could not agree on a verdict. The instruction was improperly framed, and perhaps was susceptible of the construction claimed for it; but, again assuming the members of the jury to have been men of ordinary intelligence, we do not think they thereby could have been misled to believe they were not free, if they disagreed, to report the fact to the court and to refuse to return a verdict in favor of either of the parties.

When considered with reference to the record, we think the assignments of error presented in the brief and not already disposed of do not point out an error which should operate to reverse the judgment of the court below.

Therefore said judgment is affirmed.

Error from District Court, Dallas County; T. F. Nash, Judge.

Action by R. W. Poage and wife against Regina Menczer. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Wendell Spence, for plaintiff in error. F. D. Cosby, for defendants in error.

TALBOT, J. Defendants in error, R. W. and S. E. Poage, husband and wife, instituted this suit against the plaintiff in error, Mrs. Regina Menczer, to enjoin her from fencing or otherwise obstructing a strip of land 5 feet wide by 50 feet in length, across the northwest end of lot No. 7, in block 551 east of Thomas' addition to the city of Dallas. The petition alleged: That in August of 1901, one James McNab was the owner of said lot 7, block 551 east; that he, on that date, for a valuable consideration paid by plaintiff, "granted a strip of land 5 feet wide by 50 feet long across the northwest end of said lot 7, block 551 east for the purpose of an alley; that thereafter McNab inclosed lot 7 with a fence, leaving out for the use of plaintiff and the public generally the said strip of land 5x50 feet across the northwest end of said lot; that thereafter McNab sold the tract of land to one Wimmer, and in the deed expressly recognized said strip 5x50 feet off the northwest end of said lot 7 as an alley, and excepting same from his warranty; that thereafter Wimmer conveyed the property to Mrs. Menczer; that she is about to inclose the said strip 5x50 feet, and thereby inclose part of said alley and destroy the same for the purpose of an alley and exclude plaintiffs and the public from the use thereof for the purpose for which the same had been dedicated and used; that defendant had obstructed and inclosed a part of said alley excluding plain-ant to remove the obstruction placed by her in said alley. By trial amendment the plaintiffs amplified the allegation of their original pleading and alleged: That the alley or strip of land 5x50 feet off the northwest end of lot No. 7, block 551 east, mentioned in their original petition, had been dedicated to the use of plaintiffs and the public since August 30, 1901, by an instrument in writing executed by McNab for the sum of $10, $2.50 of which was then paid, and $7.50 thereafter; that after the granting of said strip of land by the former owner, McNab, to plaintiffs, the adjoining lot owners on either side left out and open for said alley the balance of the lands needed to make the alley 10 feet wide up to and across plaintiffs' lot; that such alley has from then until now been used by plaintiffs and adjoining lot owners for alley purposes, and has been open as an alley for the general public; that the dedication and granting for alley purposes has been accepted by the city of Dallas "by said city having grading work done in said alley." A preliminary mandatory injunction against defendant was issued, as prayed for by plaintiffs.

The defendant below (now plaintiff in error) answered plaintiffs' pleading and, after general and special demurrers and general denial, filed special answer, as follows: That she is the owner of lot 7, block 551 east of the Thomas addition, which is a lot of land fronting 50 feet on Colby street and extending thence northwest a depth of 150 feet by actual survey. That said lot by these dimensions was conveyed by Miss Mary T. Thomas, one of the heirs of the Thomas estate, to James A. McNab, by deed dated June 4, 1901, and duly recorded. That thereafter McNab conveyed the lot of land by the same description, and calling for the same dimensions, to J. E. Wimmer. That by said deed of conveyance the entire lot 7, block 551 east, being a lot 50x150 feet, in size, was conveyed to said Wimmer, but that the deed contains this recital: "It is understood, however, that the title to the strip of land 5x50 feet off the west or northwest end of said lot is not covered by the warranty of this deed, said strip being now used as an alley, and same is only quitclaimed to said Wimmer." That thereafter in May, 1906, Wimmer and wife conveyed the same lot 7 by the same dimensions of 50x150 feet to this defendant. That defendant paid for said property in cash and took title to same and every part thereof, and thus became the owner of and entitled to said lot of land of size 50 feet front on Colby street by 150 feet in depth. Defendant specially on information and belief that when McNab owned lot 7 in block 551 east that he, at the solicitation of the plaintiff, R. W. Poage, granted to him a license to use a strip of land off the northwest end of said lot 7, 5 feet wide by 50 feet long, as a passage way from Routh street to the plaintiffs' lot. She denied that the license so granted to Poage was binding upon her as a subsequent purchaser and owner of lot 7, block 551 east. She averred that according to the map of Thomas' addition to Dallas, Tex., duly recorded in Deed Records of Dallas county, and as the lots and blocks were actually laid off upon the ground, no passageway whatever was left by those who laid out the addition, between defendant's lot and the lot immediately adjoining her lot on the northwest. She averred that she purchased all of lot 7 of block 551 east in good faith for a valuable consideration, and without any notice whatever that McNab had made any grant to plaintiffs of any part of said lot such as was binding on subsequent purchasers of said lot 7. A jury trial on June 13, 1907, resulted in a verdict, instructed by the court, as follows: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs, and that the injunction heretofore issued be perpetuated." Judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict, and defendant brings the case to this court by writ of error.

The material facts are as follows: Block 551 east of the Thomas addition, in which the properties of the plaintiffs and the defendant are located, is bounded by Colby street, Routh street, Thomas avenue, and Peak avenue, now Fairmount avenue. James McNab was the owner of lot 7 in said block in August, 1901. On that day he executed the following written instrument, in words and figures as follows: "Dallas, Texas, August 30, 1901. Received of R. W. Poage $2.50 part payment for 5 feet for alley between Colby street and Thomas avenue. Amount still due $7.50. [Signed] Jas. A. McNab." The balance of the purchase money was thereafter paid by Poage to McNab. When McNab improved lot No. 7, above mentioned, he left for the alley 5 feet by 50 feet off the northwest end of the same. He owned the property about two years after he improved it, and the alley was left open all during that time. He conveyed the said lot No. 7 to J. E. Wimmer on July 23, 1904, with this recitation in his deed: "It is understood, however, that the title to the strip of land 5 feet by 50 feet off the west or northwest end of said lot is not covered by the warranty of this deed, the said strip being now used as an alley, and the same is only quitclaimed to said Wimmer." The strip of land 5 feet by 50 feet across the west or northwest end of said lot 7 has been used as an alley since 1901 and is still used as such alley. The alley has not been opened up through the entire block, but, together with the strip in controversy and dedications made by adjoining property owners, on either side for said alley, extend a distance of 120 feet from Routh street and is 10 feet wide. Plaintiff in error, Mrs. Regina Menczer, bought said lot 7 in block 551 east from J. E. Wimmer about the 28th day of May, 1906. The passageway or alley was open when she bought, and has been, since its dedication to the public in 1901, a way of ingress and egress to and from the rear of the houses of property owners adjacent thereto, and used for those purposes and conveniences to which an alley is usually and commonly devoted in a city. The alley was graded by the city authorities at McNab's request when he owned the lot. J. E. Wimmer and wife deeded lot No. 7 in block 551 east of the Thomas addition to the plaintiff in error, Mrs. Menczer, on May 28, 1906, and she paid therefor the sum of $1,900 cash. When she bought the lot she did not know that McNab had executed and delivered to Poage the written instrument dated August 30, 1901, acknowledging the receipt of $2.50 from Poage in part payment of five feet for alley between Colby street and Thomas avenue, and stating therein a balance due therefor of $7.50. This instrument was not placed of record, and the deed from Wimmer and wife to Mrs. Menczer describes the lot conveyed to her as "lot No. 7 in block 551 east of Thomas addition to the city of Dallas, said lot fronting 50 feet on the northwest line of Colby street and extending back between parallel lines 150 feet more or less."

We shall not quote and discuss in detail the several assignments of error. The principal propositions contended for by the plaintiff in error are, in effect: (1) That the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the written instrument executed and delivered by James A. McNab to R. W. Poage, dated August 30, 1901, acknowledging the receipt by McNab of $2.50 from Poage in part payment for five feet for an alley between Colby street and Thomas avenue, and reciting a balance due therefor of $7.50, because said instrument does not describe any particular tract or parcel of land and is insufficient in and of itself to convey any right, title, or interest to the plaintiffs or either of them in respect to the strip of land in controversy, or to affect in any way the title to said land; that it requires words of grant to create an easement or permanent interest in realty; that said instrument is wholly insufficient to satisfy the requirement of the statute of this state, which declares that no estate of inheritance or freehold in lands shall be conveyed unless the conveyance be declared by an instrument in writing, subscribed and delivered by the party disposing of the same; that under the statute of frauds the memorandum of the sale of land must be so reasonably definite and certain within itself or by other writing referred to that the contract can be made out as to the parties, consideration, and subject-matter without resort to parol evidence. (2) That the trial court erred in permitting the witnesses Poage and McNab to testify that said written instrument or memorandum was intended to designate the strip of land five feet wide off of the northwest end of lot No. 7, in block 551 east of Thomas' addition to the city of Dallas, and that the amounts of money specified in said instrument had been paid, because the failure to describe the land in said contract or memorandum of sale so that it can be identified cannot be cured by parol evidence showing what land was in contemplation of the parties in making the contract. (3) That there is no evidence that the strip of land in question was ever dedicated to the public as a passageway.

Article 624, Rev. St. 1895, provides that: "No estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than one year in lands and tenements, shall be conveyed from one to another, unless the conveyance be declared by an instrument in writing, subscribed and delivered by the party disposing of the same," etc. Under this statute it is held by our Supreme Court that a permanent right to hold another's land for a particular purpose is an important interest, and that, whether such right be denominated an easement or a license, if it be equivalent to an estate in the land, it cannot be conveyed except by writing. Parsons v. Hunt, 98 Tex. 420, 84 S. W. 644. It is also true that, in order to satisfy the statute of frauds, the memorandum of an agreement for the sale of land must "be so reasonably definite and certain within itself or by other writing referred to that the contract can be made out, as to parties, consideration, and subject-matter, without resort to parol evidence." Johnson v. Granger, 51 Tex. 42. But we do not regard these as the governing principles in the case at bar. We are of the opinion that the question involved is one of dedication vel non, and that the evidence objected to was clearly admissible. In the early case of Oswald v. Grenet, 22 Tex. 94, it is said: "Respecting what will amount to or may be received as evidence of a dedication, the law is too well settled to admit of controversy. A setting apart, or dedication to a public use, to be effectual, need not be by deed; nor need it be evidenced by the use of it having been continued for any particular said that "a dedication has been defined to be the act of devoting or giving property for some proper object, and in such manner as to conclude the owner." In Wolf v. Brass, 72 Tex. 133, 12 S. W. 159, the same doctrine is announced in the following language: "To constitute a dedication so as to estop the proprietor and his privies, there need not be a formal grant by deed; nor is it necessary that use by the public should be continued for so long a time as to raise the presumption of a grant. It is sufficient if there has been some act or declaration upon the part of the owner of the fee indicating unequivocally his purpose to dedicate, and the public has used the property for the purpose to which the act or declaration of the proprietor indicates it was his intention to dedicate it."

The written instrument, to the introduction of which the defendant objected, in this case was admissible as tending to show that the intention of James A. McNab, who was then the owner of the strip of land in controversy, was to appropriate said strip of land to the use of the public as an alley. The fact that McNab received a consideration from Poage for so appropriating said land does not destroy or seriously impair the force of said instrument as evidence of a dedication of it to the use of the public. It is clear from the evidence as a whole that it was neither the purpose of McNab to convey the strip of land to Poage for his private and individual uses, nor of Poage to acquire it for such purposes. On the contrary, we think it was shown beyond controversy that it was the intention of both that said land should be set apart as an alley for public use. This being true, no writing whatever was necessary to accomplish the object in view, as the statute of frauds has no application to the doctrine of dedication. All that is necessary to the validity of a dedication is the assent and intent of the owner of the land to appropriate it to public use, and any act or acts clearly manifesting an intent to dedicate is sufficient. There was therefore no error in admitting the said written instrument in evidence, nor in allowing parol testimony to locate said strip of land and identify it as that referred to in said instrument. If correct in the foregoing views, the fact of dedication was conclusively established by the evidence, and the court correctly instructed a verdict for the plaintiffs.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

PLAINTIFF'S ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Plaintiff is entitled to an allowance of the attorney's fee provided in a note for the purchase price of land where he employed an attorney agreeing to pay him the amount so provided, though he did not agree as to the amount until after the institution of the action.

The mere clerical error of omitting the pronoun "I" in the blank space in a printed note providing for an attorney's fee is immaterial in an action on the note.

Error from District Court, Comanche County; N. R. Lindsay, Judge.

Action by M. S. Gaines against L. S. Rutherford and others. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant Rutherford brings error. Affirmed.

Kearby & Kearby, for plaintiff in error.
J. M. Reiger, for defendants in error.

SPEER, J. Defendant in error, M. S. Gaines, filed this suit in the district court of Comanche county against defendants in error F. M. Bagley, E. E. Anthony, J. M. Easeley, S. F. Brown, and plaintiff in error, L. S. Rutherford, to recover on four certain promissory notes executed by F. M. Bagley, each for the sum of $395, providing for interest and attorney's fees, and to foreclose a vendor's lien on 118¾ acres of the Adam Shipley survey in said county. There was a trial before the court resulting in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff against Bagley for the amount of the note, interest, and attorney's fee, together with a foreclosure as against all the parties to the suit. The defendant Rutherford alone prosecutes this writ of error.

Defendant in error asks us to dismiss the writ of error because of an agreement had between defendant in error and plaintiff in error, Rutherford, subsequent to the rendition of the judgment in the district court, whereby plaintiff in error agreed, in consideration of defendant in error's not taking out an order of sale until November 1st thereafter, not to prosecute an appeal or writ of error proceedings from such judgment. A written agreement of date February 25, 1909, showing what the terms of the first agreement, which was oral, were, has been filed with the motion, and we might, under the authority of Johnson v. Halley, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 137, 27 S. W. 750, be authorized to dismiss the appeal; but we find it unnecessary to decide this question, since practically the same results are reached in the disposition we make of the appeal.

Plaintiff in error's first complaint is that the court erred in rendering judgment for attorney's fees because defendant in error did not contract with or become liable to her attorney for the payment of such fees. The evidence submitted by plaintiff in error shows, however, that defendant in error employed J. M. Reiger, Esq., to institute this suit, and, while she did not at the time agree with him upon the amount of the fees to be paid, she nevertheless did after the suit was filed agree to pay him the 10 per cent. provided for in the notes sued on, if he could collect the same "out of the land."

Again, we think the mere clerical error of omitting the personal pronoun "I" in the blank space of the printed form providing for attorney's fees is worthy of no consideration, since the meaning of the undertaking is otherwise perfectly clear.

The remaining assignments, to the effect that the judgment was erroneous to the extent of $40 which had been paid on the notes, are overruled because plaintiff in error had not pleaded payment, and, in the absence of such a plea, he was not entitled to a finding on that issue. Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 1268.

We find no error in the judgment, and it is affirmed.

BOND et al. v. INTERNATIONAL & G. N. R. CO.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 7, 1900.
Rehearing Denied May 12, 1900.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 473*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—NONEXPERT—SUBJECT-MATTER OF TESTIMONY.

A nonexpert witness should state the facts and leave all conclusions or inferences to the jury, where the jury are as capable of forming a conclusion as the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2220-2233; Dec. Dig. § 473.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—CONCLUSIONS OF WITNESS.

In an action for the death of a person killed while walking on defendant's track, a witness testified that he saw deceased walking beside the track, and that he walked there until defendant's train was close to him, when he stepped upon the track; that as soon as the train stopped witness went back to where deceased was lying, and that he saw tracks made by decedent where he made a step or two to the end of a tie, and then across the rail towards the center of the track, where he was struck. It was shown that there was a variety of tracks in the pathway, and there was no showing as to any distinction between tracks made by deceased and the tracks of other people. Held, that the admission of the evidence as to the tracks of deceased was harmless error, for the facts upon which the opinion was formed were given, and the jury could not have been misled if the facts testified to did not justify such an opinion; and it was also rendered harmless by the reception of similar evidence, unobjected to, from other witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4160, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 151*)—GROUNDS—SUFFICIENCY—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

It is not error to refuse a new trial for newly discovered evidence, where the motion is based on the affidavit of a person who gives a counter affidavit which so qualifies the original affidavit as to leave it of no probable importance, and the excuse for not having discovered the evidence sooner was incredible and negated by other testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 311; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 150*)—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DILIGENCE.

After judgment for defendant in an action for causing the death of plaintiffs' decedent while he was walking on defendant's track, a motion for new trial was based on newly discovered evidence of a witness, who was defendant's foreman at a station near the place of the accident. The motion stated that the witness "is not now in the employ of defendant, and that plaintiffs did not locate his present whereabouts, until the day before the trial, and as soon as he was located plaintiffs used every means in their power to secure his attendance as a witness, but failed." The affidavit of the proposed witness was introduced, showing that the witness had seen footprints at the side of defendant's track, and that he also saw the print of a foot on the end of a tie, and that he took out his knife and cut the size and shape of the shoe in the tie; and the motion stated that since securing this affidavit plaintiffs have caused shoes to be fitted to said impression, and that it did not correspond with the shoe worn by decedent. Held, that it was not error to refuse a new trial, as the motion did not state that plaintiffs did not know of the testimony which this witness would give or how long the witness remained in defendant's employ, neither did it show what diligence was used to ascertain who made the cut in the tie.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 310; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

5. NEW TRIAL (§ 108*)—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED TESTIMONY.

It is not error to refuse a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, where the evidence of the witness is not as to a matter within his exclusive knowledge, but is related to facts which numerous persons familiar with the conditions that existed at the time and place could have testified to.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 102*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—EXCUSE FOR NOT DISCOVERING WITNESS.

A motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is properly overruled, where no excuse for not knowing of the witness sooner is shown.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 214; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

7. NEW TRIAL (§ 97*)—GROUNDS—SURPRISE—EVIDENCE OF OPPOSITE PARTY.

between the rails when the train was so close to him that it was impossible to stop it, as it was apparent from the issue that defendant would seek to show by the absence of footprints between the tracks that decedent had not walked along the track as plaintiffs alleged, and plaintiffs did not ask to withdraw their announcement of ready for trial and ask for a continuance in order to enable them to overcome the surprise.

Appeal from District Court, Houston County; Ben H. Gardner, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Lucy Bond and others against the International & Great Northern Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hayne Nelms and Nunn & Nunn, for appellants. King & Morris, for appellee.

JAMES, C. J. Appellants were the widow and children of E. B. Bond, and sued for damages resulting from the striking and killing of Mr. Bond by one of defendant's engines, while he was walking (as the petition alleges) on the track between the rails going from the town of Lovelady to a saw-mill where he was employed. If necessary, in the course of this opinion, we shall state more of the petition. Besides a general denial, defendant alleged that the accident was caused by the negligence of deceased in stepping upon the track in front of the moving train, and so close thereto that it was impossible to escape striking him. This seems to be a sufficient statement from the answer. There was a verdict for the defendant.

The first assignment is that the great preponderance of the evidence showed that Bond was walking in the middle of the track for a long distance in plain and open view of the engineer and other operatives on the train; that the stock or danger alarm was sounded two or three hundred yards before he was struck; that the engineer admits that he saw him at a distance of some 250 yards (though he said he was not on the track); that there was no sign or indication on his part that he heard the signals and would leave the track; and that those on the train had the means at hand and could have slowed down and avoided the injury without endangering the train. That there was testimony which would have supported the above is not disputed, but we cannot agree with appellants that the evidence did not properly admit of the jury finding the contrary, and finding that deceased was at no time inside the track, but was walking in a path which ran along the west side of the track, and out of enberg. This witness testified that he noticed a man (who proved to be Bond) walking on the left side of the track, in a path, about 250 yards ahead of him; that if he had continued walking where he was he would have been in no danger; that the engine was running 15 or 18 miles an hour, and came right close to him before he stepped upon the track; that witness did not know he was going to step on the track until he did so. The witness proceeded: "As soon as the train stopped I left the engine in charge of the fireman, and went back to where the man was lying. He lived only a few minutes. I saw his tracks where he made a step or two to the end of the tie, and then across the rail towards the center of the track, where he was struck." Counsel saved a bill of exceptions to the last statement, because "It is the opinion of the witness about a matter of which he has not shown that he has any knowledge. He does not show that he knew the footprints of Mr. Bond. A further objection is that it is not in response to the interrogatory, is irrelevant and incompetent."

The third assignment complains of like testimony of the head brakeman, Furguson, who was in the engine cab. This witness testified substantially as did the engineer, and the portion of his evidence assigned as error, and for the same reasons, is the following: "The engine slowed on down, and when it got slow enough I jumped off the engine on the left-hand side and ran back to where the man was lying. He did not live but a few moments after I got to him. I saw the footprints he made along the side of the track, and then one or two on the ends of the ties, and a step or two inside of the rail just before he was hit by the engine." The brief does not appear to deal with the objection that the above testimony was not responsive to the interrogatory. And it does not appear that any such objection, which was to depositions, was made at the proper time. These witnesses say they saw Bond walking in this pathway, and saw him step from it upon the track just before he was struck. They saw tracks in the pathway (which all the evidence shows were the tracks of one person), and saw that they led up to the track as far as the point where he was struck. The objection is that they referred to these tracks as being Bond's.

We recognize that a nonexpert witness ought to state facts, and leave all conclusions or inferences to the jury, where the jury are as capable of forming a conclusion as the witness. But where a conclusion is far in this direction. Ry. v. Warner, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 286, 93 S. W. 489, and cases there cited. There was no question as to there being a variety of tracks in the pathway, and the testimony of these witnesses cannot be said to involve a question of distinction between Bond's tracks and the tracks of others. It must have been plain to the jury that their reference to this line of tracks as Bond's was based upon facts testified to by them, viz., that they saw him in the act of walking along there, saw him step up, and the tracks, where they went and where they terminated, corresponded with what had seen, and not upon any knowledge of his footprints. Their conclusion was not any stronger than the facts they testified to, and depended upon the existence of the facts. It is inconceivable, under these circumstances, that the jury would have adopted the conclusion, unless they found as true the facts testified to by these witnesses. The main issue was whether Bond was walking in the path between the rails, or in the path alongside the track. If the jury believed the testimony which went to show that he was walking inside the rails, the conclusion in question would necessarily have had no effect. If they did not find this, and found that he was walking in the pathway, then the verdict was necessarily right. More especially do we think the testimony ought not to cause a reversal of the judgment, when other witnesses no better qualified to speak of the tracks as those of Bond were allowed, without objection, to refer to them as his. San Antonio v. Potter, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 263, 71 S. W. 765; Ry. v. Baumgarten, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 253, 72 S. W. 78.

The sixth and subsequent assignments complain of the refusal to grant a new trial for newly discovered evidence. To the motion an affidavit of Ellis was attached, whose testimony was claimed to be newly discovered. He, however, gave appellee a counter affidavit which so qualified the first as to leave it of no probable importance on another trial, when taken with the fact that practically all the witnesses on the trial testified that the accident happened soon after a rain. The court had the right to conclude that the testimony of the proposed new witness would not have affected the result. Furthermore, the excuse given for not sooner having discovered the fact that Ellis was at the place immediately after the accident occurred, and what his testimony would consist of and its importance to the issue, was incredible, and also was negatively by certain testimony that appears in the statement of facts.

Another newly discovered witness was J.

the Lovelady station when this accident occurred. It does not state that plaintiffs did not know of his testimony. What it states is that Norton "is not now in the employ of defendant, and that plaintiffs did not locate his present whereabouts until the day before the trial, and as soon as he was located plaintiffs used every means within their power to secure his attendance as a witness, but failed." The motion fails to show how long Norton remained at Lovelady in defendant's employ, and fails to show that plaintiffs did not know of his testimony all along. His deposition might have been secured. In addition to this, they admitted they knew of his importance as a witness some time before the trial, and located him the day before the trial, and yet were content to go to trial without any further effort, by postponement, to secure his testimony.

There is another effort in the motion to obtain a new trial for the testimony of Mr. Norton, and this is the subject of the ninth assignment. It was set forth by the affidavit of Norton that he had seen the foot tracks on the west side of the tracks where some one had been walking; the tracks were made on the sand, which was slightly damp on top from a slight shower, and at each step the sand was picked up; that he saw the print of a foot on the end of a tie, leaving fresh sand around the shoe, and that he took out his knife and cut the size and shape of the shoe in the tie. The motion states that since securing this affidavit plaintiffs have caused shoes to be fitted to said impression, and that it does not correspond with such a shoe as Bond wore. A sufficient reason for overruling this ground of the motion is the fact that it does not show what diligence was used to ascertain who made the cut in the tie. The motion states "that up to the time of securing the affidavit of J. W. Norton the plaintiffs could not find out or discover who made or cut the track in the tie, though they exercised diligence to do so." What was done in the exercise of diligence to find it out was not stated, in order that the court might consider whether or not it was sufficient. We need not mention in this connection a counter affidavit which went to show that Norton did not make the cut in the tie until after the footprint had been obliterated. As has been stated, Norton was the section foreman at Lovelady, and it is hardly credible that any real and sustained search for the person who had cut the impression would have been conducted without inquiry of the foreman, who was Norton himself.

The eighth assignment deals with newly discovered testimony of J. M. May. If the motion shows any diligence in this matter, or any excuse for not sooner discovering this witness and his testimony, we fail to find it. In view of the probability that if any examination into the case was made in the neighborhood as appears was made by plaintiffs at or about the time any reasonably careful investigation would have revealed this witness and his testimony, appellants, perhaps, did not undertake to state the diligence and what it consisted of. Besides, the subject-matter of the proposed testimony of May was something not within his exclusive knowledge, but consisted of facts, which, if true, anybody familiar with conditions that existed at the time and place—and such persons appeared to be numerous—could have testified to.

The tenth assignment, which relates to Ed. Halsell, another newly discovered witness, is overruled, as the motion fails to show excuse for not knowing of the witness sooner. The same is true of the witnesses Cochrane and Turner, mentioned in the eleventh.

The twelfth is also overruled. It was set up in the motion for new trial, as one of the grounds, that plaintiffs had no notice that defendant would attempt to prove that there were no footprints on the pathway between the rails until testimony was adduced upon the trial; on the contrary, defendant's testimony by depositions was silent about the central pathway, and only referred to footprints on the west side of the track, and, from the fact that hundreds of pedestrians daily walked up and down said central pathway, plaintiffs were led to believe that no attempt would be made to prove that there were no tracks there; that after discovering the trend of such testimony plaintiffs questioned witnesses present, and made very reasonable and diligent attempt to find witnesses who knew about the hard track pavement inside the rails, and that on that account a pedestrian would not make a track there. The petition alleged that deceased was, and had been for a long distance, walking on the path inside the rails. Defendant denied this, and alleged that he stepped upon the track before the engine. This formed the issue. In the preparation of plaintiffs' case for trial it seems to us that any one would realize the importance of thoroughly investigating the matter of footprints. Plaintiffs admit that they knew defendant would seek to show tracks in the sidepath. It should naturally have occurred to plaintiffs the importance of showing his footprints, or the absence thereof, along the center of the track, and if none could have been made there by him, on account of the nature of the ground, to show such fact. We cannot understand how plaintiffs could reasonably have been led by defendant to rest assured that defendant would go no further with its proof than to show foot-steps outside of the track, and to consider the question of tracks inside the rails as unimportant.

The true nature of this ground for a new trial is surprise. If we should call the introduction of testimony pertinent to the issue a proper subject of surprise to plaintiffs, then, before plaintiffs would be allowed a new trial upon that ground, it was necessary that they should have asked to be allowed to withdraw their announcement of ready to continue, or postpone the trial in order to enable them to properly overcome the surprise. Instead of pursuing this course, they were satisfied with what they had conveniently at hand to go on with the trial and take their chances on a favorable verdict, notwithstanding the ground did not entitle them to a new trial. De Hoyos v. Ry. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 115 S. W. 75.

Judgment affirmed.

COLVILLE et al. v. COLVILLE et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 24, 1909.)

1. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 6*) — DEFECTIVELY ACKNOWLEDGED INSTRUMENT—ADMISSIBILITY IN EVIDENCE.

A deed by husband and wife, sufficiently acknowledged as to the husband, but defectively acknowledged as to the wife, is admissible in the absence of any issue that the land was the separate property of the wife or the homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Acknowledgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 51, 53; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. ESTOPPEL (§ 29*)—BY RECITALS IN DEED—PERSONS ESTOPPED.

Where both parties claimed land through a third person, the deed to the third person was a muniment of title under which both parties claimed, and the recitals in the deed were binding on both parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 69, 74; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 203*) — SUBMISSION OF ISSUES — SUFFICIENCY.

Where the court submitted all of the issues which related to the disputed questions of fact, and which were necessary to the determination of the case, it was not error to refuse to submit issues requested by the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 478; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 274*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

A purchaser of 150 acres agreed that his married son should have 58½ acres thereof if he paid a specified part of the price. The son took possession in 1876, and made improvements. His wife died in 1879, after he had paid all but a small balance of the price. Thereafter the father and his wife, in consideration of the agreement with the son and the payment of the balance of the price, conveyed the 58½ acres to the son; the acknowledgment of the deed, while sufficient as to the father, being defective as to the wife. Thereafter the father procured a deed to the entire tract from his grantor and subsequently executed a deed of 58½ acres to his son, to correct the defects in the former deed. Held, that

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 547*)—NECESSITY OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS OR STATEMENT—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A party moving for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence as shown by affidavits must show by bill of exceptions or statement of facts that the affidavits were brought to the attention of the court, or the ruling on the motion is not reviewable.

Appeal from District Court, Hill County; W. C. Wear, Judge.

Action by O. A. Colville and others against J. W. Colville and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Vaughan & Hart and J. B. Guinn, for appellants. Morrow & Smithdeal, for appellees.

BOOKHOUT, J. Appellants, as plaintiffs below, brought suit against appellees to recover $1,901.25, being one-half of the net proceeds arising from the sale of 58½ acres of land out of the Leon county school land in Hill county, Tex.; the petition alleging, in part, the following: "That heretofore, to wit, on the 14th day of September, 1907, J. A. Colville and wife, Nettie Colville, O. A. Colville and wife, Pearl Colville, J. W. Colville and wife, Leta Colville, Mrs. Donie Jobe and husband, W. B. Jobe, made, executed, and delivered their certain warranty deed conveying to one D. C. Hammer a tract of land containing 58½ acres out of the Leon county school land in Hill county, Tex. That said D. C. Hammer, in consideration for the conveyance to him of said 58½ acres of land, paid the sum of $3,875.62½. That out of said sum $73.12½ was paid to real estate agents, Turk & Smoot, as their commission for making the sale of said lands, leaving $3,802.50, of which sum the said J. A. Colville was entitled to and did receive one-half thereof, viz., $1,901.25; the remainder, to wit, $1,901.25, being by agreement between plaintiffs and defendant J. W. Colville left on deposit with the Citizens' National Bank of Hillsboro, Tex., to be held by said bank until plaintiffs and said defendant, J. W. Colville, should determine their respective rights and interests in and to said sum of money, or until their rights should be determined by proceedings instituted for that purpose in a court of competent jurisdiction." J. W. Colville and the bank answered by general exception, general denial, and special plea, claiming: That said tract of land was acquired by J. A. Colville and M. D. Colville through deed executed by G. S. Dickerson to M. D. Colville, conveying 150 acres of land out of the Leon county school land; the said J. A. Colville, by agreement, to have one-third thereof. That said land was so acquired during the lifetime of ——— Colville, the wife of J. A. Colville, who was the mother of appellee, J. W. Colville, and that he was the only child surviving the said ——— Colville, and as such inherited an undivided one-half of said property, and was therefore entitled to said sum of money, to wit, $1,901.25, herein sued for by appellants. In other words, the appellants sought to recover against appellees the sum of $1,901.25, one-half the proceeds of the sale of a tract of 58½ acres of land. A half interest in the tract of land was owned by J. A. Colville, and the appellants and the appellees are the children of the said J. A. Colville by different wives; the controversy arising over the contention of appellants that the 58½-acre tract of land was the community property of their mother and J. A. Colville, and the appellee J. W. Colville contending that the tract of land was the community property of J. A. Colville and the mother of appellee. The case was submitted to the jury on special issues, upon which the court rendered a judgment in favor of the appellee, from which the appellants appeal.

We find the facts as follows: J. A. Colville was first married in 1874. During that marriage one child was born, namely, the appellee J. W. Colville. The first wife died in the latter part of the year 1879. J. A. Colville married again in the spring of 1881. The appellants were the children of the second wife. The second wife died in 1886 or 1887. The tract of land in controversy was patented to Leon county in 1859. The 58½-acre tract of land was a part of a 150-acre tract of land, and the last-named land was conveyed to M. D. Colville on the 7th day of October, 1876, by G. S. Dickerson. The consideration for the deed from Dickerson to M. D. Colville is stated to be $150 cash, and the assumption of 10 notes, given by Dickerson to Leon county, dated the 24th day of November, 1874; 9 of the notes being for $63.60 and one for $31.80. Dickerson had received a deed from Leon county, which was lost. At the time the land was conveyed by Dickerson to M. D. Colville, there were some little improvements on a part of the land. J. A. Colville was the son of M. D. Colville. After M. D. Colville had agreed to buy the 150-acre tract of land from Dickerson, he (M. D. Colville) and J. A. Colville made an agreement by which J. A. Colville was to have a third of the land and pay a third of the purchase money. After this agreement was made, M. D. Colville got the deed from Dickerson to the 150-acre tract and paid the $150 cash consideration. He (M. D. Colville) and J. A. Colville immediately took possession of separate portions of the land; M. D. Colville taking the improved and continued in possession of it up to shortly before the time the suit was filed. After the land was divided between them, and after the land was deeded by G. S. Dickerson to M. D. Colville, and while J. A. Colville was in possession of the 58½-acre tract, J. A. Colville paid his pro rata part of the purchase money due to Leon county, and had completed the payment of it, except the sum of $70, at the time of the death of his first wife. In 1880 M. D. Colville and M. C. Colville, his wife, made a deed to J. A. Colville conveying the 58½-acre tract of land in controversy. The acknowledgment to this deed is statutory so far as M. D. Colville is concerned, but defective as to his wife. It was never recorded, but its execution proved. The consideration for the deed of December, 1880, was to carry out the agreement which M. D. Colville had made with J. A. Colville with reference to the 58½-acre tract of land which J. A. Colville had taken possession of at the time of the purchase from Dickerson, and upon which he had made the improvements and payments hereinabove stated; J. A. Colville having at that time, which was before his second marriage, fully paid for the 58½-acre tract of land. In 1889 M. D. Colville, having no deed from Leon county, the deed to Dickerson being lost, procured a deed to the 150-acre tract of land and readjusted the unpaid payments. In 1885 M. D. Colville made a deed to the 58½-acre tract of land to J. A. Colville. The purpose and consideration for the deed of 1885 was to correct the defects in the deed previously made in 1880.

Error is assigned to the court's action in admitting in evidence, over appellants' exceptions, the deed from M. D. Colville and M. C. Colville, his wife, to J. A. Colville, dated December 27, 1880, conveying 58½ acres of land. The exceptions related to the acknowledgments of the grantors to the deed. The certificate of acknowledgment as to the wife was defective. The acknowledgment of M. D. Colville was sufficient. There being no issue that the property was the separate property of M. C. Colville, the wife, or that the same was their homestead, it was not error to admit it in evidence. J. A. Colville took possession of the 58½ acres under a claim of right in 1876, made valuable improvements thereon, and paid the entire purchase money prior to his marriage with the mother of appellants.

Again, it is contended, in the second assignment of error, that the court erred in overruling plaintiffs' objection to the following portion of the deed of date October 7, 1876, executed by G. S. Dickerson to M. D. Colville, conveying by field notes 150 acres made by W. D. Wood, Com. of Leon county, to me, dated 24th day of November, 1875, which deed is here delivered and made a part hereof." It is insisted that these recitals are not binding on parties who do not claim under the deed. There was no error in permitting these recitals to be read in evidence. It appeared that both the appellants and appellee claimed title through M. D. Colville, and that M. D. Colville claimed title through G. S. Dickerson, and that the deed from G. S. Dickerson to M. D. Colville was a muniment of title under which both parties claimed. Hence the recitals therein were binding alike upon the appellants and the appellee.

Error is assigned to the court's failure to submit to the jury certain special issues, requested by plaintiffs, as follows: In making contract with G. S. Dickerson for the 150 acres of land, did M. D. Colville act for himself, or did he act for himself and son, Joseph A. Colville, under a prior agreement made with said Joseph A. Colville? If, in answer to the preceding special issue, the jury should find that M. D. Colville in making trade with G. S. Dickerson for the 150 acres of land he acted for himself, thereafter did the said M. D. Colville and Joseph A. Colville make and enter into an agreement concerning said 150 acres of land, whereby said Joseph A. Colville was to accept any portion thereof? If so, when and where was such agreement made, and what were the terms thereof, as to how much J. A. Colville was to pay for the land he was to receive, and how and when he was to pay same? The court having submitted all of the issues which related to disputed questions of fact, and which were necessary to the determination of the case, there was no error in refusing to submit the issues requested by appellants. It was undisputed that J. A. Colville took possession of the 58½-acre tract of land during the several years before the death of his first wife, and that he had possession of it under a contract with his father, M. D. Colville, and that he made improvements on it during the lifetime of his first wife, and paid substantially all the purchase money during her lifetime. The court submitted to the jury the questions as to when the agreement was made, and they found in answer to the third question that it was made before Dickerson deeded the land to M. D. Colville. There was a conflict in the evidence as to when the payments made by J. A. Colville were made. That question was submitted to the jury in the fourth question, and they found that the payments for the land were all made before December 27, 1880. The court in the fifth question submitted to the jury the question as to how much J. A. Colville paid to M. D. Colville on account of the land prior to the death of his first wife, and this they answered in the fifth answer, and the sixth answer was to the same effect.

Again, it is insisted that the court erred in refusing to submit special issues 4 and 5, requested by plaintiffs as follows: What amount of money, if any, did the said Joseph A. Colville pay to the said M. D. Colville on that portion of the 150-acre tract of land east of the ravine, during the life of J. A. Colville's first wife? What amount, if any, did he pay during the period of time from the date of his first wife's death to his second marriage, and what amount did he pay after his second marriage up to the date of the death of his second wife? What amount, if any, did he pay after the death of his second wife? Was there a definite agreement as to when M. D. Colville should deed said land to J. A. Colville? If so, when was said deed to be made? It is contended that these issues were not embraced in the issues submitted by the court. The special issues requested, with reference to whether there was a definite time when M. D. Colville should deed the land to J. A. Colville, was immaterial. It was shown by the undisputed evidence that M. D. Colville did deed the land to J. A. Colville before the marriage of J. A. Colville with the mother of appellants.

The jury rendered their verdict on special issues, and thereafter the plaintiffs moved that judgment be entered in their favor on their findings taken in connection with the issues as agreed upon by counsel for plaintiffs and defendants. The court overruled the motion, and his action in this respect is assigned as error. The proposition presented is that M. D. Colville having entered into an agreement to purchase the 150 acres of land from G. S. Dickerson, acting for himself, and not for himself and his son Joseph A. Colville, the said M. D. Colville being a married man, and not owning any other property, the tract of land purchased by him became his homestead, and the deed executed by M. D. Colville and M. C. Colville to J. A. Colville of date December 27, 1880, not being sufficient to convey title on account of the defective acknowledgment of M. C. Colville, the deed executed by M. D. Colville and wife to J. A. Colville of date November 10, 1885, for the first time vested title in J. A. Colville to the tract of land involved in this suit, and the mother of appellants then being his wife, the property became community property, and on the death of appellants' mother, the second wife of said J. A. Colville, they acquired by inheritance an undivided one-half interest in said land, and under the above facts and findings of the jury the court should have granted appellants' motion to render judgment on the findings of the jury in favor of appellants. There was no issue of homestead made by the pleading. Again, the 150-acre tract of land never became the homestead of M. D. Colville. The undisputed evidence shows: That, before he got a deed to it, he made an agreement with J. A. Colville, whereby he was to own the 58½ acres of land in controversy; that said J. A. Colville at once took possession of the same and made valuable improvements thereon.

Appellants assign error to the court's action in overruling their motion for new trial based on newly discovered evidence. The contention is that, where it is shown that due diligence has been made to discover material testimony before trial of a case, and that such testimony could not sooner have been discovered through the use of a higher degree of care and diligence than that used, and that after the trial said testimony had first been brought to the knowledge of witnesses, a new trial based on such newly discovered evidence should be granted, to the end that the conclusion reached may be had on all the proof. Appellants' motion for a new trial has attached to it the affidavit of A. R. Smoot and J. A. Colville, purporting to relate to newly discovered evidence; but no bill of exception was reserved showing that said evidence was heard or considered by the court. This court has held that, unless the record shows that the affidavits relied on as showing the newly discovered evidence were called to the court's attention, the assignment will not be considered. There is no bill of exception in the record, nor is it shown by a statement of facts that these affidavits were called to the attention of the trial court. They cannot be considered. Ayres v. Railroad (Tex. Civ. App.) 116 S. W. 612; Frizzell v. Johnson, 30 Tex. 36.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Action by George Graffeo and others against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Spoons, Thompson & Barwise, for appellant. Capps, Cantey, Hanger & Short and Theodore Mack, for appellees.

CONNER, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of appellees for the sum of $1,500 as damages caused by fire, which burned appellees' garden and vineyard, and which was negligently permitted to escape from one of the appellant's engines.

Objection is made to the court's charge on the measure of damages with reference to the asparagus bed that was burned. It is first insisted that there was "no evidence" as to the reasonable value of the asparagus bed, and that the issue hence should not have been submitted to the jury. The same contention is made in different forms under the third and fourth assignments of error. One of the witnesses, George Lunetta, testified, among other things, that the asparagus bed was about 150 feet by about 400 feet, that it was all burned off, that asparagus is a vegetable for table use and sold upon the market in bunches, that the heat went through and killed the roots, and that it would cost "about $300 or $400 to go there and repair that asparagus bed." This, with other evidence, ever, seems to be well taken. The instruction was that, if the jury found for the plaintiff, they would allow the reasonable value of the asparagus bed destroyed at the time of its destruction without limiting the recovery in this respect to the amount claimed therefor in the petition, to wit, $200. This should have been done when, as here, the evidence of its value would have authorized a recovery for "$300 or $400." See City of Dallas v. Jones, 93 Tex. 38, 49 S. W. 577, 53 S. W. 377. We will not reverse the judgment, however, because of this error, inasmuch as appellee in answer to the objection has offered to remit the sum of $200, which will be entered.

It is further insisted under the second and fifth assignments of error that there was no evidence as to the value of the peach trees growing upon the burned ground, and that therefore the court should not have submitted any depreciation in the value of the land which may have been caused by reason of the destruction of the trees. We find no merit in this contention. There was proof to the effect that 26 bearing peach trees were destroyed, that a reasonable yield for a peach tree was from three to five bushels, worth from 75 cents to $1.50 per bushel. Besides, the true measure of the damage for the destruction of the growing trees and grapevines entirely destroyed was, as submitted by the court, the difference in the value of the land just before and after the burning, as to which there was ample evidence.

The evidence sustains the material allegations of appellees' petition, and, finding no error other than that pointed out, it is ordered that the judgment below be reformed and affirmed in the sum of $1,300, with interest as specified in the judgment, and inasmuch as the error requiring the remittitur was not called to the attention of the court below in appellant's motion for new trial, or otherwise, the costs of the appeal will be taxed against appellant.

SOUTHERN KANSAS RY. CO. OF TEXAS
v. McSWAIN.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 13, 1909. On Rehearing, April 17, 1909.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 53*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—MENTAL ANGUISH AS ELEMENT OF RECOVERY.

In an action for personal injuries, it was not error to permit plaintiff to testify that he suffered mental anguish by fear that blood poisoning might set in and prove fatal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 100; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

ferred in evidence, in an action by a railroad employé for personal injuries, evidence held to present a question for the jury whether the application under which he was working was to another company than defendant, and whether there was any material difference between the duties of an engine wiper, the position for which he applied, and that of an engine watcher, the duties of which he was performing when injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 264*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—ENGINE WATCHER—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by an engine watcher who was injured in a collision between a box car and an engine, which he was cleaning when a car was run against it, plaintiff pleaded inexperience, negligence of defendant for the collision, and in failing to provide rules for his protection. Defendant answered, denying negligence, and pleading contributory negligence, and furthermore introduced in evidence rules for his protection. There was evidence that, without displaying the lights required by the rules, plaintiff went under an engine while another train was switching, and the operator of the train moved the engine without knowing plaintiff was under it but without sending a man for a personal examination. Held that rules of defendant, included in the plaintiff's application for employment as an engine wiper, requiring him to have a copy of the rules at hand, and to be conversant therewith, and to do all in his power to carry them out, and which were in the nature of a declaration that he understood the hazards and dangers of the business, and that the application should apply to any position to which he might thereafter be assigned, were relevant, and should have been admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 85*)—OFFER OF EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY IN PART—OBJECTION THERE TO AS A WHOLE.

An objection, urged as a whole to evidence admissible in part, is properly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-225; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 472*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—MATTERS DIRECTLY IN ISSUE.

In an action by an engine watcher for personal injuries, testimony of a witness that it was plaintiff's duty, before going under the engine, at the time of his injury, to warn the train crew of the fact, or to have put out lights to indicate he was under it, was objectionable, on the ground that it was a conclusion for the jury's determination, and not that of the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2186-2195; Dec. Dig. § 472.*]

On Rehearing.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 264*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—PLEADING AND PROOF AS TO NEGLIGENCE.

It is one thing to fail to adopt reasonable rules to protect employes as was alleged in a petition, in an action by an employé for injuries, and another to be negligent in their enforcement, or in failing to furnish signals required thereby, according to his testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

peals. Reversed.

Hoover & Taylor, for appellant. Cooper & Stanford, for appellee.

CONNER, C. J. Appellee recovered a judgment for $6,000 for personal injuries received by him while engaged as one of appellant's employes, in the regular discharge of his duties as engine watcher at Pampa, in Gray county. Appellee alleged, and there was evidence tending to show, that on the 19th day of July, 1907, at about 2:30 o'clock a. m., one of appellant's engines at Pampa was by its operative run into the Pampa yards, and placed upon what is designated in the evidence as the "passing track," in close proximity to one or more box cars, and was turned over to appellee to be cared for and attended to; that in the regular discharge of his duties appellee took charge of said engine, and began cleaning the same; that in order to clean out the ash pan he went underneath the engine, and just as he was ready to begin taking the ashes out of the pan, the crew in charge of another engine ran a box car, with great force and violence, against the engine under which appellee was working, in consequence of which his right foot was mangled, and amputation thereafter necessitated. Appellee, among other grounds of negligence not necessary to here notice, alleged that the defendant had failed to adopt proper rules and regulations for the protection of employes working as engine watchers, which fact was the proximate cause of his injuries. The defendant answered by demurrers, the general denial, and special pleas of assumed risk and contributory negligence.

We find no error in the court's action in overruling appellant's motion to quash the citation, nor in permitting plaintiff to testify that he suffered mental anguish by reason, among other things, of "the fear that blood poison might set up and prove fatal." See M., K. & T. Ry. Co. of Tex. v. Miller, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 460, 61 S. W. 978.

The third assignment of error, however, we think must be sustained. In this assignment complaint is made of the court's action in refusing to permit appellant to introduce in evidence the following paragraphs of the plaintiff's application for employment, dated on the 16th day of May, 1906, as follows:

"33. Do you understand that every employé of this company whose duties are in any way prescribed by the rules must always have a copy of the rules at hand when on duty and must be conversant with every rule, and that you must render all the assistance in your power in carrying them out, and immediate-shall be a part of your contract of employment? Yes."

"37. Do you understand that all employes are expected to protect themselves from personal injury by avoiding risks, and that those who may receive injuries on account of taking risks will have no claim upon the company? Yes."

"41. Do you understand that no officer or employe of this company is authorized to request or require you to use defective tracks, cars, machinery or appliances of any kind, except at your own risk of injury therefrom? Yes."

"42. Do you understand that this company desires to employ only experienced men in its service, and does not undertake to educate inexperienced men; and do you state that you are aware of the hazards and dangers of the business, and agree to rely upon your co-employes, and not upon the company, for information as to any or all things, including the character of any kind of machinery and appliances which would render your work dangerous or subject you to injury, or which may be necessary to the proper performance of your duty; and do you waive any responsibility whatsoever on the part of the company, or its officers, touching the matters herein referred to, and that this shall apply to any position to which you may now or hereafter be assigned? Yes."

To the introduction of these rules appellee objected, first, on the ground substantially that the application was for a different position, that of an engine wiper at Amarillo, from that involved, an engine watcher at Pampa, and that hence the testimony was immaterial and irrelevant; second, that it was an attempt on the part of the railroad company to avoid their own negligent act in making the applicant assume a risk that the law does not put upon him; and, third, that the application is made to the Pecos Valley & Northern Texas Railway Company, whereas at the time of the injury the plaintiff was in the service of appellant. Nothing in the facts shows that the application would not apply in favor of appellant, as well as the Pecos Valley & Northern Texas Railway Company, save possibly that the heading of the application shows the name "Santa Fé," and in the body in one place appears the name "Pecos Valley & Northern Texas Railway Company." Appellant insists that we are required to take judicial notice of the fact that all of the railway companies named are parts of a single system, but, whether so or not, the evidence plainly indicates that the application under consideration was the one under which appellee was working at the time he was injured. He did not in his testimony undertake to testify otherwise. On the contrary, he testified: "On or about the shops at Amarillo. He then gives the name of the person by whom he was employed, and testified that the successor in position of the person so named later directed him to go to Pampa for the employment he was engaged in at the time of the inquiry complained of. He says: "I worked for the railroad at Amarillo, I think it was a month and four days—a month and three and a half or four days—something like that. Then I came to Pampa, Tex., then Mr. Cramer sent me to Pampa. He is the roundhouse foreman at Amarillo. While I worked at Amarillo, I worked under, all but the first few days, the man that I made out my application with, John Sartori—he was foreman at first. I understand that he was in Mr. Cramer's place; I don't know that. After I worked there about a month and four days, I was transferred to Pampa. I worked as engine watchman at Pampa. Mr. Cramer sent me to Pampa to work.

* * * My duties were to watch engines at night. Mr. Cramer directed me to watch engines there at Pampa at night. Mr. Cramer didn't give me any instructions, only just told me to go down and watch engines." Another witness, J. B. Browning, among other things, in testifying about the book of rules he was identifying, said that: "The outside says that is a Santa Fé book. I suppose that includes all the branches—the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé, the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé, Pecos Valley, and Southern Kansas. I suppose it includes the whole system." So that, if the question of whether the application had been made for employment under the Pecos Valley & Northern Texas or the appellant was material, the issue under the evidence should at least have been submitted to the jury. This last observation would seem also to apply to the question of whether or not there was any material difference in the duties of an "engine wiper" and an "engine watcher." In reading the evidence, which for the sake of brevity we will not set out, it would seem that the duties in many respects are very similar. At all events, appellee testified that, while at Amarillo for some three weeks, he "was working at and around engines," and that "during those three weeks I learned enough to go off and undertake to be an engine wiper. I learned enough in that time so that I thought I could take the job of engine wiper and perform the duties of that job. I learned what an engine wiper had to do around there in the roundhouse."

Was, then, the rejected testimony immaterial? We think not. Appellee had pleaded inexperience, negligence on appellant's part in making the collision, and in a failure to provide rules for his protection. Defendant had answered by denying the negligence charged, and pleading the contributory negligence of appellee. Furthermore, appellant introduced, among others, the following rules in use on its system: Rule No. 26 that: "A blue flag by day and a blue light by night displayed at one end or both ends of an engine, car or train, indicates that workmen are under or about it; when thus protected it must not be coupled to or moved. Workmen will display the blue signals, and the same workmen are alone authorized to remove them. Other cars must not be placed on the same track, so as to intercept the view of the blue signals; without first notifying the workmen." Rule No. 317 that: "All car inspectors, conductors, brakemen or other employes, who are working under or about any car or train in yards upon switch or main track, or at any other place, must, for their own protection, place thereon a blue flag by day and a blue light by night as a warning to advise other employes that work is being done upon said car or train." There is evidence tending to show that appellee went under the engine that injured him while the other train was switching in the yards, without displaying the lights required by the rules quoted, and that the operative of the train which moved the engine under which appellee was working did so without knowledge of his presence under the engine, but without having sent a man for personal examination. In the light of all this testimony it seems to us that the rejected rules were relevant to the issue of appellant's negligence in backing into the engine under which appellee was working, and upon the issue of appellee's contributory negligence in going thereunder at the time he did, and under the circumstances that he did. The rejected rules required the employe to have a copy of the rules at hand, and required him to be conversant with every rule, and to do all in his power to carry them out. They were in the nature of a declaration on appellee's part that he understood the hazards and dangers of the business, and that the application should apply to any position to which he might thereafter be assigned. We know of no reason why an employe may not lawfully so declare and so agree. It may be that one or more of the rules offered is subject, as appellee insists, to the objection that it is in the nature of a contract to relieve appellant of the risks arising from its own negligence. But clearly all are not so, and the objections were urged to the rules as a whole. In such case, the practice is to overrule the objection. See Jamison v. Dooley, 98 Tex. 206, 82 S. W. 780.

Numerous other assignments of error are presented, but we find nothing requiring extended discussion. The testimony of the witness Browning to the effect that it was the duty of the plaintiff, before going under the engine, at the time of his injury, to warn the train crew of the fact, or to have put out lights to indicate that he was under the engine, was subject to the objection urged that it was a conclusion for the jury's determination, and not that of the witness. See Lispcomb v. H. & T. C. Ry. Co., 95 Tex. 5, 64 S. W. 923, 55 L. R. A. 869, 93 Am. St. Rep. 804; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Ellison, 117 Ind. 234, 20 N. E. 135; Allen v. Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern Ry. Co., 57 Iowa, 623, 11 N. W. 614.

In the charges given, and in the action of the court in refusing special instructions, we find no reversible error, but for the error of the court complained of in the third assignment, and above discussed, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

On Rehearing.

It is urged that the evidence excluded by the court, and because of which the judgment was reversed, is immaterial, among other things not noticed in our original conclusions, in that it is undisputed in the evidence that "appellant had no rules or regulations in its yards at Pampa for the protection of engine watchers." It seems to be conceded, in the motion for rehearing, that the appellant railway company is one of the branches of the Santa Fe System, and the testimony of the witness Browning, part of which we quoted in our original opinion, at least tends to show that the book of rules identified by him, from which also we quoted, applies to Pampa, as well as to other stations of the system. In speaking of the rules he testified, in addition to what we before quoted: "This rule that I have referred to, the using of blue flags in the daytime and a blue light at night to protect a train under which an employe may be at work, is in force at Amarillo on the rip track; that is, where car men are working. This rule applies all along the line. All car inspectors, conductors, brakemen, or other employes who are working under or about any car or train in yards, upon switch or main track, or at any other place, must, for their own protection, place thereon a blue flag by day and a blue light by night as a warning to advise other employes that work is being done upon said car or train." It is true that this witness further testified that "I never saw any blue lights at Pampa," and that appellee testified, without contradiction, that "Nothing was done by Mr. Cramer, or the operator, or the station agent, or any one else, with reference to furnishing me flags, signals, lanterns, or anything else. They did not furnish me any signals such as flags, lanterns, or any other means of protecting the engine under which I was employed to work. The company did not, through any of its agents, give me any information whatever with reference to any rules by which I should do my work, or by which I should protect myself against being run into by any other engine or cars." But the failure to furnish appellee with flags, lanterns, or other signals with which to protect himself, or to enforce rules requiring the use of such signals, was not made by appellee a ground of negligence in his petition. The ground of negligence in this respect appellee saw proper to allege was that appellant had failed to "adopt rules and regulations to prevent engines under which, or upon which, employes were engaged in work from being run into by other engines and cars," etc., without restriction as to station. We think it apparent that it is one thing to fail to "adopt" reasonable rules for the protection of employes, and quite another to be negligent in their nonenforcement, or in failing to furnish the signals required by the rules. We, therefore, adhere to the conclusion that the rejected evidence was relevant to issues as made by both pleading and testimony, and that the court should have admitted such rejected testimony.

The motion for rehearing is accordingly overruled.

Sp. Act March 5, 1907 (Sp. Laws, p. 176, c. 18), creating the Tullia independent school district is void because in conflict with Const. art. 7, § 8, in attempting to authorize the board of trustees to levy a tax for school purposes in excess of the rate of 20 cents on the $100 valuation of property; and, the grant of power of taxation not being separable, the entire tax levied under it is void, and not merely the excess of the constitutional limitation.

Appeal from District Court, Swisher County; L. S. Kinder, Judge.

Action by F. G. Patching and others against W. B. Hutchison and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and rendered.

Reeder, Graham & Williams, for appellants. Turner & Boyce, A. B. Martin, and W. F. Hendrix, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, Sp. C. J. There is no dispute as to the material facts in this case. The record shows that the Tullia independent school district was created by special act of the Thirtieth Legislature approved March 5, 1907 (Sp. Laws 1907, p. 176, c. 18). The district thus created was 9 miles square, and embraced within its boundaries a territory of 81 square miles, containing 51,840 acres of land. There was included within this territory the town of Tullia, having a population of 1,200, living on $2\frac{1}{4}$ sections, or 1,440 acres of land. This town had never been incorporated for municipal purposes, either as a town or as a village, under any of the provisions of the Constitution or of the statutes of Texas. The act of the Legislature constituting the Tullia independent school district created the same for school purposes only, and, having first made provision for an election to determine whether the citizens residing within the district would incorporate under the act in question, and having also provided for the election of a board of trustees, proceeded to vest in the district itself, and in its school board, all the powers, rights, and duties of independent school districts formed by towns and villages incorporating for school purposes only under (1) chapter 45, p. 45, of the General Laws of the state of Texas for the year 1897, and under (2) chapter 15, tit. 86, Rev. Civ. St. 1895, and (3) under an act of the Twenty-Seventh Legislature approved April 18, 1901 (Laws 1901, p. 273, c. 111), amending an act approved February 21, 1900 (Gen. Laws 1900, p. 18, c. 7), entitled "An act to provide a uniform method of selecting school trustees in independent school districts," etc. The citizens of the district voted to incorporate, and afterward elected the required number of school trustees. On May 1, 1907, this board of trustees ordered an election to be held June 1, 1907, to determine if the bonds of the district to the amount of \$15,000 should be issued, and if there should be levied and collected an annual "tax sufficient to pay the current interest on said bonds and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to pay the principal at maturity." The election was held, and, having resulted in favor of the issuance of the bonds of the levy of the tax, the vote was canvassed, and the result was so declared. June 3, 1907, the board of trustees ordered the issuance of the bonds for the full amount of \$15,000, and, at the same time levied a tax of 25 cents on each \$100 of taxable property within the district to pay the interest and to provide a sinking fund on the issue. Afterward another election was ordered to determine if the board of trustees should have the power annually to assess, levy, and collect a tax for the support and maintenance of the public free schools of the district "at the rate of not exceeding one-half of one per cent. ad valorem." At this election, this additional tax was voted, and, afterward, on the 16th day of September, 1907, the board of trustees ordered and levied an additional ad valorem tax of 50 cents on each \$100, for the support and maintenance of the public free schools of the district. Eight thousand dollars in par value out of the authorized bond issue of \$15,000 was sold before the filing of this suit, and before and at the time suit was brought, the officers of the said district were proceeding to sell the remainder of said bonds, and to collect a tax of 75 cents in the aggregate on each \$100 valuation, pursuant to the elections and orders already mentioned. Suit was instituted January 15, 1908, by F. C. Patching and others, appellants in this court, tax-paying citizens of the Tulla independent school district, against W. B. Hutchison and others as trustees and officers of the same. By their first amended original petition, filed February 14, 1908, appellants, who were plaintiffs in the trial court, having alleged the act of the Legislature, and the orders, elections, and other proceedings already set out, and having further alleged that the appellees, who were defendants below, were carrying out, and intended to, and if not restrained would, carry out the orders for the issuance and sale of the said bonds, and for the assessment, levy, and collection of school district taxes aggregating 75 cents on each \$100 valuation, attacked the said act of the Legislature constituting said independent school district as unconstitutional, and the proceedings had thereunder as illegal, unauthorized, and void, complaining especially that the rate of taxation attempted to be authorized was in excess of the rate permitted by the Constitution, and praying that the said act of the Legislature and all orders, elections, and other proceedings had under the same be adjudged to be unconstitutional and void, and that the orders levying the taxes, and directing the issuance and sale of the bonds be canceled and annulled, and that the Tulla independent school district, and its board of trustees, be enjoined from making further tax levies under said act, and from selling the bonds not already disposed of, and from collecting, or attempting to collect, the taxes, or any part of the taxes, already levied. The cause was tried February 14, 1908, and judgment was rendered for the appellees, defendants in the lower court. An appeal was prosecuted from this judgment, and the cause is now presented to this court.

The pleadings and the evidence bring this case within the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in Snyder v. Baird (Tex.) 111 S. W. 723. Following the opinion in the case cited, we hold that the act of the Legislature here in question is unconstitutional in so far as it attempts to authorize the Tulla independent school district and its board of trustees to levy a tax for public free school purposes in excess of the rate of 20 cents on the $100 valuation, and that the tax levies complained of are excessive under the Constitution, and are therefore illegal and void. The grant attempted to be made to the school district, and to its board of trustees, of the power to levy and collect an annual ad valorem tax in excess of 20 cents is not capable of separation into two grants of power, the one within, and the other in excess of, the limit fixed by the Constitution. There is but a single grant, and that is of the entire power attempted to be conferred, and this is void, not merely as to the excess, but as to the entire grant. To hold otherwise would be, as it seems to us, nothing short of judicial legislation. The Legislature did not authorize a tax of 20 cents, and for the court to do so would be for it to substitute for the provision made by the Legislature another and different provision framed by three judges, having no constitutional authority to enact laws. There being no valid authority to levy and collect any district school tax whatever, it follows that, under the mandate of the Constitution requiring an antecedent provision for a tax levy sufficient to cover the interest and sinking fund, there could be no valid issue of bonds.

It is accordingly ordered that the judgment of the trial court denying the injunction prayed for by the appellants be reversed, and that judgment be now and here rendered perpetually enjoining the appellees from the collection of the taxes complained of, and from making future levies of taxes under said act of the Legislature, and from selling the unsold bonds of the said school district.

DALLAS CONSOL. ELECTRIC ST. RY. CO. v. STATE et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 24, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 8, 1909.)

1. STATUTES (§ 161*)—STREET RAILROADS (§ 69*)—OCCUPATION TAX—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 5049, subd. 54, provides for the levy of an annual occupation tax on street railway companies on a track mileage basis. Acts 30th Leg. (Gen. Laws 1907, c. 18) pp. 479-489, levies an annual occupation tax upon street car companies in cities over 10,000 population, on a basis of gross receipts, and provides that, except as herein stated, all taxes levied by this act shall be in addition to all other taxes now levied by law. The Thirtieth Legislature voted down an amendment to this act, expressly repealing article 5049, subd. 54. Held, that the latter act did not repeal the former.

2. LICENSES (§ 7*)—OCCUPATION TAX—STREET RAILROADS—DOUBLE TAXATION.

Held, also, that the exaction of both taxes was not double taxation, since it was the intention to equalize the burden of taxation, on the theory that the franchises of companies in populous cities were more valuable than in smaller ones.

Appeal from Dallas County Court; W. M. Holland, Judge.

Suit by the State of Texas and Dallas

Baker, Bott, Parker & Garwood and Finley, Knight & Harris, for appellant. R. V. Davidson, Atty. Gen., W. E. Hawkins, Asst. Atty. Gen., Dwight L. Tewelling, Co. Atty., and James T. Goggans, for the State.

RAINEY, C. J. The statement of the case is taken from the brief of appellant, and is as follows: "The suit was instituted on September 25, 1908, by the state of Texas and Dallas county, through the county attorney of Dallas county. The suit is to recover, by the state and county, of said street railway company occupation taxes for two years, one beginning September, 1907, and the other September, 1908; it being alleged that said occupation taxes, under the law, are due and payable in advance. Appellant, during the period for which the occupation tax is sought to be recovered, owned and operated, in its corporate capacity as a street railway company, 38.93 miles of track in the city and county of Dallas. It is claimed that under the laws of this state said company was liable to the state for an annual occupation tax amounting to the sum of $2 per mile for each and every mile of track owned by said defendant in said county and state, which tax aggregates the sum of $77.86 per annum, or a total of $155.72 for the two years; that for the same period of time the appellant was liable, under the laws of this state, to Dallas county, as an annual occupation tax, for the sum of $1 per mile for each and every mile of track owned by it in the county of Dallas, aggregating $38.93 per annum, or a total of $77.86 for the two years; that said sum became due and owing annually in advance prior to the 20th day of September of each year. It was also alleged that said tax has been properly levied by the commissioners' court of Dallas county. It was further alleged that said tax had not been paid for the period mentioned, and that appellant had pursued the occupation of a street car company during said period, and is still pursuing such occupation, and is subject to the alleged occupation tax. Appellant answered by general denial, and specially pleaded that it was not liable for the taxes sought to be recovered, for that it was liable for, and had paid to the state of Texas, an occupation tax covering the same period of time under the occupation tax law passed by the Thirtieth Legislature, levying an occupation tax on the basis of gross receipts, which act was approved by the Governor on May 16, 1907, and is found on pages 479-489, Acts 30th Leg. (Gen. Laws 1907, c. 18), that to hold it liable for the occupation tax sued for and claimed under the old law, Act 1897, Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 5049, subd. 54, for the same no longer in force as to appellant; that there is no law in force, and has not been during the period for which plaintiffs sue, for occupation taxes, authorizing and empowering the County of Dallas to levy and collect any occupation tax whatever on this appellant. The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the state and county against appellant, on November 20, 1908, for the amount of taxes claimed. From the judgment rendered the street railway company has perfected its appeal. The sole question involved is whether article 5049, subd. 54, Acts 1897, Sayles' Ann. Civ. St., which levies an annual occupation tax by street railway companies in this state of $2 per mile on each and every mile of track owned by such company or corporation, has been superseded and repealed by implication by the occupation tax law enacted by the Thirtieth Legislature, hereinbefore referred to, which levies an annual occupation tax upon street car companies upon the basis of gross receipts, or is still in force notwithstanding the passage of said occupation tax law by the Thirtieth Legislature. In other words, whether appellant, street railway company, is legally required to pay occupation tax under the old law (Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 5049, subd. 54), and also under the gross receipts occupation tax law of 1907."

The agreed facts are:

"(1) The Dallas Consolidated Electric Street Railway Company is a corporation created by and under the laws of the state of Texas, owning and operating a line, or lines, of street railway in the city and county of Dallas, amounting in the aggregate to 38.93 miles of street railway track, and so owned and operated said street railway in said city and county prior to the 20th day of September, A. D. 1907, and continuously since said date. That the city of Dallas has a population of more than 20,000, as shown by the last United States census.

"(2) That said Dallas Consolidated Electric Street Railway Company has not paid occupation tax to the state of Texas and Dallas county during said period mentioned in the preceding paragraph hereof, under subdivision 54, art. 5049, Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, which imposes an occupation tax of $2 per mile on each and every mile of track owned by street railway companies, and article 5060, which authorized counties to levy and collect one-half of the amount levied by the state as occupation tax.

"(3) That heretofore, prior to September 20, 1907, and annually thereafter, the commissioners' court of Dallas county, Tex., sea-tion tax, payable annually in advance, amounting to one-half of the amount levied as an occupation tax on such occupations for the state of Texas, making the amount so levied by Dallas county, upon and against the defendant herein, provided it had any authority to levy such tax against said defendant, as an annual occupation tax payable annually in advance, the sum of $1 per mile for each and every mile of track owned by it in Dallas county. The amount of tax which would be due the county, if any, under said old law, aggregating $77.86 for two years, and double that amount, viz., $155.72, would be due the state for occupation tax, if anything under the said old law. The intent and purpose of this paragraph is to agree that the county of Dallas has regularly levied an occupation tax against the defendant for the time hereinbefore shown under the occupation tax law (articles 5049 and 5050), and particularly subsection 54 of said article 5049, and plaintiffs have demanded, and are attempting to collect, the state and county taxes under said occupation tax law.

"(4) It is further agreed that the defendant has paid to the state of Texas an occupation tax based upon gross receipts for the period hereinabove set forth, under chapter 18, General Laws of the State of Texas, Acts of the Thirtieth Legislature approved May 18, 1907, found in Sess. Acts, pp. 479-489, inclusive."

The contention of appellant is that "the act of 1897 and that of 1907 here in question are eo nomine occupation tax laws, and both levy an occupation tax upon street car companies. While the two laws levy the tax upon a different basis—one upon mileage of track, and the other upon gross receipts—they are essentially and confessedly the same character of tax, viz., occupation tax; and, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, the latter act must be construed as intended to supersede and take the place of the older act, if not in toto, at least to the extent that the two acts cover the same subjects of taxation." Mr. Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) p. 465, says: "Repeals by implication are not favored. This means that it is the duty of the court to so construe the acts, if possible, that both shall be operative." On page 467 the same author says: "Considerations of convenience, justice, and reasonableness, when they can be invoked against the implication of repeal, are always very patent. There must be such a manifest and total repugnance that the two enactments cannot stand. The earliest statute continues in force unless the two are clearly inconsistent with, and repugnant to, each other, or unless in the later as a repeal of the former by implication." The statute of 1897 and that of 1907 are not so clearly inconsistent with, and repugnant to, each other as that both cannot stand, and there is nothing in the act of 1907 that indicates to our minds that the Legislature intended to repeal the act of 1897. On the other hand, in section 22 of the act of 1907 (Gen. Laws, p. 487) this language is used: "Except as herein stated all taxes levied by this act shall be in addition to all other taxes now levied by law"—which indicates that said act was not intended to relieve against any tax that had theretofore been imposed. The term "all other taxes" includes occupation tax, as well as all other kinds designated by the laws of the state. The state having levied theretofore an occupation tax by the act of 1897, said tax was not excluded by the said act of 1907. This view we think is strengthened by reference to House Journals of Thirtieth Legislature, where it will be seen the House voted down a proposed amendment repealing the act of 1897, from which it would seem, had the House not intended to make this an additional tax, a different action would have been taken on said repealing clause.

It is argued that to hold the two acts as in force as to appellant would be to levy a double or duplicate occupation tax on street car companies in cities containing a population of 10,000 or over, which is contrary to the principles governing the laws of taxation. We do not think this construction should be applied to the law under discussion. We think the better construction is that the Legislature intended the two acts to be construed together, considering that the operation of a street railway in a larger and more populous city was more valuable than in a smaller one, and the levying of a tax on the gross receipts would be nearer just and equitable, and come nearer equalizing the burdens of taxation. This is a reasonable view of the matter, we think, and therefore conclude that the act of 1907 levying an occupation tax is but an additional tax to the one levied by the said act of 1897, and the last-named act is not repealed by the act of 1907.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 298*)—REMEDIES OF VENDOR—RECOVERY OF PREMISES—FORCIBLE DETAINER.

A person who entered into possession of land under a contract to purchase was not a tenant at will or at sufferance of the vendor, so as to authorize the vendor to maintain forcible detainer against him under Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 2519, providing that, where such a tenant refuses to give up possession after the termination of the landlord's will and after demand in writing, he shall be guilty of forcible detainer.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 1*)—WHO ARE "TENANTS."

A "tenant" is one who occupies the lands or premises of another in subordination to the other's title and with his assent, express or implied; but, in order to create the relation, the two elements must coöcur.

4. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER (§ 32*)—QUESTIONS DETERMINABLE—TITLE.

Under the express provisions of Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 2529, the question of title cannot be adjudicated in an action of forcible detainer.

Appeal from District Court, Wheeler County; H. G. Hendricks, Judge.

Action of forcible detainer by A. N. Holmes against B. L. Francis. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and cause dismissed.

Lackey & Cocke, for appellant. J. B. Reynolds, for appellee.

DUNKLIN, J. On September 9, 1907, A. N. Holmes entered into a parol agreement with B. L. Francis to sell to him the north-west quarter of section 42 in block 17, Houston & Great Northern Railroad Company survey in Wheeler county for the sum of $3,450, payable as follows: $200 cash; $1,800 on November 9, 1907; $600 November 1, 1908; $600 November 1, 1909; and $250 November 1, 1910. On the same date Holmes executed a deed to the land in favor of Francis, expressing the foregoing consideration, and Francis executed promissory notes in favor of Holmes for all the deferred payments except the $1,800 payment, all of which papers, together

$1,800 on November 9, 1907, then the $200 deposited with the papers should be forfeited to Holmes and the contract of purchase terminated. Francis was then placed in possession of the land under and by virtue of the foregoing agreements and has held same ever since. At the time he took possession, there were matured crops on the land grown by Holmes, and these crops were embraced in the contract of sale as a part of the realty. On October 28, 1907, Holmes, at the request of Francis, agreed to extend time of payment of the $1,800 installment, and Francis agreed to pay interest thereon; but the period of extension and the rate of interest were not agreed on. December 15, 1907, there was a definite agreement of extension of time for payment of the $1,800 to January 1, 1908. During the month of December Francis paid to Holmes $350, which was accepted by the latter as a part payment of the $1,800 before mentioned. This money was realized by Francis from the sale of cotton gathered by him from the land and grown by Holmes. On January 1, 1908, Francis, being unable to pay the balance of the $1,800, asked for further extension of time, and Holmes agreed to give him an answer on the morning of the following day. On the evening of January 2d Francis offered to give a check on a bank for this balance, but Holmes refused to accept it and declared the contract of purchase terminated. On February 6, 1908, Holmes instituted a suit in the justice court for forcible detainer against Francis to recover possession of the land, alleging in his complaint that possession of the property had been given to Francis under a contract by which defendant had the option to purchase it on or by January 1, 1908, and that he had failed to exercise the option according to its terms, and thereby defendant's right to purchase was forfeited and lost, and his right to possession terminated. Plaintiff recovered in the justice court, and from the judgment there rendered Francis appealed to the district court, where he was again cast in the suit, and now appeals from the judgment last rendered to this court.

Upon the trial in the district court Francis tendered to Holmes in open court $1,475 as the balance due of the $1,800 payment, with interest thereon from January 2, 1908, also the notes previously executed by him, and in his pleadings claimed title to the land. Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 2519, reads as follows: "If any person (1) shall make an entry into any lands, tenements or other real property, except in cases where entry is given by law, or (2) shall make any such entry by force, or (3) if any person shall willfully and without force hold over any lands, tenements or other real property after the termination of the time for which such lands, tenements or other real property were let to him, or to the person under whom he claims, after demand made in writing for the possession thereof by the person or persons entitled to such possession, such person shall be adjudged guilty of forcible entry and detainer, or of forcible detainer, as the case may be." Article 2521: "A person shall be adjudged guilty of forcible detainer also in the following cases: (1) Where a tenant at will or by sufferance refuses, after demand made in writing as aforesaid, to give possession to the landlord after the determination of his will. (2) Where the tenant of a person who has made a forcible entry refuses to give possession, after demand as aforesaid, to the person upon whose possession the forcible entry was made. (3) Where a person who has made a forcible entry upon the possession of one who acquired it by forcible entry refuses to give possession on demand, as aforesaid, to him upon whose possession the first forcible entry was made. (4) Where a person who has made a forcible entry upon the possession of a tenant for a term, refuses to deliver possession to the landlord, upon demand as aforesaid, after the term expires; and if the term expire whilst a writ of forcible entry sued out by the tenant is pending, the landlord may, at his own cost and for his own benefit, prosecute it in the name of the tenant. It is not material whether the tenant shall have received possession from his landlord or have become his tenant after obtaining possession."

If the facts proven and above noted make this a case of forcible detainer, under the statutes it must be by virtue of subdivision 3 of article 2519, or by virtue of some provision of article 2521, above quoted. All those provisions contemplate the existence of the relation of landlord and tenant as a basis for the action of forcible detainer. The facts above noted plainly show that Holmes gave to Francis possession of the land under and by virtue of the contract of the latter to purchase it, and we think the land was never let to Francis within the meaning of the term "let," as used in subdivision 3 of article 2519, and that he was never a tenant by will or sufferance within the meaning of article 2521. The term "let" is thus defined in Anderson's Law Dictionary: "To give leave to; to permit. To grant the use of realty for a compensation; correlative to hire." And thus in Rapalje's Law Dictionary: "Hindrance, obstruction. To lease, or hire out a thing for a compensation." The following from 1 Wood's Landlord & Tenant, 1, seems in accord with the weight of the authorities: "A tenant is one who occupies the lands or premises of another, in subordination to that other's title, and with his assent, express or implied. But, in order to create the relations, the two elements must concur. The fact that one is in the possession of the lands of another does not of itself establish a tenancy, because, if he is in possession under a claim of title in himself, or under the title of another, or even in recognition of the owner's title, but without his assent, he is a mere trespasser, and cannot be compelled to yield rent for his occupancy, nor is he estopped from attacking the owner's title. In such a case, all the elements requisite to create the relation of landlord on the one hand, or of tenant on the other, are lacking, to wit, assent upon the one hand, and subordination to title upon the other. If the owner gives his assent to the occupancy of one who has entered upon his lands adversely, a tenancy is not thereby created. In order to have that effect, the person in possession must accept such permission, and consent to hold under him, and in subordination to his title." See, also, Cunningham v. Ammerman, 3 Wilson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 352; Brown v. Randolph, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 66, 62 S. W. 981; 24 Cyc. 884-887; 1 Taylor's Landlord & Tenant, §§ 23, 25.

The issue made both by the pleadings of the parties and by the evidence, being necessarily one of title, could not be determined in the action for forcible detainer. Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 2529; 19 Cyc. 1124-1127.

The judgment of the trial court is therefore reversed, and the cause dismissed.

GABBART v. JOHNSON.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 10, 1909.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 37*)—CHANGE OF BOUNDARIES—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 3938, as amended by Act June 8, 1899 (Gen. Laws 1899, p. 321, c. 183), provides that the county commissioners' courts of organized counties which are not subdivided shall subdivide their counties into convenient school districts, except counties under the community system, but that, when districts are once established, they shall not be changed, except upon petition of patrons desiring to be transferred from one district to another, when a change may be made as requested, upon a certain showing. The act also empowers the commissioners' court to correct errors in district lines, and complete them when defective. Held, that the act applies to a district as formed after the addition of territory under the statute, and hence, after such a change of boundaries, the county commissioners' court had no power to revoke its former order making the change, without observing the prescribed procedure, in the absence of any error or defect in the lines as formerly fixed.

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 24*)—PROCEEDINGS TO CHANGE BOUNDARIES—IRREGULARITIES.

Where the county commissioners' court acquired and exercised jurisdiction of proceedings to change the boundaries of a school district under the act, the fact that one person living without the district, who did not petition for a change, was transferred to the district could not be availed of to invalidate the proceedings, in a collateral proceeding to contest the election of a trustee for the district.

Appeal from District Court, Comanche County; L. S. Kinder, Judge.

Action between Charley Gabbart and J. J. Johnson. From the judgment Gabbart appeals. Affirmed.

McMillan & Reid, for appellant. Calloway & Calloway, for appellee.

CONNER, C. J. This is a contest over the office of trustee for Union Grove school district No. 63 of Comanche county. From the facts found by the trial court it appears that Comanche county was regularly subdivided into school districts, in accordance with section 40, Gen. Laws 1893, p. 194, c. 122 (Rev. St. 1895, art. 3938), after which, on, to wit, November 18, 1904, the commissioners' court, as authorized by Acts 1899, p. 321, c. 183 (article 3938, Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1904), upon the petition of W. S. Stephens and seven others, who lived in adjoining districts, changed the line of district No. 63 so as to include the petitioners therein. At the February term, 1905, the commissioners' court, acting upon its own motion, passed an order rescinding the former order of November 18, 1904, restoring the lines of district No. 63 to its original boundaries. During the years 1906 and 1907 the order of the February term, 1905, seems not to have been resisted; all persons living within the territory added to district No. 63 by the order of November 18, 1904, taking no part in the affairs of district No. 63, but voted, etc., within the districts of which they originally constituted a part. At the regular trustee election for school district No. 63 in April, 1908, however, the voters residing in the added territory came into district No. 63 and voted at said election. At this election appellee received a majority of all the votes cast, but appellant received the majority of the votes cast by persons living within the original boundaries of district No. 63. The vital question presented to us for determination, therefore, is whether the

Rev. St. 1895, art. 3938, as amended by act approved June 6, 1899 (Gen. Laws 1899, p. 321, c. 183), provides, so far as necessary to here set out, that: "It shall be the duty of the county commissioners' court of all organized counties, not already subdivided, to subdivide their respective counties into convenient school districts by the first day of June, 1899, or as soon thereafter as practicable, and counties hereafter organized shall be subdivided before the beginning of the next ensuing school year (provided, that nothing in this article shall be construed to affect counties that have been placed under the community system). Said courts shall designate said school districts by numbers: Provided, that when districts are once established they shall not be changed except upon the following conditions, to wit: When any patron or patrons of any school district desire to be transferred to any adjoining district they shall make application to the commissioners' court of their county for a change in the district line, and if it shall appear to the said court upon full and complete evidence that the desired change in the district line will divide the distance more equally between the two schools affected by the change, and that the patrons so petitioning live nearer by the most practical road to the school to which they desire to be attached than to the one from which they seek to be released; or if it shall appear to the said court that there is an uncontrollable and dangerous obstacle between the houses of said petitioning patrons and the school to which they have heretofore been attached, and that the school to which they desire to be attached is more accessible than the former, the said commissioners' court may change the district line as requested, but said change shall be by unanimous consent of all the commissioners elected. The commissioners' court shall also have power to correct all errors in school district lines and to complete said lines when they are defective." The evident purpose of the Legislature was to prevent disturbance of existing conditions when once lawfully brought about, and in this respect it seems difficult to differentiate between a district as originally formed and as formed after the addition of territory under the statute. The policy of nondisturbance—of preserving and maintaining the statu quo—would seem to apply as well to the district after it has been lawfully enlarged as before. If this be true, we think we must approve the trial court's conclusion that the order of the commissioners' court at its February term, 1905, was void because in direct

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Unless there were some error or defect in the lines of the enlarged district, the commissioners' court was forbidden to change the lines, save upon "petition" as provided in the act. The purpose of conferring the power to change the original lines was evidently to enable the commissioners' court to so adjust the lines as to subserve the interest and convenience of those situated on or near the lines of the original districts, and when, upon petition of persons to be affected, the commissioners' court so adjust the lines, we think the district is to be thereafter considered as if thus originally established. These conclusions lead to an affirmation of the judgment, inasmuch as we think the acquiescence on the part of the people in the added territory in the order of February, 1905, for the years 1906 and 1907 cannot have the effect to validate an order otherwise void. Nor do we regard as of any consequence appellant's contention that in the added territory there lived one person who did not join in the petition to be added to district No. 63, particularly in view of the nature of this proceeding. The power of the commissioners' court to pass the order of November 18, 1904, was certainly invoked by the petition filed in that court. Jurisdiction having been thus invoked and exercised, the irregularity, if it be an irregularity, of including a person not petitioning therefor is not available in a collateral proceeding, as this must be held to be. We conclude that the judgment must be affirmed upon the trial court's conclusions of fact and of law, which we adopt.

A confirmation of an order for the sale of shingles recited the order, which, after being dated at Ft. Worth, Tex., followed with the words, "Ship to Comanche, Tex.," certain described shingles. Appeal from Comanche County Court; Edwin Dabney, Judge.

Action by Higginbotham Bros. & Co. against the J. J. B. McCullar Lumber Company to recover loss of profits on two cars of shingles alleged to have been sold by defendant to plaintiff. From a judgment for plaintiff. defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. M. Reiger and Smith & Latimore, for appellant. Goodson & Goodson, for appellee.

DUNKLIN, J. Higginbotham Bros. & Co. recovered a judgment in the county court of Comanche county for $125 against J. J. B. McCullar, doing business in the trading name of J. J. B. McCullar Lumber Company, from which judgment the defendant has appealed.

The suit was to recover loss of profits on two cars of shingles which plaintiff alleged defendant had contracted in writing to sell and deliver to plaintiff in Comanche, Comanche county. Plaintiff further alleged that defendant executed the contract with the fraudulent purpose not to comply with the same if the market value of the shingles should advance in price before time of delivery thereof should arrive, and that the negotiations between plaintiff and defendant resulting in the order for the shingles were had in Comanche county. By plea in abatement defendant alleged: That he was an inhabitant of Texas, and when the suit was instituted had his domicile in Denton county, but had his business headquarters in Ft. Worth, Tarrant county; that he never contracted in writing to deliver the shingles in Comanche county; and that in agreeing to sell the shingles to plaintiff he acted in good faith. The evidence showed that defendant's agent went to plaintiff's office in Comanche and proposed to sell the shingles in controversy for $3.75 per 1,000, which proposition was accepted by plaintiff's agent. Defendant's agent then mailed to defendant in Ft. Worth an order to ship the shingles to plaintiff at Comanche. The defendant then wrote plaintiff confirming the order, as follows:

"Notice. The copy of this order is inclosed for comparison. If not correct in every particular notify immediately. We guaranty grades to be up to the standard of the Yellow Pine Manufacturers' Association, and this order is taken to be shipped subject to their grades and classifications. Our terms are 60 days, or 2 per cent. discount after deducting freight, if paid within 10 days from date of

"Yours truly,

"J. J. B. McCullar Lumber Co."

A duplicate of the above confirmation was also mailed for the other car of shingles ordered. The foregoing order and confirmation thereof was the only evidence offered to prove a contract in writing on the part of defendant to deliver the shingles to plaintiff in Comanche county, and we think it fails to prove such a contract. Orthwein's Sons v. W. M. & E. Co., 32 Tex. Civ. App. 600, 75 S. W. 364; Russell v. Heitman (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 75. The undisputed evidence also showed defendant's residence in Denton county, as alleged in his plea of privilege, and the facts proven did not constitute a case of fraud committed in Comanche county such as would give the county court of that county jurisdiction over the defendant under Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 1194, subd. 7. We are therefore of opinion that defendant's plea of privilege should have been sustained, and the failure of the trial court to so hold was error which will require a reversal of the judgment.

Other questions presented in appellant's brief will not likely arise on another trial, and a discussion of them is unnecessary.

For the reasons above noted, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to enter an order changing the venue of the case to the county court of Denton county, and to make all other orders necessary to effectuate such change of venue, as prescribed by Acts 30th Leg. c. 133 (Gen. Laws 1907, p. 248).

Reversed and remanded.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Nov. 25, 1908. On Rehearing, April 14, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 285*)—HEARSAY—PEDIGREE.

Matters of pedigree such as family history may be proved by hearsay testimony, and other facts, not entirely matters of pedigree, may be so intimately connected with pedigree as to permit their proof by the same character of testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1143; Dec. Dig. § 285.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 288*)—HEARSAY—PEDIGREE.

Where a witness was the husband of the granddaughter of a person, he was a member of the family and could testify as to the family history, including the death and time of death of that person, though he did not state that he obtained his information from deceased members of the family.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 288.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 288*)—HEARSAY—REPUTATION AS TO PERSONS.

Where a witness testified that he first became acquainted with the family of S. about 60 years ago, and that the family consisted of Mrs. S., son, and daughter, he could testify that it was generally understood at the time in that community that S. was dead and that Mrs. S. was recognized as a widow.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 288.*]

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 43*)—REVOCATION OF AGENCY—DEATH OF PRINCIPAL.

Death of the principal revokes the agent's authority, and his subsequent deed is void, and conveys no title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-71; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 199*)—PROVINCE OF JURY—INSTRUCTIONS—DETERMINATION OF QUESTIONS OF LAW.

In trespass to try title, where defendants claimed through a deed from an agent of the person who was the common source of title, and the question in dispute was whether the agent's principal had died prior to the execution of the deed, thus revoking his agency, a request to submit to the jury the question whether the agent had authority to convey the land when he executed the deed was properly refused, since it would have submitted a question of law as well as fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 199.*]

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 239*)—INNOCENT PURCHASER—HOLDING UNDER VOID TITLE.

Where a link in the title of purchasers of land was a deed from an agent which was void because of the prior revocation of his authority by his principal's death, the purchaser could not claim protection as an innocent purchaser, since he was holding under a void title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

7. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 119*)—HOLDER UNDER VOID DEED—PRESUMPTION OF AGENT'S POWER FROM LAPSE OF TIME.

Where a deed in chain of title to land was void because the authority of the agent of the owner, who executed it had been revoked by the owner's death, the agent's authority to convey could not be presumed from mere lapse of time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

8. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 71*)—COLOR OF TITLE.

Where one link in the chain of title of persons claiming land is void, they have no such color of title as would bar an action against them under the three-year statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 415-429; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

9. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 100*)—SUFFICIENCY OF POSSESSION.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 3344, provides that when peaceable and adverse possession of land is taken under a written memorandum of title ten instruments. Held, that where one of the muniments of title under which persons claimed land was a will, the registration of which had been destroyed, and no steps to restore the record as allowed by statute had been taken, and the persons actually occupied for over 10 years only a part of the land which was separated from another part by an intervening tract which had been sold off, their possession did not constitute possession of the detached part which would bar an action for recovery thereof by 10-year limitation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 547-574; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

On Motion for Rehearing.

10. TRIAL (§ 261*)—REFUSAL OF REQUESTS—REQUEST EMBRACING SEVERAL PROPOSITIONS.

Where defendant's request to submit 17 different special issues embraced a single instrument with one caption signed at one place at the end by attorneys, so that the court could not detach a single paragraph, and, in view of the court's charge, it would not have been proper to charge the entire request, defendant could not complain of the court's refusal to charge the single paragraph.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 660; Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

11. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 195*)—ACTION—SPECIAL VERDICT—RIGHT TO JUDGMENT.

Where parties claimed land under a deed of an agent, who they contended had an interest in the land, so that his authority to convey was not revoked by the principal's death, and the existence of that interest, which was a question of fact, was not found by the jury, they were not entitled as matter of law to a judgment upon the facts found by the jury that the deed was executed by the agent after the death of the principal.

Appeal from District Court, Sabine County; James I. Perkins, Judge.

Trespass to try title by F. R. Lubbock and others against W. A. Wall and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hamilton & Minton, John B. Warren, and John Hamman, for appellants. Goodrich & Synnott, for appellees.

KEY, J. This is an action of trespass to try title; F. R. Lubbock and others being plaintiffs and W. A. Wall and his wife being defendants in the court below. The land involved is a part of the John S. Chivaler headright survey of 1,280 acres, located in Sabine county. The answer filed by the defendants embraced a general denial and plea of not guilty, and limitation of three, five, and ten years. The land was patented to John S. Chivaler in 1845, and the plaintiffs proved the death of John S. Chivaler and that they were his heirs. The defendants claimed the land under a chain of title alferred to was not produced, but evidence was submitted tending to prove its existence, loss, and contents, and the jury, in responding to special issues submitted to them, found that such deed was executed. The plaintiffs introduced testimony tending to show the death of John S. Chivaler prior to the execution of the deed referred to by W. B. Frazier as agent of Chivaler, and the jury found as a fact that John S. Chivaler was dead at the time Frazier executed that deed. The jury also found that the defendants, or those under whom they held, had peaceable and adverse possession of a portion of the John S. Chivaler survey lying south of the Houston Bayou in Sabine county, cultivating, using, or enjoying the same for ten consecutive years after the 30th day of March, 1870, and prior to the 24th day of May, 1882. They also found that in 1875 the deed records of Sabine county, including the records of the deeds and will under which the defendants claim, were destroyed by fire, and that said deeds and will were not again recorded in that county. Upon these findings of the jury the trial court rendered judgment for the plaintiffs for the land in controversy, and the defendants have appealed.

The first assignment of error challenges the correctness of the trial court's ruling in permitting the plaintiff F. R. Lubbock to testify concerning the death and the time thereof of J. S. Chivaler and the relationship of the plaintiffs to him; the contention being that the testimony referred to was hearsay, and not admissible. The witness testified that his wife was a daughter of G. H. Chivaler, and that G. H. Chivaler was the son of John S. Chivaler. He also testified that John S. Chivaler died in 1836, leaving two surviving children, only one of whom is now alive. On cross-examination the witness stated that at the time of testifying he was 56 years old, and that he did not know John S. Chivaler. Being asked how he knew that G. H. Chivaler was related to John S. Chivaler, he answered: "I know that John S. Chivaler was the father of G. H. Chivaler from family history." In response to another cross-interrogatory, he said: "When I answered direct interrogatory No. 10 by saying that Jane and G. H. Chivaler were the only heirs of John S. Chivaler, I spoke from what I had been told by the family. I was told by the family that they were the children of John S. Chivaler of Sabine county, Tex." It was also shown that the witness first formed the acquaintance of G. H. Chivaler in 1864 or 1865, and afterwards married his daughter Elizabeth, who is one of the plaintiffs in this suit. It is well settled that matters of pedisame character of testimony. Byers v. Wallace, 87 Tex. 511, 28 S. W. 1056, and 29 S. W. 760. The witness was a member of the Chival family, and we think it was competent for him to give testimony as to the family history, including the death and time of death of John S. Chival, although he did not state that he obtained his information from members of the family now deceased. Elliott on Ev. §§ 360, 366, 367, 371, 378; Wharton on Ev. § 201; Jewell v. Jewell, 1 How. 219, 11 L. Ed. 108; Fulkerson v. Holmes, 117 U. S. 389, 6 Sup. Ct. 780, 29 L. Ed. 915.

John A. Morris, a witness for the plaintiffs, testified that he first became acquainted with the family of John S. Chival about 1842 or 1843; that the family consisted of Mrs. Chival and a son and daughter; that it was generally understood at that time in that community that John S. Chival was dead; and that Mrs. Chival was recognized as a widow. This testimony was objected to as hearsay, and the objection overruled. While the testimony complained of was hearsay, it seems to come within one of the exceptions to the rule which excludes hearsay testimony, and we therefore overrule the second assignment, which complains of the ruling admitting that testimony. 1 Whar. Ev. § 223; Lessee of Scott v. Ratliffe, 5 Pet. 81, 8 L. Ed. 56; Primm v. Stewart, 7 Tex. 182.

The third assignment complains because the court refused to give an instruction requested by the defendants in effect directing a verdict for them. That assignment is overruled, because, if John S. Chival died before Frazier executed the deed under which the defendants hold, his death revoked all of Frazier's authority as agent, and the deed from Frazier was void, and did not convey any title.

Under the fourth assignment of error, it is contended that the court should have submitted to the jury an instruction allowing them to determine whether or not Frazier had the power to convey the land at the time he executed the deed. That instruction was properly refused, because, if given, it would have required the jury to determine a question of law as well as fact. There being no proof that Frazier's authority as agent was coupled with an interest held by him in the land, if John S. Chival was dead when Frazier executed the deed, the law declares that his power and authority as agent had ceased, and that the deed executed by him was void and of no effect, and it was not the province of the jury to determine Frazier's power to convey the land. It was their province to determine the facts, and the found that John S. Chival was dead when Frazier, purporting to act as his agent, attempted to convey the land, that conveyance was void; and, such being its character, and it being a link in the defendant's chain of title, the question of innocent purchaser is not in the case. One holding under a void title cannot claim protection as an innocent purchaser. Daniel v. Mason, 90 Tex. 240, 38 S. W. 161, 59 Am. St. Rep. 815; Terry v. Cutler, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 520, 39 S. W. 152.

Under the ninth assignment, it is contended that the court should have rendered judgment for the defendants, notwithstanding the finding of the jury that John S. Chival was dead when the deed purporting to convey the land from him was executed; the contention being that, after the lapse of so long a time, Frazier's power to execute the deed should be presumed. We cannot sanction that contention. The death of Chival ipso facto and absolutely revoked Frazier's power to sell the land, and such revocation cannot be affected by the lapse of time.

Under the eleventh and last assignment it is contended that the court should have rendered judgment for the defendants upon the finding of the jury as to adverse possession; the contention being that such finding, in connection with their chain of title, established the defendants' pleas of three and ten years' limitation. One link in the defendants' chain of title being void, they had no such color of title as would support the three-year statute of limitation. Cox v. Bray, 28 Tex. 263. In the case cited, it was held that a deed by an agent after the death of the principal is void, and not such color of title as will support the defense of limitation under the three-year statute. The proof also fails to meet the requirements of the ten-year statute. While it was shown that the defendants and those under whom they claim had for many years been in actual possession of a portion of the Chival headright, the portion so occupied was disconnected from the land in controversy by an intervening tract, which had been sold off, and one of the monuments of title relied on by the defendants was a will, the registration of which was destroyed by fire in 1875, and the steps authorized by statute had not been taken to restore that record. Not having shown actual possession of the land in controversy, and holding under a muniment of title other than a deed, which was not kept of record as required by statute, the possession relied on did not include the land in controversy. Rev. St. arts. 3344, 4597, 4600, 4352; Craig v. Cartwright, 65 Tex. 413; O'Neal v. Pettus, 79 Tex. 254, 14 S. W. 1065; Salmon v. Huff, 80 Tex. 133, 15 S. W. 257.

verted testimony that they were the heirs of John S. Chivaler, to whom the land was granted by the state, and having shown that John S. Chivaler was dead at the time Frazier attempted to convey the land as his agent, and defendants having failed to establish any of their defenses, the trial court properly rendered judgment for the plaintiffs; and, no error having been pointed out, that judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

On Rehearing.

This motion and the accompanying argument in behalf of the motion have received careful consideration, and we are still of the opinion that the case was correctly disposed of by this court.

As to the fourth assignment of error, complaining of the trial court's refusal to give a requested instruction set out in the assignment, in addition to what was said on our original opinion, we call attention to the fact that the instruction referred to was requested in such manner as to justify its refusal under the rules of practice announced in Burnham-Hanna-Munger Co. v. Logan, 88 Tex. 1, 29 S. W. 1067. The record shows that appellant presented to the court a written request to submit to the jury 17 special issues. The document is only one instrument, embracing 17 different paragraphs, has but one caption, is signed at but one place by attorneys, which is at the end of it, and following the names of the attorneys is the judge's indorsement refusing the entire instrument. In view of the charge given by the court, it would not have been proper to have given the entire charge requested, and no complaint is urged as to the refusal of any portion of it, except the sixteenth paragraph, and the instrument was not so framed as that the court could detach that paragraph and submit it to the jury. Such being the condition of the record, the case comes within the rule announced in the case cited, and appellants are not in condition to complain of the refusal to give the sixteenth paragraph of the requested instruction.

It may be true, as urged on behalf of appellants, that Frazier not only had a power of attorney from Chivaler, but that when he conveyed the land to Smith, acting as agent for Chivaler, he had an interest in the land, which fact, if true, would take the case out of the general rule that the death of a principal revokes the power of an agent to act for such principal. That, however, was a question of fact, and not a question of law, and the jury not having found the existence of such fact, appellants are not in a

If appellants, in a charge properly framed, had requested the court to submit that issue to the jury, and such request had been refused, a different question would be presented. But such charge was not requested, and in one which appellants contend covered this phase of the case was so framed and connected with others, as above stated, as that refusal does not disclose reversible error.

With these observations, the motion for rehearing is overruled.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 739*)—MAINTENANCE OF WATERWORKS—FAILURE TO FURNISH WATER—LIABILITY.

A city owning its own waterworks is not liable for failure to furnish sufficient water supply to extinguish a fire.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1557; Dec. Dig. 739.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 206*)—WATER COMPANIES—FAILURE TO SUPPLY WATER—LIABILITY.

A contract between a city incorporated under Rev. St. 1895, art. 418, authorizing the council to provide the city with water for the extinguishment of fires and the convenience of the inhabitants, etc., and a water company which stipulates that the company shall supply water to the city and the inhabitants thereof and fixes the sum the city shall pay as rent for fire hydrants, etc., is not a contract for the benefit of the inhabitants of the city, and the company owes no duty to the inhabitants to supply water for fire protection.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 206*)—WATER COMPANIES—FAILURE TO SUPPLY WATER—LIABILITY.

A water company contracting with a city to furnish water to the city and its inhabitants and to supply water to extinguish fires, etc., does not undertake a public duty, so as to be liable on that ground for the destruction of the property of an inhabitant because of the failure to furnish water to extinguish a fire.

Appeal from District Court, Hunt County; R. L. Porter, Judge.

Action by Sam A. Beckham against the Greenville Water Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Looney & Clark, for appellant. B. Q. Evans, for appellee.

BOOKHOUT, J. This suit was brought by appellee to recover from appellant the value of a dwelling house and its contents which were destroyed by fire in the city of Greenville on the 18th day of August, 1907. The petition alleged that in 1888 the city of Greenville by ordinance entered into a contract with King and others and their assigns, giving them the right to construct, maintain, and operate in said city a complete system of waterworks for an adequate supply of water to said city and its inhabitants for domestic and manufacturing purposes and for the extinguishment of fires; that the said works were constructed, and that appellant as the assignee of said King and others became the owner thereof; that, in consideration of the benefits from said franchise and the hydrant rentals paid by said city, appellant undertook to supply the hydrants in said city with sufficient water pressure at all times to throw water 70 feet high; that in 1901 the said city rented from appellant until 1918 60 fire hydrants at the sum of $40 per annum for each hydrant, to be paid out of the revenue for general purposes raised by taxation in said city, to be appropriated and set aside by said city for such purposes; that appellee is a taxpayer, and that the property destroyed was constructed by him in reliance upon the performance by appellant of its contract with the city, and that, for that reason, he did not provide other means to protect his property from fire; that on the date above named his property caught on fire; that the Greenville fire department was immediately notified and came to the scene, but that there was no pressure in the water mains and hydrants of appellant, and that, on account of the failure of appellant to comply with its contract and its negligence in failing to maintain such pressure, his property was entirely destroyed by fire. It was further alleged that appellant in consideration of its franchise, benefits, and money received by it from said city "held itself out to the public as being able, capable, and willing to fur-that he had rented from defendant, and for which he had paid, and was then paying, monthly rentals to defendant, and in consideration for such rentals defendant had agreed and contracted to furnish him water in said hydrants with sufficient pressure that, in case of fire, he might attach his hose to said hydrant and thereby extinguish said fire; that, when the fire started, he did attach his hose to said hydrant and undertook to put out the fire, and would have done so but for the failure of the appellant to have proper water pressure in its mains. He alleged his property to be of the value of $8,500, and prayed for judgment for that amount. Appellant answered by general demurrer, special exceptions, general denial and special answer. The case was tried before a jury on the 1st day of April, 1908, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee for the sum of $1,733. Appellant's motion for new trial being overruled, it duly excepted, gave notice of, and perfected an appeal.

Appellant assigns as error the court's action in refusing a special charge instructing a verdict for defendant.

It is contended that a property owner cannot hold a water company liable for loss of his property by fire because of its breach of its contract with the municipality to supply water for fire purposes. The contract is embraced in the terms of an ordinance passed by the city council of the city and the acceptance thereof by the beneficiaries in said ordinance. The sections of the ordinance bearing upon this discussion are 1, 2, 8, 9, 11, 18, 20, and 21, in substance providing as follows: Section 1 stipulates that the purpose of making the contract is "to supply water to the city of Greenville and the inhabitants thereof." Section 2 names the source from which the water may be procured, and the means by which the water company may store it. Sections 8 and 9 relate to extensions, and are as follows:

"Extension of pipes shall be made from time to time upon a petition of property owners who may desire to take water for domestic or manufacturing purposes, provided an income from said property owners reach the sum of four hundred ($400.00) dollars per annum per mile, or the proportional amount for the fractional part of a mile."

"Extension of pipes shall be made whenever ordered by the city council of Greenville, provided, that the city shall order the placing of fire plugs so that said fire plugs shall in no case be more than five hundred (500) feet apart."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

ning with the legal adoption and approval of this ordinance and assent thereto by the Greenville Water Company, and ending, to-wit, the 2d day of August, 1918, the sixty hydrants now located upon the mains of said water company and in use for fire protection in said city and shall pay to the water company the sum of forty ($40) dollars per hydrant per annum, for each and every one of said hydrants, and the same price for any additional hydrants which it may hereafter order installed or placed upon the mains of the said water company up to the said 2d day of August, 1909. All hydrants shall be kept in repair and working order by the said water company. Whenever the mayor or chief of the fire department notifies the superintendent of the water company that any fire hydrant is out of repair, then said water company shall cause said fire hydrant to be repaired at once and in case of a delay of five days in making the desired repairs, then in that case the hydrant rental for said hydrant shall cease for the entire length of time the hydrant was out of repair, by reason of failure to make the necessary repairs. The amount agreed to be paid under this ordinance for the year 1901, shall be paid out of the current revenues of said city for said year; and the city council of the city of Greenville shall annually appropriate and set aside, out of the general fund, such sum as may be necessary to pay the hydrant rentals herein agreed to be paid, and the sum so set aside shall constitute, be and remain, a fund for the sole purpose of paying said hydrant rental, and shall not be appropriated to any other purpose whatever."

Section 18 provides that the city council shall locate the mains and hydrants stipulated for.

Section 20 is as follows: "The said waterworks company shall have the right to make all needful rules and regulations for the protection of said waterworks and for their operation. For the tapping of mains, proper size of service pipes, and for shutting off water for nonpayment of water rates by private consumers or for waste or for any wrongful use of water by any party."

Section 21 provides a maximum list of rates which private consumers shall pay for water they may use, and also contains the following: "No charge to be made for water for city hall, public schools, four (4) public water troughs, said troughs to be inclosed so as to prevent stock running at large from using, and citizens of the city are prohibited from using same except by permission of water company, and flushing gutters. The hydrants when erected to be used exclusively for the extinguishment of fires, necessary a longer period of one (1) hour in the same week, notice to be given for at least five (5) hours previous to time set for such practice to the superintendent or engineer of said waterworks, for flushing of paved gutters or sewers any one of the hydrants to be used, but the use of all not to exceed forty (40) minutes each week and an extension of one minute in time for flushing to be made for each hydrant erected or extended piping. Same notice when hydrants are to be used for flushing as provided for fire companies practice. All rates shall be payable quarterly in advance, at the office of the water company. When no rate is established contract may be made with the water company. No water will be furnished by meter measurement for less than fifty ($50) dollars per annum and the party desiring to use meter must furnish it and pay fifty (50) cents per one thousand (1,000) gallons consumed."

The franchise was originally granted T. H. King, J. H. Cook, John W. Harrison, F. B. Nichols, and Thomas Howard, their associates, successors, and assigns. The Greenville Water & Electric Light Company was organized and incorporated, and they took the franchises and contracts from the persons to whom it had been granted. The property was finally sold out by the receiver in the federal court and bought in by the present company, a corporation whose name is "The Greenville Water Company." It has the same franchise and the same property that the old company had. By the contract now in force the city is to pay $40 per annum per hydrant for each of the water company's fire hydrants, and this is paid out of the general fund of the city. The city of Greenville had a regularly and legally organized fire department consisting of 24 officers and men, and the necessary horses, hose carts, engines, and apparatus to extinguish fires. When the company arrived at the fire, the pressure was not sufficient, and the property was entirely destroyed.

The question presented is: Can a property owner hold a water company liable for loss of his property by fire resulting from a breach of its contract with the municipality to supply water for fire purposes? It is clear that a city owning its own waterworks cannot be held liable in an action for damages for failure to furnish sufficient water supply to extinguish fire. House v. Houston Waterworks Co., 88 Tex. 233, 31 S. W. 179, 28 L. R. A. 532; Butterworth v. City of Henrietta, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 467, 61 S. W. 975; Tainter v. City of Worcester, 123 Mass. 811, 25 Am. Rep. 90; Fowler v. Waterworks Co., 83 Ga. 222, 9 S. E. 673, 20 Am. St. Rep. 818; Vanhorn v. City of Des Moines, 68 Iowa, 447, 19 cover of the company for the value of certain property alleged to have been burned by reason of the negligent failure of the water company to furnish sufficient pressure, as it had contracted to do, to throw water the height specified in the contract, by reason of which negligence plaintiff's property was destroyed by fire. The contract was between the Houston Waterworks Company, a private corporation, and the city of Houston, and stipulated that the purpose and intent of the contract was "to supply the city of Houston with water to maintain the cleanliness and health of the city, for the extinguishment of fires, and for the protection of property of the inhabitants of said city." The contract also provided for the furnishing of water to private consumers at the rate therein stipulated. It was held in that case that the contract there sued on was a contract between the city of Houston and the water company, and that no part of the contract justified the conclusion that the water company assumed a duty to the citizens. It was further held that, unless the water company under the contract assumed a duty to the citizens of Houston, no right of action accrued to a citizen to maintain a suit because of a breach thereof. Appellee maintains that the purpose of the contract being "to supply water to the city of Greenville and the inhabitants thereof," it is a contract made for the benefit of a class, to wit, the inhabitants of the city, and that he belongs to the class named. This contention is fully answered adversely to appellee in the opinion in the House Case. The purpose of the contract in that case is substantially the same as that of the contract between the appellant water company and the city of Greenville, and, as previously stated, it was held that it was not a contract between the water company and the citizens of Houston, and that under its terms the company owed no duty to the citizens in the performance of its contract. But appellee argues that there is a distinction between the terms of the charter of the city of Houston, under which that city was operating at the time of the execution of that contract, and article 418 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, under which the city of Greenville is incorporated. We have examined the terms of the charter of the city of Houston at the time the contract construed in that case was executed and article 418 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, under which the city of Greenville was incorporated, and are of the opinion that there is no material difference between them in conferring upon the respective cities power to provide water for the extinguishment of fires.

Again, appellee contends that the water on the water company's undertaking, constructed his house with reference to the location of the hydrants and mains, and failed to take any other precautions, such as taking out insurance, to protect his property, relying upon the faithful discharge of the duties of the water company. The proposition urged is that the water company, in consideration of the franchise and privileges which it enjoyed, and the benefits and emoluments and profits that it derived from the conducting of its business, undertook to serve the public by furnishing an adequate supply of water to the city of Greenville and to its inhabitants for fire protection, and that, while plaintiff did not construct his house specially with any understanding with the water company, yet he failed to carry insurance on his house, relying upon the protection that the water company had undertaken to furnish, and as a direct result of its failure to keep its mains and hydrants supplied with water, not only in accordance with its contract with the city and its inhabitants, but in accordance with its public undertaking, wherein the water company held itself out as being ready, willing, and able to furnish necessary fire protection, plaintiff suffered and sustained the injury herein complained of. This proposition is fully met and answered by the opinion of Judge Brown in the House Case. He says: "If the city of Houston had contracted with the defendant that it was to be liable to individual citizens for losses sustained by fires under such circumstances as are shown in this case, such contract would have been void, because the city had no power to make such contract. Taylor v. Dunn, 80 Tex. 670, 16 S. W. 732; Becker v. Waterworks, 79 Iowa, 422, 44 N. W. 694, 18 Am. St. Rep. 377. It being true that the city could not have made a contract with the defendant that it should be so liable, it follows that no such implied liability could arise out of the contract, for assuredly nothing could be implied which could not have been lawfully expressed in the contract." 88 Tex. 248, 31 S. W. 185 (28 L. R. A. 532). That opinion is in accord with the great weight of authority in this country. Cleburne Water Co. v. City of Cleburne, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 141, 35 S. W. 733; *Allen v. These decisions are against the great weight of the authority in this country. See note to opinion in the case of Mugge v. Tampa Waterworks Co., 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171. The opinion of the Supreme Court of this state in the House Case is exhaustive and well considered, and because we are impressed with the soundness of its reasoning, and because it is the opinion of the highest legal authority of this state, we do not hesitate to follow it.

Appellee's house was supplied with water from the waterworks for his closet, kitchen, etc., and in addition he had one hydrant in the yard. He had no particular arrangement with the company that he was to be supplied with water further than his place was connected with the water company as stated, and he paid what they charged for water. He had a private hose that he used for sprinkling his yard and the street, and for watering flowers. He testified that he could have used it for putting out fire. When the fire was discovered, part of the kitchen was on fire about 20 feet from the ground. The lawn hose had been used the evening previous for watering the lawn, and was left attached to the hydrant, and there is evidence that had a contract with the water company for consideration of a monthly rental whereby it undertook and agreed to furnish him with sufficient water and pressure in the mains so that, by the use of a private hydrant and hose in his yard, he could protect his property from fire. We do not agree to this contention. The evidence does not show that had there been sufficient pressure the fire could have been controlled by the garden hose. Besides, it appears from the evidence that it was not contemplated that the garden hose would be used to put out fires. The chief of the fire department testified that he never used one and never saw one used for that purpose.

It appearing that appellee is not entitled to recover under the facts as alleged and proven, it follows that the trial court erred in refusing to instruct a verdict for defendant.

The judgment is reversed, and judgment is here rendered for appellant.

SAVAGE et al. v. UMPHRIES, Co. Atty.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 31, 1909. On Rehearing, April 28, 1909.)

1. ELECTIONS (§ 1*)—ELECTIVE FRANCHISE—RIGHT TO EXERCISE—"FRANCHISE."

The exercise of the elective franchise is not a natural right, but is, as the word "franchise" implies, a right conferred by the state or body politic.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 37*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—CONTESTS.

In a local option election contest, that only one of two tickets, each bearing the same number, was counted for prohibition, did not show any injury to contestants in the absence of any allegation that the other ticket was voted against prohibition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 37*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTIONS—CONTEST—COMPLAINT—EVIDENCE.

Acts 29th Leg. 1905, p. 535, c. 11, § 64, requires the polls in all elections to be open from 8 o'clock a. m. to 7 o'clock p. m., and provides that the election shall be held for one day only. Held that, in a local option election contest, allegations of the complaint that in a certain precinct the polls were not opened until 11 a. m. and were closed at 4 p. m., that there were polled in such precinct only 7 votes for and 3 against prohibition, though there were 20 legally qualified voters in the precinct, and that a large majority thereof would have voted against prohibition, had the polls been open, were sufficient to admit proof that contestants were prejudiced by the violation of the statutory provision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

4. ELECTIONS (§ 60*) — PAYMENT OF POLL TAX.

That Const. 1875, art. 6, § 2, as amended by Acts 1901, p. 322, providing that any voter subject to pay a poll tax must pay the same before he offers to vote at any election, further provides that the provisions of the section shall be self-enacting, does not render unconstitutional Acts 29th Leg. 1905, p. 527, c. 11, § 23, providing a method for determining how and when one offering to vote at an election shall or shall not be declared subject to a poll tax.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

5. ELECTIONS (§ 198*)—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

The general rule is that statutory provisions regulating the conduct of public elections, if not expressly made mandatory, will be construed as so far directory that the election will not be nullified by mere irregularities, not fraudulently brought about, when the irregularity was not so great as to throw a substantial doubt on the result and there was no obstacle to a free expression of the will of the electors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 170; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

6. ELECTIONS (§ 51*)—JUDGES—DISQUALIFICATION.

Election Law (Acts 29th Leg. 1905, p. 535, c. 11) § 60, provides that no one holding any office of profit or trust under the United States or this state, or any city of this state, except notary public, shall act as judge of any election. Held that, though a city alderman acted as judge, the election will not be declared void, in the absence of an allegation that he did anything to change the result, as it will be presumed that the other judge was competent to act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

7. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 37*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—CONTEST—ESTOPPEL.

One may contest a local option election, though he has obtained a temporary injunction restraining the publication of the result of the election; such injunction having been dissolved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a local option election contest, the court found that a certain party was an illegal voter and excluded his vote, the error, if any, in excluding his testimony that he did not remember what was on the ticket he voted, was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4190; Dec. Dig. § 1056.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—ELECTION CONTESTS—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a local option election contest, error, if any, in excluding testimony of one as to his intention to vote in the precinct where he resided, instead of in the one where he did vote, was harmless; the court having excluded his vote.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4190; Dec. Dig. § 1056.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ELECTION CONTEST—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a local option election contest, it appeared that a certain voter was qualified, regardless of the fact as to whether or not his deceased father, an alien, had ever declared his intention to become a citizen, the admission of testimony of such voter that his father had declared his intention to become a citizen, but was killed before he could take out his naturalization papers, was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—ELECTION CONTEST—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

In a local option election contest, the admission of testimony of a witness as to where he thought a certain voter considered his home, if error, was harmless; it appearing that the court, in excluding the vote of such party, was not influenced by the testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

12. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 37*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—CONTESTS—RECOUNTING BALLOTS.

In the absence of a statute requiring it, the court was not bound, in a local option election contest, to have certain challenged ballots removed from the boxes, and then direct the clerk to recount the remaining ballots in each of the boxes and announce the result of the count to the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

13. ELECTIONS (§ 293*) — CONTESTS — EVIDENCE.

While, in an election contest, if it be shown that ballots are not in existence, the contents may be proved by parol evidence, yet where it appears that the ballots have been tampered with, and that the identical ballots voted are not before the court, parol evidence of the contents is not admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

14. ELECTIONS (§ 293*)—CONTEST—EVIDENCE.

While a voter may not testify that he voted one way, when he admits that he cast a ballot, which has not been changed, showing that he voted another way, testimony of voters that they voted for a certain candidate or measure, and that their ballots have been changed, is admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 291; Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

15. EVIDENCE (§ 434*) — PAROL EVIDENCE — FRAUD.

The rule excluding parol evidence to contradict, vary, or modify written instruments is much relaxed, when fraud is alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2005-2020; Dec. Dig. § 434.*]

16. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 37*) — LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—CONTESTS—EVIDENCE.

In a local option election contest, the action of the commissioners' court in counting the ballots may not be impeached by the testimony of one present at the count as to how the duty was performed by members of the court, thereby showing a different result than that officially declared.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

17. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—ELECTION CONTEST—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where, in an election contest, there was no specific allegation as to certain irregularities, and the case was tried without a jury, the erroneous rejection of testimony as to such irregularities was not ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1056.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes fore he offers to vote, is not added to by a legislative enactment requiring the payment of a city poll tax by a voter subject to its payment, since no tax can be levied by a city unless done under the laws of the state, and hence such enactment is not unconstitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

19. ELECTIONS (§ 295*)—CONTESTS—QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

It was not essential, in an election contest, to prove that a voter owed a poll tax to both the state and the county, and failed to pay the same as required by law, in order to render his vote illegal; proof that he owed it to the state, and failed to pay it, sufficing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

20. ELECTIONS (§ 83*)—QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS—PAYMENT OF POLL TAX.

One owing a state and county poll tax to T. county for 1906, which he had not paid prior to February 1, 1907, was not entitled to vote at an election in P. county in December, 1907.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

21. ELECTIONS (§ 72*) — VOTERS — "RESIDENCE."

Under Election Law (Acts 29th Leg. 1905, p. 521, c. 11) § 4, providing that the residence of a single man is where he usually sleeps at night, and that of a married man is where his wife resides, if he be not permanently separated from her, one's residence must be determined by actual facts, and where the testimony showed that a voter lived with his "family" in a certain town, and that, though he owned a ranch which he considered his home, he had not lived on it since moving to the town, his "residence" was in such town, whether his wife was living or not.

22. ELECTIONS (§ 291*)—QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTER—PAYMENT OF POLL TAX.

In an election contest, it would be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that a voter produced the proper evidence before the judge of election that he had paid his poll tax as required by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 286; Dec. Dig. § 291.*]

23. ELECTIONS (§ 72*) — QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS.

A citizen of the United States, who had actually resided in the state 12 months and in the county 6 months prior to casting his vote, was qualified, though he testified that he could not say when he decided to permanently reside in the state.

28. ELECTIONS (§ 291*)—MUTILATED BALLOTS—PRESUMPTIONS.

A mutilated ballot will be presumed to have been mutilated after it was counted by the election officers, since it must be assumed that they know and will perform their duty.

27. ELECTIONS (§ 180*)—MUTILATED BALLOTS—CONSTRUCTION.

A mutilated ballot must be construed in the same way as any other written or printed document, and the construction must be such as to give effect to the voter's intent, if it can be ascertained from the face of the ballot.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

28. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 219*)—FINDINGS OF FACT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A finding of fact of the trial court, not complained of, is conclusive on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1315, 1322; Dec. Dig. § 219.*]

29. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 265*)—FINDINGS—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTION.

It is not necessary to take exception to findings of law and fact, when there is a statement of facts in the record, in order to review them on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1536-1551; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

30. ELECTIONS (§ 72*)—QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS.

A minor, residing for 12 months in the state with his father's consent, became a resident, and entitled to vote on attaining his majority, though the father was absent from the state part of the time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

31. ELECTIONS (§ 83*)—POLL TAX.

Where one paid his state poll tax within the time required by law, it was immaterial, so far as it affected his qualification as an elector in P. county, whether he paid the tax there or in another county; there being no evidence that a county poll tax was levied in such other county.

33. ELECTIONS (§ 291*)—QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS—BURDEN OF PROOF—"CITIZEN."

As a man is a "citizen" of the country to which his father owes allegiance, it was incumbent on the party alleging in an election contest that a certain voter was not a citizen of the United States to show that such voter's father was not a citizen thereof during his son's minority.

86. ELECTIONS (§ 208*)—CONDUCT—TIME OF OPENING AND CLOSING POLLS.

The provision of a statute as to the time of opening and closing the polls ordinarily is so far directory that an irregularity in this respect, which does not deprive a legal voter of his vote or admit a disqualified person to vote, will not vitiate the election, though it is otherwise where the irregularity is so great as to affect the result.

Appeal from District Court, Potter County; H. G. Hendricks, Judge.

Action by Z. Z. Savage and others against Hugh L. Umphries, County Attorney, to contest an election. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Geo. G. Clough and Reeder, Graham & Williams, for appellants. Hugh L. Umphries, Madden & Truelove, and Ben H. Stone, for appellee.

NEILL, J. We take from appellants' brief the following statement of the nature and result of the suit:

"This cause is a contest of a local option election held in Potter county, Tex., on the 8d day of December, 1907, for the purpose of determining whether the sale of intoxicating liquors should be prohibited within said county. The statement of the contestants, filed within the statutory period, after due notice, alleges in substance:

"(1) That the election is void for want of constitutional authority to hold same.

"(2) Because the same was ordered on the petition of 302 persons alleged to be qualified voters, whereas but 149 of said persons were duly qualified voters when said petition was presented and the election held.

"(3) Because said order purports to and does affect taxation, and the entire board of commissioners were not present when the same was made.

"(4) That said election is void because the officers chosen to hold the same were all of one political faith, to wit, members of the

No. 5, was a school trustee in Amarillo independent school district, the same being an office of trust, as contemplated within the law, and at the same voting box R. B. Newcome acted as one of the judges of election, he being also a school trustee for the same district, and likewise disqualified under the law.

"(6) That J. D. Brady, one of the judges of election in voting box No. 3, was a school trustee for school district No. 3 of Potter county, which is an office of trust within the meaning and intent of the law.

"(7) That in voting precinct No. 3 F. M. Hill was presiding judge, and at the same time was a school trustee in school district No. 2, which is an office of trust within the meaning and intent of the law.

"(8) That J. C. McDowell was judge of election in voting precinct No. 4, and at the same time a county commissioner, which is an office of emolument and trust within the meaning and intent of the law.

"(9) That in voting precincts Nos. 1 and 5 a large number of influential citizens coerced and intimidated voters, by announcing that they would prosecute persons who should vote 'against prohibition,' and circulated a handbill to that effect; that said persons congregated at or near voting precincts Nos. 1 and 5, and if they had reason to believe that a person would vote 'against prohibition' would make remarks calculated to, and which did, deter many timid persons from so voting, which votes, had they been cast, would have reversed the result of the election; that as a part of the scheme of coercion the said persons procured the arrest of one El. C. Jeffries, charged with illegal voting, which charge was fictitious and fraudulent, and which wrongful arrest intimidated many persons who were lawfully entitled to vote from voting 'against prohibition,' which persons, had they voted, would have voted 'against prohibition,' and would have reversed the result of the election; that large crowds were permitted to congregate in and about said voting boxes, within the 100-foot limit, in open violation of law, and their presence intimidated persons, and prevented them from voting 'against prohibition,' which persons and their votes would have materially affected the result and reversed the same, had they been permitted to vote without molestation.

"(10) That in voting precinct No. 5 the poll list shows J. M. Frazier voted ticket 318; and in said box two tickets of said number were found, one of which was counted 'for prohibition.'

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

"(11) That in voting precinct No. 1 one ticket was found which contained two numbers, 3 and 360, and said ticket was counted 'for prohibition,' and in said box a ticket was found with two numbers, 25 and 267, which ticket was counted 'for prohibition,' and according to the poll list C. F. Blanchard voted ticket 267, which was also counted 'for prohibition'; that in voting precinct No. 1 a ticket was found torn in two pieces, which, when placed together, was made to read 332, and which was counted 'for prohibition,' and in said voting precinct was found two tickets, each being numbered 87, one of which was counted, and that 'for prohibition,' and two tickets were found containing the number 376, one of which was counted 'for prohibition' and the other not counted, and allegation is made that the tickets which were not counted were cast 'against prohibition.'

"(12) Because in voting precinct No. 3 one ballot was found in the box which contained no number, but the same was counted 'for prohibition.'

"(13) Because in voting precinct No. 5 J. N. Browning voted ticket 127 'for prohibition,' but the county commissioners, in counting the ballots, counted said ballot as 'against prohibition,' by reason of which glaring irregularity and inaccuracy a recount of the ballots is necessary to arrive at the true result of the count.

"(14) Because in voting precinct No. 4 the polls were not opened until 11 a. m. and were closed at 4 p. m., and there were polled but 7 for and 3 against prohibition; that there were 20 legally qualified voters at said precinct and entitled to vote therein, and that a large majority thereof would have voted 'against prohibition,' had the polls been opened during the hours required by law, by reason of which a sufficient number of electors had been deprived of the privilege of voting in such number as, had they voted, would have materially changed the result of the election.

"(15) Because in voting precincts Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 a large number of persons voted illegally for prohibition, in that they owed and had not paid a poll tax to the county of Potter for the year 1906, an itemized statement and list of which persons so illegally voting was attached as an exhibit.

"(16) Because the 9 persons named on Exhibits D and E each voted for prohibition, and their votes were so counted, and that each of said persons owed a poll tax to Potter county, Tex., for the year 1906, and had not paid same.

"(17) Because 114 persons named in Exhibit F voted for prohibition in voting precinct No. 5, a majority of which, if, indeed, not all, owed a poll tax to Potter county for the year 1906, and had not paid same.

"(18) Because the 5 persons whose names appear on Exhibit G owed a poll tax to Potter county, Tex., for the year 1906, and each voted for prohibition.

"(19) Because the 33 persons named on Exhibit H voted for prohibition, in precincts Nos. 1 and 5, and they and each of them owed a city poll tax to the city of Amarillo, lawfully levied and assessed, and did not pay the same; allegation being made that a large number of other persons also voted in said city of Amarillo in said election, and their votes were cast 'for prohibition,' who owed a city poll tax for the year 1906, but contestants were unable to give names of the voters so voting, except as named in Exhibit H.

"(20) Because the persons named in Exhibit I, 19 in number, each voted for prohibition, each arrived at the age of 21 years after January 1, 1906, and prior to election day, and that said persons failed to procure a certificate of exemption from the tax collector of Potter county, or from any other collector within the state, within the time required by law.

"(21) Because the persons whose names appear on Exhibit J each voted against prohibition, and their votes were erroneously or otherwise, counted by the commissioners' court as 'for prohibition,' each of said persons being duly qualified voters in their respective precincts.

"(22) Because the persons named on Exhibit K, 7 in number, each voted 'for prohibition,' and their votes were so counted, and none of said persons had resided in the state of Texas for 12 months next preceding the day of said election.

"(23) Because the persons named on Exhibit L, being 4 in number, each voted for prohibition, and none of said persons were entitled to vote, for the reason that they were not residents of Potter county, Tex., for 6 months next preceding the date of the election.

"(24) Because D. H. Morris and J. H. Moore, legal voters in precinct No. 1, cast their votes against prohibition, yet no votes were found in the voting box as being cast by them; that both W. W. White and J. A. Dunavan each voted against prohibition in precinct No. 5, being tickets 300 and 319, respectively, yet no ticket 300 or 319 was found in the said voting box, and said ballots were not counted against prohibition as cast.

"(25) Because W. W. Watkins, who voted ticket 377 'for prohibition' in precinct No. 5, was an alien, and not a qualified voter, and Horace Gooch, who voted 'for prohibition' in precinct No. 1, was at the time of casting his ballot a resident and voter in precinct No. 5, in Potter county."

By trial amendments to the fifth ground of contest were added the allegations therein that one Shaughnessy, who acted as the judge of the election in precinct No. 5, was at the time an alderman of the city of ground, that two votes, each bearing the ballot box, one of which was counted for prohibition and the other not counted, contestants contending that neither should have been counted; and the 20th ground of contest was amended by alleging that at the date of holding the election the city of Amarillo was a city of 10,000 inhabitants, and was on January 1, 1906, and 1907, and by adding other disqualifications to certain of the voters named in an exhibit to their petition.

The contestee's answer contained a plea in abatement and another in estoppel, the substance of which will be stated when we come to consider the court's action upon them. It also contained general and special exceptions to various grounds of contest alleged in the contestants' petition. On the merits the contestee answered by a general denial, and pleaded specially that in voting precinct No. 1 a "large number of persons, naming them, voted against prohibition, and owed and were due a poll tax to Potter county, Tex., for the year 1906; that a large number of persons, naming them, owed and were due, and did not pay, a city poll tax for the year 1906 to the city of Amarillo, in Potter county, Tex.; that certain persons, naming them, did not reside in Potter county, Tex., for 6 months next preceding the date of the election, and that certain persons, naming them, had not resided in the state of Texas for 12 months next preceding the date of the election; that certain persons, naming them, were over the age of 60 years on January 1, 1906, and did not take out a certificate of exemption before February 1, 1907; that certain persons, naming them, became of age after January 1, 1906, and before election day, and did not take out a certificate of exemption, etc.; that Carl Zapp was an alien at the time of casting his ballot; that Cowan, Trigg, Buckingham, and Jeffries voted in precinct No. 1, while living in precinct No. 5; that J. N. Browning, W. A. Christian, J. N. Vernon, R. B. Newcome, and Clyde Cockrell each voted 'for prohibition,' but their ballots were counted as against prohibition. By trial amendment H. R. Jack was challenged on the ground that he was not a resident of Potter county for 6 months next preceding the date of election, and also that he was not a resident of precinct No. 5, though he voted therein. Chas. J. De Wolf was also challenged on the ground that he was not a resident of the state of Texas for 12 months next preceding the election, and not of Potter county for 6 months, and that he voted in precinct No. 1, though not residing therein. Youngblood, Hassler, and Casey were also challenged on the additional 1907, and became of age prior to election day, and did not procure a certificate of exemption. D. H. Greer was also challenged for the additional reason that he was not a resident of the county of Potter, state of Texas, for 12 months preceding the date of election. S. Boyer was challenged on the ground of not being a resident of the county for 6 months preceding the date of the election, and for 12 months in the state of Texas."

Contestants prayed that "the matters and things complained of be inquired into; that the ballot boxes be opened, and the lawful ballots counted, and a result thereon be declared; and that if it should appear that such irregularities existed in bringing about such election, or in the holding or conducting of the same, as to render the true result impossible to arrive at, or doubtful of ascertaining, the election be declared void and a new election ordered."

The case was tried by a special judge, the regular judge being disqualified. The exceptions of both contestants and contestee were considered, and sustained in part and overruled in part. (Those overruled and those sustained will be specifically stated when we come to consider the assignments complaining of such rulings.) The trial then proceeded on its merits before the court, without a jury, who found for the contestee on his plea in estoppel, and that the commissioners' court of Potter county had declared that local option had carried in the county by a majority of 15 votes, and concluded from the evidence as a matter of law that of the voters who voted for prohibition all were legal, except 8, whose names are given in its conclusions, and that 2 voters, whose names are stated, who voted against prohibition, were counted and estimated by the commissioners' court as being for prohibition, and that their votes should be deducted from the total vote cast for prohibition and added to the votes against prohibition; that the ballot containing no number, found in box 3, which read "for prohibition," should be deducted from the total vote cast, and that the voters who voted against prohibition all were legal, except 5, whose names were stated.

The effect, therefore, of the conclusions of the trial court was to find that the election had carried for prohibition by a majority of 7 votes. The conclusions of fact and of law, filed by the trial court, were excepted to by the contestants, and from the judgment against them they prosecute this appeal.

Fifty assignments of error are presented and insisted on by appellants in their brief, and six cross-assignments are urged by the appellee in his. Before considering any of decide upon a just view of the true relation between the power of the suffragans and the rights of the whole people. Hence the exercise of the elective franchise is not a natural or God-given right, but is, as the word "franchise" implies, a right conferred by the state or body politic. In other words, as is said by an eminent authority on constitutional law, the questions whether one is fitted by intelligence to perform the function of an elector, or has such interests in the matters controlled through his suffrage as to check the misuse of power which self-interest prompts, or has such community of interest in the laws which are to govern the community, which should fit him for the discharge of the duties of a suffragan, must be determined by the body politic. "If he lacks intelligence, it is the greatest absurdity to give him the suffrage, and the greatest wrong to the community. If he lacks community of interest in the laws which are to govern the community, it is not only a serious danger, but a false principle, to give it to him, for thus you give power to the hand which is alien to the rights of others which it controls." Tucker on the Constitution, 89. See, also, Solon v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 114 S. W. 349. Hence, article 6 of the Constitution of 1875 of this state, as amended by the people in 1901 (Acts 1901, p. 322), determines who should have the right of suffrage, and, in connection with the act of the Twenty-Ninth Legislature and the amendment thereof by the Thirtieth, prescribes how it shall be exercised.

Section 2 of the article of the Constitution referred to is as follows: "Every male person subject to none of the foregoing disqualifications, who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years and who shall be a citizen of the United States, and who shall have resided in this state one year next preceding an election and the last sixth months within the district or county in which he offers to vote, shall be deemed a qualified elector and every male person of foreign birth subject to none of the foregoing disqualifications who not less than six months before any election at which he offers to vote, shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in accordance with the federal naturalization laws, and shall have resided in this state one year next preceding such election and the last six months in the county in which he offers to vote, shall also be deemed a qualified elector; and all electors shall vote in the election precinct of their residence: Provided, that electors living in any unorganized county may vote at any election precinct in the county to which county is attached for judicial purposes; and provided further, that any voter who is sub-such election. Or if said voter shall have lost or misplaced said tax receipt, he shall be entitled to vote upon making affidavit before any officer authorized to administer oath that such tax receipt has been lost. Such affidavit shall be made in writing and left with the judge of the election, and this provision of the Constitution shall be self-enacting without the necessity of further legislation. Such legislative enactments, prescribing the manner in which the right of suffrage given by the Constitution shall be exercised by the suffragans, as are pertinent to several assignments of error to be hereinafter considered will be stated in connection with the assignments when we come to consider them.

Section 1 of article 3397, Rev. St. 1895, as amended by Acts 30th Leg. 1907, p. 447, c. 8 is as follows: "At any time within thirty days after the result of the election has been declared, any qualified voter of the county, justice's precinct or subdivision of such county, or any town or city of such county in which such election has been held, may contest the said election in the district court of the county in which such election has been held, which shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all suits to contest such election, and the proceedings in such contest shall be conducted in the same manner as has been or may hereafter be prescribed, and said court shall have jurisdiction to try and determine all matters connected with said election, including the petition of such election and all proceedings and orders relating thereto, embracing final count and declaration and publication of the result putting local option into effect, and it shall have authority to determine questions relating to the legality and validity of said election, and to determine whether by the action or want of action on the part of the officers to whom was entrusted the control of such election, such a number of legal voters were denied the privilege of voting as had been allowed to vote might have materially changed the result, and if it shall appear from the evidence that such irregularities existed in bringing about said election or in holding same, as to render the true result of the election impossible to be arrived at, or very doubtful of ascertaining, the court shall adjudge such election to be void, and shall order the proper officer to order another election to be held, and shall cause a certified copy of such judgment and order of the court to be delivered to such officer upon whom is devolved by law the duty of ordering such election. It is further provided that all such cases shall have precedence in the district court and appellate courts, and that the result of such contest shall finally settle all questions relating to the validity of said election, and it shall not be permissible to again call the legality of said election in question in any other suit or proceeding; and provided further, that if no contest of said election is filed and prosecuted in the manner and within the time provided above, it shall be conclusively presumed that said election as held and the result thereof declared, are in all respects valid and binding upon all courts; provided also that pending such contest the enforcement of local option law in such territory shall not be suspended, and that all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith be and the same are hereby repealed." Acts 30th Leg. 1907, p. 447, c. 8.

Some of appellants' assignments present questions purely of law, and others present mixed questions of law and fact. Those of the first class will be first considered and disposed of, without regard to the order in which they are presented in the briefs; and, in considering those of the second class, our conclusions of fact pertaining to them will be stated.

Conclusions.

1. That only one of the two tickets, each bearing the number 318, found in the box of voting precinct No. 5, was counted for prohibition, as was the one voted by J. M. Frazier, does not show any injury to appellants, in the absence of an allegation that the other ticket was voted against prohibition; for, from aught that appears from the allegation in appellants' tenth ground of complaint, both tickets bearing that number may have been for prohibition, and in that event appellants would have been benefited by not counting them both. Therefore appellants' first and fifth assignments of error, which complain of the court's counting only one of the tickets, instead of both, are overruled.

2. Acts 29th Leg. 1906, p. 535, c. 11, § 64, provides that "in all elections, general, special or primary, the polls shall be open from 8 o'clock in the morning until 7 o'clock in the evening, and the election shall be held for one day only." It will be seen from our statement of the case that appellants alleged, as their fourteenth ground of contest, that in voting precinct No. 4 the polls were not opened until 11 a. m. and were closed at 4 p. m.; that there were polled in said precinct only 7 votes for and 3 against prohibition; that there were 20 legally qualified voters in said precinct and entitled to vote therein; and that a large majority thereof would have voted against prohibition, had the polls been opened during the hours required by law. The exceptions of appellee to this ground of contest are that it is too general, and fails to specify any voter or voters, who are voters in said precinct and desired to vote, failed to cast their votes by reason of said polls not being so kept open, nor does it show that such voters would have voted against prohibition. The second assignment of error complains of the court's sustaining the exceptions.

We think that the allegations in appellants' petition were sufficient to admit proof of the fact that the statutory requirement above quoted was violated by the officers charged with the duty of opening the polls and conducting the election, and that, had there not been such a violation of duty on the part of the officers, the result of the election at that precinct might have been different. It is a matter of general knowledge that many men, entitled to vote at an election, are so occupied with their own business, or in the discharge of their duty to their employers, that the only time they can spare, without prejudice to their business or violating their duty to their employers, to cast their ballots, is early in the morning, before their work commences, or late in the afternoon, after the day's work is done. If officers charged with the duty of holding elections are allowed to arbitrarily violate a provision of the election law that may result in depriving electors of their right to vote, or in making it inconvenient for them to exercise the right, the salutary provision, intended by the Legislature to secure an open, fair, and free election, with an opportunity for every qualified voter to exercise his right to the elective franchise, will be of little avail. It may be that, had the exceptions not been sustained to this ground of the contest, the evidence would have failed to show that appellants were in the least prejudiced by the failure of the officers of the election to open and keep open the polls at such election precinct during the hours prescribed by law. This, however, was a matter of fact, and the appellants, under the allegations in their complaint, had the right to introduce evidence to show that they were prejudiced by such breach of official duty on the part of those who were conducting the election. This right was denied them by the holding of the court, which we have no doubt was erroneous.

3. The third assignment complains of the court's sustaining appellee's exception to the twentieth ground of the contest. This ground of the contest will be noticed from our statement of appellants' pleadings. The exception interposed to it is that it is an insufficient ground for contesting the election, because it is not required that voters of the class mentioned should procure their certificates of exemption from payment of the poll tax from the tax collector before the 1st day of February, 1907, the year during which the election was held. As has been seen from the constitutional provision above quoted, any voter who is subject to pay a poll tax under the laws of the state of Texas must have paid the tax before he offers to vote at any election; but under the law male persons, otherwise entitled to vote, coming of age after the 1st day of January of the year in which the election shall be held, are not subject to the payment of poll tax for the preceding year. There must, however, be some means of ascertaining the fact of whether the person who offers to vote belongs to a class who is not subject to a payment of the poll tax, else the requirement of its payment, as a condition precedent to the exercise of the elective franchise, would doubtless, in many instances, be avoided by the assertion that the person offering to vote was not subject to the tax for the year it was required to be paid. Hence section 23 of the election law passed by the Twenty-Ninth Legislature provides that: "Every male person who will be twenty-one years old on or before the day of an election and was not subject to a poll tax preceding the election at which he desires to vote, and who by reason of minority has not theretofore been subject to a poll tax but has or will become twenty-one years old on or before the date of any election, and who possesses all the other qualifications of a voter, shall be entitled to vote at such election, if he has obtained a certificate of exemption from the county collector before the first day of February, which shall specify the day when he will be twenty-one years old, and contain all the other requisites of a certificate of exemption. Before the certificate of exemption shall issue the applicant therefor shall make written affidavit of his age to be administered and certified to by the county collector, who shall file and preserve same."

That section 2, above quoted, of article 6 of the Constitution, provided that its provisions "shall be self-enacting without any necessity of further legislation," does not, in our opinion, render the section of the election law just quoted unconstitutional; for it does not attempt to restrain the Legislature from declaring when and in what manner it shall be determined that one offering to vote at an election is not subject to the payment of a poll tax. The section of the statute declaring when and how this matter shall be determined is general and applies to all elections, whether general or special, and to every voting precinct in which it is held, whether in a city having a population of 10,000 inhabitants or one having a population less than that number. Hence we are of the opinion that the contestants had the right, under the allegations setting forth the twentieth ground of contest, to show that the persons named therein arrived at the age of 21 years after January 1, 1907, prior to the election, and had failed to procure their certificates of exemption, as is required by the law to entitle them to vote at the election in question.

4. To appellants' trial amendment of the fifth ground of contest, the purport of which is shown in our statement of the case, the appellee interposes the exceptions that it contains no allegation of fraud or wrongful acts upon the part of Shaughnessy, the judge of the election, such as in law would justify holding the election void on account of his being at the time an alderman of the city of Amarillo, and, further, that it appears from contestants' pleadings that Shaughnessy acted as a judge in holding the election and became a de facto officer or judge thereof. These exceptions were sustained by the trial court, and such ruling is the subject of the fourth assignment of error. Section 60 of the election law of 1905 provides "that no one who holds any office of profit or trust under the United States or this state, or any city or town of this state, except notary public, * * * shall act as judge, clerk or supervisor of any election." From this it is clear that Shaughnessy, if he was, as alleged by appellants, an alderman of the city of Amarillo, and acted as a judge of the election, was prohibited from holding such office and was incompetent, by reason of the statute referred to, to perform its duties or functions. The question to be determined is whether the provision of the statute just quoted is mandatory or directory.

The general rule is that statutory provisions regulating the conducting of public elections, if not made mandatory by the express terms of the law, will be construed as so far directory that the election will not be nullified by mere irregularities, not fraudulently brought about, when the departure from the prescribed method was not so great as to throw a substantial doubt on the result, and where it is not shown that there was any obstacle to a fair and free expression of the will of the electors. Black on Interpretation of Laws, p. 353. It is said that: "There is nothing better settled than that the acts of election officers de facto, who are in under color of election or appointment, are as valid, as to third parties and the public, as those of officers de jure. The doctrine that electors may be disfranchised because one or more of the judges or inspectors of election did not possess all the qualifications required by law finds no support in the decisions of any judicial tribunal." 15 Cyc. 311. But here, if the allegations in appellants' trial amendment be true, Shaughnessy was absolutely prohibited by the statute from acting as judge of the election. This inhibition did not go to his ineligibility or disqualification, but is an absolute denial of his right to act at all as judge in the election, and, in view of the statute, he could no more have acted as an officer de facto than he could de jure, for the law absolutely prohibits him from acting at all in any capacity. But it does not follow from this that, because he, in violation of the law, acted as a judge of the election, it should be declared null and void as to that precinct. It seems to us that the question as to the validity or invalidity of the election should be determined as though he had not acted at all, in the absence of any allegation that he did anything that would tend to change the result. In this view the election in that precinct should be regarded as having been presided over by only one judge, for the county commissioners' court was required in voting precincts, where there were less than 100 voters who had paid their poll tax and received their certificates of exemption, to appoint two reputable men, who were qualified voters, as judges of the election, and it will be presumed that it performed this duty. We are not prepared, therefore, to hold that, because one of the parties appointed as judge was prohibited by the law from acting as such, would vitiate, so as to render null, the election as to such precinct, presided over by the other judge, who, in the absence of an allegation to the contrary, must be presumed as competent to act; for to so hold would be to disfranchise all the qualified electors who voted at said precinct, without it appearing that the election was in any way affected by being presided over by one judge, instead of two as required by the statute. We therefore overrule the assignment.

5. The sixth assignment of error, which complains of the court's overruling appellants' exception to appellee's plea of estoppel, is sustained. Neither the plea, nor the evidence adduced in support of it, presents any of the elements of a judgment estoppel. We know of no principle of law or equity, nor can we conceive of any, which takes from a party the right given him by law to contest an election of this character because he has obtained a temporary injunction restraining the publication of its result, when such restraining order has been dissolved. From this it follows that these assignments (7, 14, and 15), which complain of evidence introduced by appellee to sustain such plea, should be sustained. It also follows that the findings of fact and law by the trial court, complained of in the forty-second and forty-ninth assignments, that by reason of the matters alleged in said plea the appellants were estopped from contesting the validity of the election, are erroneous.

6. As the trial court found that W. F. Janzen was an illegal voter, and excluded his vote in estimating and declaring the result of the election, it is wholly immaterial whether he voted for or against prohibition. Therefore, if it should be held that the court erred, as is complained of in the eighth assignment, in excluding his testimony, offered by appellants, to the effect that he did not remember what was on the ticket he voted, such error was harmless.

7. The admission of the testimony of Horace Gooch, who resided in one voting precinct and cast his ballot at the election in another, as to his intention to vote in the one where he resided, instead of the one where he did vote, which is complained of by the ninth assignment, though error, was harmless, because the court held that he was an illegal voter, and excluded the vote cast by him from its estimate in declaring the result of the election.

8. W. A. Watkins, who voted at the election, having not less than six months prior thereto declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in accordance with the federal naturalization laws, and having resided in the state one year next preceding the election and the last six months in Potter county, Tex., and having paid his poll tax as required by law, was, under the Constitution and laws of this state, a qualified voter and entitled to vote at said election, regardless of the fact as to whether or not his deceased father, who was an alien, had ever declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. Therefore his testimony, complained of in the tenth assignment, to the effect that his deceased father had made affidavit of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, but was killed before he could take out his final naturalization papers, in no way prejudiced the appellants; the legality of W. A. Watkins' vote being the subject of inquiry. This also disposes of the sixteenth assignment of error.

9. The testimony of Ed. Kirk, as to where he thought E. C. Jeffries considered his home on the 3d of December, 1907, the admission of which is complained of by the eleventh assignment of error, was harmless, inasmuch as the court found that Jeffries' vote was illegal, because he voted out of the precinct of his residence in Potter county; it thus appearing that the trial court was not influenced, in excluding such vote, by the testimony complained of.

The twelfth assignment of error, which complains of the admission of testimony of a like character as to the residence of one De Wolf, is disposed of adversely to appellants upon the same ground.

10. The thirteenth assignment of error, which complains of the court's admitting in evidence the testimony of George Cole tending to show that he voted illegally at the election because of having failed to pay his poll tax prior to the 1st of February, 1907, for the reason that appellee's pleadings did not attack the legality of his vote upon such ground, is predicated upon an erroneous assumption of what is shown by appellee's pleadings, which assail Cole's vote upon the very ground which the assignment denies was alleged.

11. The seventeenth assignment of error complains of the court's overruling appellants' motion, made during the trial of the cause, for the court to have the district clerk remove from the ballot boxes of precincts Nos. 1, 3, and 5 certain ballots contained in said boxes, which were challenged by appellants, and then to direct the clerk to recount the remaining ballots in each of said boxes and announce to the court the result of the count. It occurs to us that this assignment regards merely a matter of procedure in the trial of the cause, and in the absence of a statute expressly requiring the court to proceed in the manner sought to be required by the motion the court could proceed in such manner as it ity passed upon by the court, and those found to be illegal were deducted from the count in determining the number of legal votes cast. The assignment is, therefore, overruled.

12. The eighteenth assignment of error complains of the court's excluding parol evidence of certain witnesses, who were qualified voters and voted at the election, offered by appellants as tending to show that certain ballots, shown by the official records of the election to have been voted, respectively, by the several witnesses, which were counted for prohibition, should have been counted against prohibition. The rule is that the contents of ballots can best be shown by the instruments themselves, if in existence; but, if it be shown that they are not in existence, then the contents may be proved by parol evidence, the same as that of any other document that has been lost or destroyed. But where it appears that the ballots have been tampered with, and that the identical ballots voted are not before the court, it seems that parol evidence of the contents of the ballots that were voted should not be received.

A voter cannot be allowed to testify that he voted one way, when he admits that he cast a ballot, which has not since been changed, showing that he voted another way. But testimony of voters that they voted for a certain candidate or measure, and that the ballots purported to have been cast by them have been substituted for, or changed from, those actually cast, is admissible; for, where it is contended that a fraudulent substitution has been made, the elector may be asked for whom or for what measure he voted. In election contests, as in all other cases, the rule, excluding parol evidence to contradict, vary, or modify written instruments, is much relaxed when fraud is alleged. 15 Cyc. 419, 420. "Stuffing ballot boxes," or the fraudulent substitution of different votes from those actually cast at an election, can rarely, if ever, be shown by the testimony of those who perpetrated the fraud, and must, almost of necessity, be proved by circumstances, or by the parol testimony of the voters themselves as to what candidate or measure they actually cast their vote for at the election. It is true that such testimony may be false, and the temptation, for those vitally interested in the result of an election, to procure, by bribery or chicanery, perjured testimony of electors, may be great; but this goes to the probative force, rather than to the admissibility, of such testimony. If such evidence is false, it is easier to procure the evidence of the perjury than it would be to procure evidence of the fraudulent substitution of ballots for those actually voted at the election. If the testimony of men of the highest integrity of of public policy, then the policy of the public may well be deemed as a cloak for hiding frauds perpetrated at the ballot box.

Finally, we believe the proposition: "Where it is alleged that certain persons (naming them), each voted 'against prohibition,' but that the county commissioners erroneously or otherwise counted their votes 'for prohibition,' and it was further alleged that great irregularities existed, and that other votes, naming them, were erroneously counted, and it was shown by the poll list that the person named in the pleadings cast the ballot accredited to him by number, and that the ballot boxes had at all times since the date of the election been in proper custody, and the boxes produced in court, opened, and the numbered ballots found, it was competent to present the alleged ballot, and to prove by the testimony of the voter that the ballot found in the box, and accredited to him on the poll list, was not cast by him, but that he cast another and a different ballot than that presented"—asserted by appellants under this assignment, should be sustained.

13. We believe that the testimony of the witness Graham, offered by appellants to show how the commissioners' court had counted certain ballots in reaching the conclusion announced by it as to the result of the election, the rejection of which is complained of by the nineteenth assignment of error, was properly excluded upon the ground that it is against sound public policy and contrary to the legislative intent that the action of the commissioners' court in counting the ballots should be impeached by the testimony of one who was present at the count as to how the duty was performed by the members of the court, and thereby show a different result than that officially ascertained and declared by them.

14. After the witness J. M. Russell, who was an officer of the election in precinct No. 1, had testified on direct examination as to the irregularities in the manner of holding the election, he testified, on cross-examination, "that right in front of this voting box in the hallway there was quite a number of men in it all the time; that there were booths on the opposite side of the hall; that during the time the polls were open there were other and more persons on the outside than the officers; that there were challengers on either side of the voting box, and that he made no objection to these extra persons participating in the election; and that said extra persons during the day would make objections to people voting." On objection of appellee's counsel, this testimony was excluded on the ground that there were no allegations in the pleadings in regard to chal-of the witness given on his examination in chief, to the effect that there was no irregularity in holding the election at that precinct, was not true; but, inasmuch as there was no specific allegation as to such irregularity as the rejected testimony would tend to show, and as the case was tried without a jury, such error affords no ground for a reversal of the judgment.

15. The testimony offered by appellants for the purpose of showing that Ed Guleke, who voted at the election, and whose vote was counted for prohibition, who had not paid his city poll tax for the year 1906 prior to the 1st of February, 1907, to which he was subject, was an illegal voter, the exclusion of which is the subject of the twenty-first and twenty-third assignments of error, should have been admitted, for the statute provides that any voter who is subject to pay his poll tax under the laws of the state of Texas, or under the ordinance of any city or town in this state, before he offers to vote at the election shall have paid said tax; for we cannot believe, as appellee contends, that "the requirement that a voter be compelled to pay a city poll tax is an additional burden to that placed upon him by the Constitution, and is unconstitutional for that reason." As has been before shown, the right of suffrage is not a natural right of the citizen, but a franchise dependent upon the law, by which it must be conferred to permit its exercise. It is true that where the Constitution of a state fixes the qualifications, and determines who shall be deemed qualified voters, in direct, positive, and affirmative terms, these qualifications cannot be added to by legislative enactments, yet, as the constitutional provision in section 2, art. 6, hereinbefore quoted, required that "any voter who is subject to pay a poll tax under the laws of the state of Texas shall have paid the tax before he offers to vote at any election in this state," it cannot be said that this qualification is added to by the legislative enactment which requires the payment of a city poll tax by a voter who is subject to its payment; for such tax is required under the laws of the state of Texas, though it be a municipal tax, for no tax can be levied by a city unless it is done under the laws of the state. McCormick v. Jester (Tex. Civ. App.) 115 S. W. 278; People v. Teague, 106 N. C. 576, 11 S. E. 665. Though such testimony should have been admitted, we cannot, as is urged by appellants under the assignment, consider it as evidence, and deduct Guleke's ballot from the general result of the election as declared by the court.

16. The finding of the trial court in its tenth conclusion of fact, that A. S. Tugwell, who voted at the election, and whose vote county, Tex., prior to February 1, 1907, for 1906, but I did not pay a city poll tax for the year 1906." The twenty-fourth assignment of error complains of this finding of the court and of its counting Tugwell's vote for prohibition. The assignment is sustained, for, according to his own testimony, his vote was illegal, and should not have been counted at all. McCormick v. Jester, supra.

17. The fifteenth finding of fact by the trial court is as follows: "I find that John Parr was living with his parents in Greenville, Tex., until January 1, 1906, and for several years prior to said date; that about January 1st or 2d he left Greenville for Sulphur, Okl., to work; that he don't remember the exact day he left Greenville for Oklahoma, but according to his best recollection it was January 2, 1906; that when he left for Oklahoma he didn't know just how long he would stay there; that he was looking for work; that he came to Amarillo on the 7th day of July, 1906, from Oklahoma; that he was past 21 years of age on January 1, 1906; that he did not pay any poll tax for the year 1906 to Hunt county; that said voter was a single man, and between the age of 21 and 60 years, on December 3, 1907, but is not attacked on the ground of failure to pay Hunt county his poll tax." John Parr was one of the five persons mentioned in appellants' eighteenth ground of contest as voting for prohibition, who were alleged to have owed a poll tax to the county of Potter and state of Texas for the year 1906 and failed to pay the same. It is urged by the twenty-fifth assignment of error that the finding of the court, above copied, shows that he was an illegal voter, in that he was due a poll tax to the state for the year 1906, and that he never paid the same as required by law, and that the court erred in counting his vote for prohibition. The finding, as well as the testimony, did show that he owed, and never paid, the state of Texas his poll tax for that year. We think that proof of this fact was, under the allegations in appellants' ground of contest, sufficient to show that his vote was illegal and should not have been counted; for, though the proof did not show that he owed a poll tax in the county of Potter, it did show that he owed it to the state of Texas, as alleged. It was not essential to prove that he owed a poll tax to both the state of Texas and county of Potter, and failed to pay the same, in order to render his vote illegal. The proof that he owed it to the state and had not paid it was sufficient to render his vote illegal, and it should have been rejected on that account. Therefore the assignment of error is sustained.

18. A. C. Parr is another man who voted for prohibition at the election, whose vote is charged to be illegal because he had not paid his poll tax. The finding of the court upon this issue is as follows: "I find that A. C. Parr moved to Amarillo, Potter county, Tex., on January 19, 1907, from Hunt county, Tex., where he had resided for seven years; that he had paid his poll tax to the county of Hunt for the year 1906 prior to the 1st day of February, 1907; that he concluded there was going to be no election during the year 1907, and thinking he would not need them again, destroyed his poll tax receipts about six weeks prior to the election on December 3, 1907; that he had carried these receipts in his pocket until this time; that said voter was on December 3, 1907, between the age of 21 and 60 years." Parr's testimony upon the question is as follows: "I was between the ages of 21 and 60 on January 1, 1906, when I lived in Greenville, Hunt county, Tex. I came to Potter county January 19, 1907. I had my state and county poll tax receipt for 1906 paid for, and took same out before February 1, 1907; and about six weeks before the local option election I got discouraged and did not think we would have any local option election and decided we were not going to have any, so I burned up the receipts. I voted in the local option election in Potter county, December 3, 1907. I voted in precinct No. 1." The twenty-sixth assignment of error complains that the court erred in not finding that he was an illegal voter. While we are inclined to think that Mr. Parr got discouraged and burned up his poll tax receipts too soon, yet, if he made the affidavit required by section 71 of the Acts of the Twenty-Ninth Legislature as must be presumed in the absence of anything to the contrary, we are not prepared to say that his vote was illegal and wrongfully counted.

19. The twenty-seventh assignment of error is as follows: "The trial court erred in his finding of fact No. 18, wherein he fails to find that J. M. Young was an illegal voter, for the reason that the evidence introduced on the trial showed that said voter owed a state and county poll tax to Tarrant county, Tex., for the year 1906, which he had not paid prior to February 1, 1907, and it also showed that said voter voted for prohibition in the election in controversy and that his vote was so counted, which finding was duly excepted to by appellants." We believe that the finding of fact referred to in the assignment shows, as a matter of law, that Young, if a citizen of 12 months' residence in the state of Texas when he voted at the election in question, was due a poll tax to the state of Texas and Tarrant county for the year 1906, which was never paid, and that, therefore, his vote should have been rejected by the trial court in determining the result of the election.

20. The thirtieth assignment of error complaints of the court's finding that J. M. Neeley was a legal voter, and that his vote, cast for prohibition at the election, should be counted. It is undisputed that Neeley never paid a city poll tax to the city of Amarillo for the year 1906. His own testimony shows that he lived with his family in the town of Amarillo on the 1st day of January 1906; that his family has resided in that city ever since; that, though he owns a ranch which he considers his home, he had never lived on it since he first moved to Amarillo; and that he had always voted in said city. Section 4 of the election law provides that the residence of a single man is where he usually sleeps at night, and that of a married man is where his wife resides, if he be not permanently separated from her. If, therefore, it can be inferred, from his speaking of his family, that he had a wife residing with it, then his residence, under the law, was in Amarillo. If the inference cannot be drawn from his testimony that his wife was living, then he must be regarded as a single man; and, in that event, his residence was in Amarillo on the 1st of January, 1906, for the inference is clear that he usually slept there at night. So, in either event, his residence, in contemplation of our election laws, was in the city of Amarillo on January 1, 1906, for under such law one's residence must be actual, and determined by actual facts, and not by the intention of the voter. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the assignment is well taken.

21. The evidence does not show, as is contended by appellants in the thirty-first assignment of error, that J. G. Fondren, who voted at the election for prohibition, had not paid his state and county poll tax, to which he was subject, prior to the 1st of February, 1907. As to this matter there is no evidence one way or the other, and the presumption must be indulged, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that he produced the proper evidence before the judge of election that he had paid such tax in accordance with the law, or else he would not have been permitted by them to vote at such election. From the evidence it is questionable whether he owed a poll tax to the city of Amarillo for the year 1906, and, in deference to the finding of the trial judge, we conclude that he was entitled to vote at the election, and that his vote was properly counted.

22. It is insisted by the thirty-second assignment of error that the court erred in finding W. L. Barnes was a qualified voter at the election in controversy, for the reason that the evidence shows that he had not resided in the state of Texas 12 months prior to casting his vote. The evidence shows that Barnes came to Texas in April, 1906, and that he resided in Potter county from that time until the election was held.

siding in Texas. The fact that he did actually reside in the state 12 months and in Potter county 6 months prior to casting his vote, and, being a citizen of the United States and possessing the other qualifications necessary to make him an elector, he was, under the Constitution and laws of the state, entitled to vote at said election.

23. We cannot sustain appellants' thirty-third assignment of error, which complains that R. H. Stone was not entitled to vote at the election, because he had not resided in Potter county 6 months prior to casting his ballot. The evidence shows that Stone, prior to January 1, 1906, resided in Hemphill county, Tex., and that he paid his state and county poll tax for that year in said county; that he has lived in Potter county since March, 1907; and that his family moved from Canada, and arrived in Amarillo, on the 4th day of June, 1907, and resided there ever since. As the election was held on the 3d day of December, 1907, even if the time of his residence should be estimated from the date of the arrival of his family in Amarillo, this evidence shows that he had resided in said city exactly 6 months when he voted at the election, and was, therefore, a qualified voter under the Constitution and laws of this state. Black on Interpretation of Laws, p. 162.

24. It is contended by the thirty-fourth assignment of error that W. A. Watkins, who voted at the election for prohibition, was a foreigner, and had never complied with the federal naturalization laws, and that he was at an age of between 21 and 60 years on January 1, 1906, and resided in the city of Amarillo and had not paid his poll tax to the city for that year. The evidence is sufficient to warrant the finding of the trial court in regard to his having declared his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States in accordance with the federal naturalization laws and had resided in the state one year next preceding such election. There was no finding of the trial court upon the question as to whether he was due and had paid a poll tax to the city of Amarillo for the year 1906, nor is it shown by appellants' brief that the court was requested to make a specific finding on such question. Therefore the assignment is overruled.

25. The finding of the trial court that E. C. Jeffries, who voted against prohibition at the election, resided in voting precinct No. 5 of the city of Amarillo, and cast his vote in precinct No. 1 on the day of the election, is assailed by appellants' thirty-fifth assignment of error, upon the ground that the legality of his vote was not attacked on account of his voting in a precinct different

No. 5, and should have voted in said precinct No. 5," is found in appellee's reply to appellants' ground of contest. This is a complete answer to the assignment, and demonstrates that it should be overruled.

26. In its conclusions of fact the court found that H. R. Jack, who voted at the election in Amarillo for prohibition, was an illegal voter, because he failed to pay his city poll tax. This finding is objected to by the thirty-sixth assignment of error upon the ground that his vote was not challenged by the appellee for nonpayment of his poll tax. In appellee's reply to appellants' ground of contest, Jack's name appears among a number of others immediately preceding this allegation, "each and all owed and did not pay the city poll tax to the city of Amarillo, Potter county, Tex., for the year 1906." This is conclusive against the assignment.

27. Appellants' thirty-ninth assignment of error is as follows: "The trial court erred in his finding of fact No. 46, wherein he found that one ticket with the number 87 on it and one ticket with the number 376 on it were legal tickets, and should be counted, for the reason that in voting box No. 1 two tickets were found folded together, both reading for prohibition, the number 87 being on the one folded on the outside, while there were two other tickets found in the same box, both reading for prohibition, with the number 376 on the ticket folded on the outside, and the evidence shows that one each of said tickets was counted for prohibition, which finding of fact was duly excepted to by appellants." The proposition advanced under it in appellants' brief is: "Where tickets are found in the ballot box folded together, none so folded can be counted. All must be rejected." It will be perceived that no complaint is made in the assignment of the two votes bearing the numbers referred to being counted, nor is it even asserted in the assignment that they were counted. The assignment, without stating any ground, simply complains of the court's finding of fact No. 46. An examination of the statement of facts fully supports the finding of the trial court complained of by the assignment, and, as the proposition asserted cannot be deduced from the assignment of error, it will not be considered.

28. The forty-seventh finding of fact of the trial court is as follows: "I find that box No. ——— contained a ticket which was torn in three pieces, which pieces fitted together perfectly and made a complete ticket of the ordinary size, bearing upon the back thereof the number 332, and read 'for prohibition'; that said No. 332 appeared on the poll list opposite the name of W. A. Blank." The fortieth assignment of error complains of this assignment, and asserts the proposition that a ballot mutilated or torn to pieces cannot be counted. We hold with appellee in his counter proposition, which is that, when a torn ballot can be so placed together as to show beyond doubt its number and for what it was voted, it does not lose its validity simply because it is torn, and should be counted. It does not appear from the evidence that the ballot was torn before it was counted by the election officers, and the rule seems to be that, where a ballot appears to have been mutilated, it will be presumed to have been done after it was counted by the election officers, as it must be supposed that they know, and will perform, their duty. 15 Cyc. 365. The ballot is to be construed in the same way as any other written or printed document, and the construction must be such as to give effect to the voter's intent, if it can be ascertained from the face of the ballot. No court would hold a written or printed document, torn as the ballot in question was, inexpressive of its maker's intent simply because it was found torn in such a manner after its execution and delivery; nor can we perceive why a different holding should be made in regard to the ballot in question.

29. The trial court's fourth conclusion of law, which is as follows: "Of the voters who voted 'against prohibition,' and the legality of their votes challenged by contestee, all were legal voters except the following voters, which were illegal, and their votes should be deducted from the total vote cast 'against prohibition,' to wit: W. H. Baggett, Chas. De Wolf, Geo. Cole, H. R. Jack, and E. C. Jeffries"—is assailed by the forty-third assignment of error for the reason that under the pleadings and proof introduced on the trial the voter of each of the votes named in the conclusion of law was legal, and the votes should have been counted against prohibition. This assignment, in so far as it questions the court's conclusion as to the legality of the votes of Jeffries, De Wolf, Cole, and Jack, is, in effect, disposed of by what we have said in passing upon the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and thirty-sixth assignments of error, in which, as is before seen, we have held that the votes of those four were illegal and properly rejected by the trial court. There seems to have been no complaint of the trial court's finding of fact, upon which the conclusion of law is based, that Baggett's vote was illegal, and for that reason should not be counted. Therefore such finding, which is as follows: "I find that W. H. Baggett was not 60 years old until February, 1906, and that he did not pay a city poll tax, nor a state and county poll tax, for that year, but voted on an affidavit of over age; that said voter had resided in Amarillo, within the corporate limits of said city of Amarillo, for several years prior to December 3, 1907, and find him an illegal voter for failure to pay poll tax for the year 1906"—must be regarded as conclusive of the fact stated therein. The conclusion of law of the trial court, as to the legality of his vote, logically attaches to the fact found in the conclusion stated. The assignment of error is overruled.

30. Under the forty-first, forty-fourth, and forty-eighth assignments of error is asserted this proposition: "Where it is shown that coercion, intimidation, and unlawful arrests have been made on election day in close proximity to the polls, from voting, and the result of the election was very close, and where it was further shown that gross irregularities and errors existed in the count, in the casting of ballots, in the determination of the result, and in the general conduct of the election, from all of which it would be impossible to arrive at a correct result if the election had been legally held, it is proper to set aside such election and to order a new election; and a failure to do so is error." In view of the evidence and findings of the trial court, we are not prepared to hold that this proposition is sustained in its entirety by the record, or to such an extent as would authorize this court to declare the election void. There was, however, to our minds evidence of fraud, or at least gross irregularities suffered, if not committed, by officers charged with the duty of holding the election in accordance with the law. While such evidence is not so conclusive as to authorize us to set aside the conclusions of fact found by the trial court upon the matters to which the proposition quoted relates, the record shows, at least, such irregularities as justify us in animadverting upon the manner in which it was held and conducted. In doing so, we will say that if, when blind fanaticism runs riot and greed of traffic corrodes and corrupts, the officers charged with the duty of presiding over and conducting elections fail to administer and enforce the law, it is in vain that the great statesman, whose illustrious name is given to our election laws, labored in his old age to maintain the purity of the ballot, upon which depends the perpetuation of our republican institutions. The bands of social organism will be loosened when we fail to maintain the purity and sanctity of the ballot, and anarchy, like another blind Samson, may grapple and pull down the pillars of state, and bury the best government the world ever saw beneath the ruins of the temple, which the hands of patriotism erected to perpetuate.

31. It does not appear, from the statement subjoined to the proposition under the fiftieth assignment of error, that specific findings were requested by appellants upon the matters that the assignment complains of the court's failing to find. It would seem, however, from the action of the court, complained of by the eighteenth assignment of error, hereinbefore considered and disposed of, show the existence of the facts, which they now contend that the court should have found, was excluded upon objection of the appellee, which we held to have been erroneously sustained.

This brings us to appellee's cross-assignments of error. Appellants contend that they should not be considered, because the appellee did not except to the findings of fact and conclusions of law with reference to the votes which are claimed by the cross-assignments to have been illegal. As is said in Hahl v. Kellogg (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 391: "It is settled by an unbroken line of authorities that it is not necessary to take exception to findings of law and fact, when there is a statement of facts in the record, in order to review them on appeal"—citing Voigt v. Mackle, 71 Tex. 78, 8 S. W. 623; Smith v. Abadie (Tex. Civ. App.) 67 S. W. 1077; Brenton & McKay v. Peck (Tex. Civ. App.) 87 S. W. 903.

1. The first of these cross-assignments complains that the court erred in not finding that D. H. Greer was an illegal voter, inasmuch as he had not been a resident of the state of Texas for one year and of the county of Potter for six months prior to December 3, 1907. The evidence shows that Greer came, with his father, to Amarillo on June 4, 1906; that he was 21 years old in October, 1907; that he remained in Amarillo, and his father returned to Tennessee; that it was the understanding, when his father left for his home in Tennessee, that D. H. Greer should remain in Amarillo; that his father returned to Amarillo in March, 1907, with his family, and resided there thereafter. As young Greer, with the consent of his father, remained in Amarillo from the date of his arrival there up to the time of the election, in our opinion, it made him a resident, in contemplation of our election law, of the state of Texas for 12 months prior to the time he voted, and that the court, therefore, properly held that he was a qualified voter.

2. The second cross-assignment complains that the court erred in failing to find Phil Denitz, who voted at the election against prohibition, an illegal voter, in that he owed and did not pay a state and county poll tax for the year 1906 prior to February 1, 1907. The evidence, to our mind, clearly shows that he was due such poll tax for the year 1906, and that he failed to pay it within the time required by law to entitle him to vote at the election. The assignment is therefore sustained.

3. The third cross-assignment complains of the court's failure to find J. C. Storm, who voted for prohibition at the election, disqualified from voting because he did not pay a poll tax for that year. The assignment is therefore overruled.

4. The fourth of these cross-assignments complains that the court erred in failing to find that the vote of C. A. Fisk, who voted against prohibition at the election, was an illegal voter, for the reason that he owed and did not pay a state and county poll tax to the county of Grayson for the year 1906. The evidence shows that, Fisk moved, with his family, from Grayson county, Tex., to Amarillo, Potter county, Tex., on the 27th day of February, 1906, and that he paid his poll tax, state, county, and municipal, for the year 1906, in Potter county in January, 1907. He was, however, on the train going to Amarillo on the 1st day of January, 1906, and made arrangements to move to Amarillo on the 6th day of January of that year. We are not prepared to say, under these facts, that Fisk was not, under the Constitution and laws of this state, a qualified voter at the election, especially as the evidence fails to show that a county poll tax was levied (which, under the Constitution and laws, is not mandatory, but merely permissive) by the county commissioners' court of Grayson county for the year 1906. He did pay his state poll tax within the time required by law, and it would seem that it is immaterial, so far as it affects his qualification as an elector, whether he paid it in Grayson or Potter county.

5. The fifth cross-assignment complains of the court's failure to find that Sam Snyder, who voted against prohibition, was not a legal voter. The evidence shows that Snyder was born in Denton county, Tex., in November, 1884; that he resided in Amarillo, Potter county, on the 1st of January, 1906; that he did not pay a state and county poll tax for that year anywhere or at any time. He testified that he was exempt from such tax because he belonged to the National Guards, and had been a member of the troop to which Mr. Golding belonged since 1905, and is still a member of the same, and that he voted against prohibition. If, as a member of the National Guards, he was employed in the service of the army of the United States, he was not, under our Constitution, entitled to vote at all; and if he was not employed in such service, under section 2, art. 6, before quoted, of the Constitution, he could not legally vote at the election, if he had not paid at least his state poll tax within the time prescribed by law. Therefore the assignment of error is well taken.

6. The sixth, which is the last, cross-assignment of error, complains that the court erred in finding the vote of Carl Zapp, which was against prohibition, legal, and in not de-seems from the testimony of Jos. Astrican, which is based entirely upon what he heard Zapp say, that Zapp was a German and came to the United States of America when he was 5 years old, and had resided ever since in the United States, and that he had never taken out naturalization papers. As a man is a citizen of the country to which his father owes allegiance, it was incumbent upon the appellee to show that Zapp's father was not a citizen of the United States during his son's minority. The evidence, in our opinion, is not sufficient to prove such fact. Therefore the assignment of error is overruled.

Finis. In view of the record and these conclusions, the question presents itself: What should be the disposition of the case on this appeal? The recount before the county commissioners' court of the vote cast at the election in question resulted in that court's finding that the total number of votes cast at the election was 943, 479 of which were for prohibition and 464 against prohibition, making a majority, according to the finding of that court, of 15 votes in favor of prohibition. On the contest of the election before the trial court, it was found that 8 of the votes counted by the commissioners' court for prohibition were illegal and should not be counted. This would leave a total vote of 935 cast at the election, of which 471 were for prohibition and 464 against prohibition, leaving a majority in favor of prohibition of 7 votes. In reviewing the findings and conclusions of the trial court, this court has held that 4 of the votes cast for prohibition and 2 of the votes cast against prohibition were illegal, making 6 more votes which should not have been counted, which makes a total legal vote cast and entitled to be counted at the election of 929, of which 467 were for prohibition and 462 against, leaving a majority in favor of prohibition of 5 votes.

This would require an affirmation of the judgment, were it not for the errors, indicated in this opinion, in the trial court's rulings upon appellee's exceptions to appellants' pleadings, and in sustaining objections to testimony offered by appellants upon issues involved in this contest. On account of such errors the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial in accordance with this opinion.

On Rehearing.

Both parties have filed motions for rehearing in this case.

The appellants in their motion insist that we failed to consider and dispose of the forty-seventh and forty-ninth assignments of error, and request us to file conclusions of law and fact as to the questions they involve. The first of these assignments was, thought and still think that, inasmuch as the court sustained appellee's exception to that part of appellants' pleadings which challenged the legality of the votes of the parties whose names are mentioned in the assignment, there were then no pleadings in the case which authorized the trial court to pass upon the question of fact as to whether or not such parties were qualified to vote at the election; and, being of such opinion, we deemed we were without authority to pass upon a question of fact that the trial court had cut itself off from passing upon by sustaining exceptions to the only pleading which sought to bring such fact in issue. Where a judgment is reversed, the Court of Civil Appeals cannot render judgment for the other party based upon evidence not admitted on the trial, but must remand the case to the trial court. Eldson v. Reeder (Tex.) 105 S. W. 1113; Brazelton v. Campbell (Tex. Civ. App.) 108 S. W. 771. Nor, when a judgment has been reversed because an exception has been erroneously sustained to pleadings, can a judgment be rendered on appeal upon evidence which would have been admissible under the pleadings if the exceptions had not been sustained. Therefore the only consideration that could be given the forty-ninth assignment of error was involved in the disposition of the third.

But it is insisted by the appellee that we erred in sustaining appellants' third assignment of error; the insistence being that section 23 of the Terrell election law is an additional limitation to that fixed by the Constitution on the right of suffrage. The basis for this contention, as we understand it, is that inasmuch as section 2, art. 6, of the Constitution specifically enumerates the classes of persons who shall not be allowed to vote, it is beyond the legislative power to add to it any other class or classes of persons among those to whom the elective franchise is granted by the Constitution. This is undoubtedly correct; for unquestionably the Legislature could not place bald-headed, bow-legged men, or any kind of men, among the classes who are inhibited by the Constitution from voting. But it does not follow that section 23, referred to, places any one in the prohibited class. On the contrary, it clearly appears that it does not; for it recognizes their right to vote, and simply prescribes what shall be done to entitle them to exercise the right. It is no more a limitation of the right given by the Constitution to the class mentioned in the section to vote than are other sections of the act upon the right of those subject to the payment of a poll tax who shall have paid such tax before he offers to vote. Every one, under the would logically follow that the entire election law is void.

It is further contended by appellee that we erred in sustaining appellants' second assignment of error, and in doing so are in conflict with the cases of Oxley v. Allen (Tex. Civ. App.) 107 S. W. 945, and Hash v. Ely (Tex. Civ. App.) 100 S. W. 980. In the latter case the question of the effect of a failure to comply with section 64, regarding the time of opening and closing the polls, of the Terrell election law, upon an election, does not seem to have been involved. In the first, the petition alleged that the election was illegal because the polls at one of the voting boxes were closed at 6 o'clock and not kept open for the time required by law, to wit, until 7 o'clock p. m., and thereby a large number of voters were deprived of the privilege of voting, which would have changed the result and have rendered the same doubtful. In passing upon an exception to this part of the petition the court said: "We do not think that the court erred in sustaining the exception * * * because * * * the number and names of the persons who, it is claimed, were deprived of voting at said election, were not alleged, nor was any excuse offered for failing to state them; nor is it alleged that the result would have been materially changed by the reason thereof, but only that it would have changed the result." It will be seen from our statement of the allegations of plaintiffs' petition, to which exceptions were sustained in the present case, that they are essentially different from those in that case. In this one the polls were not opened until 11 a. m., and were closed at 4 p. m. In other words, they were not opened until three hours had elapsed from the time the law prescribed they should have been, and were closed three hours before they should have been. Also the number of legally qualified voters entitled to vote in precinct 4 are stated, and it was alleged that a large majority would have voted against prohibition if the polls had been opened as required by law. It is true that the names of the voters are not stated, nor is it alleged who of those not voting would have voted against prohibition, or who of them would have voted for it.

The provisions of a statute as to the time of opening and closing the polls ordinarily are held so far directory that an irregularity in this respect, which does not deprive a legal voter of his vote or admit a disqualified person to vote, will not vitiate an election. Patton v. Watkins, 131 Ala. 387, 31 South. 93, 90 Am. St. Rep. 43; People v. Prewett, 124 Cal. 7, 56 Pac. 619; Cleland v.

of closing the polls was so great that it must be deemed to have affected the result, the election must be held invalid. People v. Hill, 125 Cal. 16, 57 Pac. 669; Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 101, 41 Pac. 454, 29 L. R. A. 673, 49 Am. St. Rep. 68; Banks v. Sergeant (Ky.) 48 S. W. 149; State v. Drake (Wis.) 53 N. W. 496. As is said in Tebbe v. Smith, supra: "The rule as to directory provisions applies only to minor and unsubstantial departures therefrom. There may be such radical omissions and failures to comply with the essential terms of a directory provision as will lead to the conclusive presumption that the injury must have followed. A substantial compliance with the terms of a directory provision is, after all, required. And a substantial compliance is not had by strictly following some provisions, while essentially failing to observe others. There must be a reasonable observance of all the prescribed conditions. It is the duty of the courts so far to adhere to the substantial requirements in regard to elections as to preserve them from abuses subversive of the rights of the electors; and under this view the question becomes a broader one than can be disposed of by answering that in the individual case no harm resulted. * * * In this case we are quite willing to believe that the misconduct of the officers of Lake precinct was prompted by nothing worse than ignorance and lack of appreciation of the responsibility of their positions, and we may say, further, for such is the evidence, that no harm is shown to have resulted from their conduct; but, looking to the purity of elections and integrity of the ballot box, we are constrained to hold that conduct like this [when the law required the polls to be open at sunrise and to be kept open until 5 p. m., and they were not opened until near 10 o'clock] amounts in itself to such a failure to observe the substantial requirements of the statute as must invalidate the election. And, while reluctant to so hold in this instance, we are confirmed in the opinion by consideration of the fact that any other interpretation would add grave perils to the safe conduct of our elections, which are already harassed by dangers enough." The court then holds that the votes of Lake precinct should therefore have been rejected.

It was, we apprehend, for the purpose of having the votes of voting precinct No. 4 rejected, for it was alleged that only 7 were polled there for and 3 against prohibition, that the allegations were made by plaintiffs in their petition. We have not been able to find any case where such a wide departure the polls can be kept closed nearly half the time they are required to be kept open, and the election upheld upon the ground that the statute, being simply directory, was substantially complied with, then the officers charged with the duty of opening and keeping open the polls may ignore the law and take their own sweet wills instead as the standard of duty. If this be so, a wider door to election frauds could not be opened—a door that the Terrell election law contemplates shall never exist in the structure of the election laws in Texas. When there is such a palpable violation of the law as is presented by that part of plaintiffs' petition, to which the court sustained the exception complained of by the second assignment of error, it cannot be expected of the party complaining of it to allege more than was done by the plaintiffs in this case; for it would be practically impossible for him to ascertain who of the qualified voters of the precinct would have voted, and how they would have voted, had there not been such a wide departure from the law. These matters would necessarily be enveloped in doubt; and it might well be doubted whether the electors themselves could say with any certainty whether they would have voted and on which side of the question they would have voted. We adhere to our original opinion on this question, and do not believe it is in conflict with either of the cases cited, as claimed by appellee, nor with any decision of any of the Courts of Civil Appeals, but believe it is fully sustained by principle and the weight of authority.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss any other of the questions raised by either of these motions, believing that they were all sufficiently discussed and correctly disposed of in our original opinion.

Both motions are overruled.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 14, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 12, 1909.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 195*)—DEFENSE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In trespass to try title, where it is uncontested that plaintiff is entitled to recover unless defeated by defendants' plea of limitation, the burden of establishing such defense is on defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 713; Dec. Dig. § 195.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 411*)—LEVY AND ASSESSMENT—TAX ROLLS.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 5098, requires persons rendering a list of taxable property to swear to the same; article 5103 directs assessors to make such lists made up from information furnished by property owners.

Appeal from District Court, Lynn County; L. S. Kinder, Judge.

Action by J. T. Lofton against J. R. Miller and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and judgment rendered for plaintiff.

Wm. J. Berne, for appellant. John R. McGee and Will A. Morriss, for appellees.

NEILL, J. On November 27, 1907, J. T. Lofton sued J. R., O. L., and J. K. Miller in trespass to try title to recover the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of survey No. 19, block No. 11, located by virtue of land scrip No. 636, issued to the East Line & Red River Railroad Company. The defendant answered by a plea of not guilty, and pleaded the five-year statute of limitation. The case was tried before a jury, who returned a verdict in favor of defendants on their plea of limitation; and this appeal is prosecuted from a judgment rendered in accordance with the verdict.

Under the assignments of error it is contended that the court erred in not peremptorily instructing the jury that defendants did not have title under the five-year statute of limitations, because there was no evidence that they or either of them paid taxes on the land for the year 1905, or that they paid taxes thereon for five years prior to the institution of this suit. This requires us to review the evidence upon the issue of limitation. It is uncontroverted that the plaintiff exhibited in evidence such title as entitled him to recover, unless defeated by defendants' plea of limitation. And for this reason the court instructed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff, unless it should find that his title was defeated by defendants' plea of limitation. The burden of establishing this defense was upon the defendants. In order to discharge this burden it was incumbent upon them to prove that they, or some of them, paid the taxes on the land for the year 1905; for the deed under which they prescribe was not executed until December 23, 1901, nor recorded until January 27, 1902, and, as stated, the suit was filed November 27, 1907. The abstract number of the survey is 218, its certificate number is 635, and its survey number is 19. The defendants are meant when words "Miller & Sons" are used in the statement of the evidence.

The witness J. R. Miller was asked by defendants' counsel this question: "Since you took possession of it [meaning the land in controversy], who has paid taxes on it?" which he answered as follows: "We [meaning J. K. Miller, O. L. Miller, and J. R. Miller] have paid said taxes, said taxes being for the years 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1907." On cross-examination he testified: "I did not pay in person the taxes for each of the years 1901 to 1907, inclusive. I did not in person pay the taxes on the land in controversy for the year 1905; my son paid them. All I know about them being paid for the year 1905 is what I know from my son's turning over the receipt for said taxes."

The witness here identified the receipt for the taxes of 1905, which is as follows:

Continuing, the witness said that all he knew about said taxes having been paid for the year 1905 is that his son told him that he had paid it, and had handed him said receipt. Thereupon plaintiff asked that said testimony as to the witness' son having told him that he paid the taxes for the year 1905 be struck out, because said testimony was hearsay and secondary. The objection was sustained, and the testimony struck out.

Another of the defendants, O. L. Miller, testified that he had paid the taxes on the land in controversy for the year 1905 to the tax collector at that time.

The witness, being on cross-examination shown this paper:

"I, O. L. D. 1905, and that I have true answers made to all questions propounded to me touching the same, so help me God.

"O. L. Miller.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me, this the 19th day of April 1905.

"A. S. Caughran,

—testified that he signed it, and that it was inventory of the property of Miller & Sons for the year 1905, and that it was his rendition of the property of Miller & Sons for that year; that part of the inventory had been sworn to by him—that part pertaining to the cattle rendered for taxes. On being shown the affidavit attached to the inventory, he admitted that it contained nothing as to his swearing to only a part of it.

Continuing, he testified that the way he came to render the property was that the assessor came to him, and that he made the rendition for the year 1905, and that it was for him, his father and brother; that, when he listed a part of the property for the year 1905 and signed the affidavit attached to the rendition, he was at home, and that when he signed the list or inventory the land now listed on it was not then listed thereon; that the reason it was not was because he thought the assessor could get the descrip-

Sons; that he did not tell him to put in the "W. half" on this survey; that the "W. half" of survey 19, block 11, in Lynn county, is neither owned nor claimed by J. R. Miller & Sons; that when he came to pay his taxes he found the tax rolls made out. On being handed the receipt above copied, he testified that it was the receipt for the 1905 taxes for Miller & Sons; that the receipt contained, among other items, the following: "Abstract 249, Cert. 636, Survey 19 E. L. R. R. Co., W. $\frac{1}{2}$, acres 320;" that said receipt was the only one for the taxes of Miller & Sons for the year 1905, and that when he went to pay the taxes he called for the amount that was due, paid said amount, and got the receipt for it; that at the time he took the receipt he made no examination of it; that some time afterwards, probably 12 months, he found out about this "W. half" being on the receipt; that he discovered the error about the time this controversy with Lofton arose; that his father took the tax receipt and discovered the error, and, the collector's attention being called to it, he, the collector, suggested its being changed, and did change it, and afterwards the collector changed it back so as to make it read as it did originally.

Caughran, the tax assessor, having identified the rendition sheet hereinbefore copied, testified that the description, "Abstract 249, certificate 636, survey 19, E. L. R. R. Company, original grantee, W. one-half, acres 320," was in his handwriting, and that it was written before the instrument was signed.

The county clerk of Lynn county, having produced and identified the delinquent report of the tax collector made for the year 1905, and approved by the commissioners' court, was asked to examine it and see if abstract 249, certificate 636, was mentioned in the report, and, after making the examination, answered that it was not.

We have thus recited practically all the testimony upon the question as to whether the defendants paid the taxes on the land in controversy for the year 1905.

In the case of Sharpe v. Kellogg (Tex. Civ. App.) 118 S. W. 401, in which substantially the same question was presented, it is said: "While payment of taxes is an act in pais, which may be proved not only by the record, but by the original receipt, or by any other evidence which satisfies the jury of the fact (Deen v. Wills, 21 Tex. 642; Watson v. Hopkins, 27 Tex. 642; Ochoa v. Miller, 59 Tex. 460; Allen v. Woodson, 60 Tex. 652; Cooley on Taxation [3d Ed.] 807), yet the question here is, Did the evidence introduced by plaintiff tend to show that Lowenstein paid the entry, and must depend upon the records in the assessor's office, and not on parol testimony or the private duplicates of the assessor. * * * The result of the whole is that, where the assessment wholly fails to lead to 'the identification, so that neither the owner nor the officer can tell that his land is taxed, the duty of the payment cannot be performed, and the assessment is void.' If this be so, then a fortiori it must be held that payment of taxes could not be made by the owner under an assessment shown by the records of the assessor's office, by the description in the tax rolls, to have been made upon entirely different tracts of land from those claimed by him, which is the case presented here. See, also, Wigmore on Evidence, § 1640. * * * Suppose the land in controversy had been sold for taxes under that assessment, would any one think for an instant that the sale vested a shadow of title in the purchaser at such sale? Again, suppose that the defendants, or those under whom they claim, who were the real owners of the land in controversy at the time, had seen on the records in the assessor's office the description of the lands as it appeared on the rolls, and had learned that the taxes had been paid for the year 1891 in accordance with such assessment, would any one contend that this gave them notice that their land had been assessed and the taxes paid upon it for that year by Lowenstein? No; on the contrary, it would inform them that the assessment and payment of the taxes were upon entirely different tracts of land—that described in the rendition, and on tax rolls. The best that can be made out of the evidence, in plaintiff's favor, is that his vendor who was in possession, intending to render the lots for taxes for the year 1891, through carelessness, rendered different tracts, and, intending to pay the taxes for that year on the land in controversy, paid the taxes on the land that was assessed in accordance with his rendition. He cannot in this manner, under the five-year statute of limitation, deprive the defendants of their property, for such deprivation would be without due process of law."

That case is hardly distinguished from the one in hand. True it is, that in this case the tax roll was not introduced in evidence, but the rendition sheet was, from which the law contemplates the tax roll shall be made. Articles 5098, 5103, 5126, 5127, Rev. St. 1895; Dutton v. Thompson, 85 Tex. 118, 19 S. W. 1026.

In the case just cited it is said by Chief Justice Stayton: "The purpose of these laws is manifest, and ought a person who has made a rendition of his property, presumably under oath, to be heard to say that he paid taxes on property in a given year, and then claimed it under a deed duly recorded, when his rendition shows that for taxpaying purposes he made no such claim? Ought it not rather be held that he paid taxes on what he listed, though it may have been his intention to pay taxes on some other land? If he had offered his tax receipts, they evidently would have shown that he paid taxes only on the land he rendered for taxation; for the tax roll, which is but a transcript of renditions, is the officer's warrant to collect taxes, and his receipt must, and will if it be true, describe the property on which taxes are paid as the same is described in the tax roll. Rev. St. arts. 4737-4741. If, under the renditions made by appellee, the collector of taxes had seized and sold any property of his to enforce the payment of taxes on the land in controversy, the sale would have been void, because the officer would have been without authority, on rendition of property as a part of section 180, to sell the property of appellee to satisfy taxes due on a part of section 182. Mere intention to pay taxes on the land in controversy cannot make that such a payment which was not so in fact, when tested by his rendition made by appellee."

Then, after citing a number of cases in its support, the opinion continues as follows: "Appellee's statement, that he paid the taxes on the land for the years enumerated, in view of his rendition, amounts to no more than an expression of an intention to pay on the land, and this cannot override the conceded fact that his rendition did not cover the land in controversy, and the further fact that the tax roll was the collector's warrant for demanding and receiving taxes. That paid must be held to have been paid under the assessment, in the absence of evidence other than such as appears in the record."

When the evidence in this case is viewed in the light of the opinions from which we have quoted, it appears as a matter of law that the defendants never paid taxes on the land in controversy for the year 1905. Therefore the judgment of the district court is reversed, and judgment is here rendered for appellant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Trimble County.
"To be officially reported."

Harry Mosser was indicted for manslaughter, and, from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the indictment and dismissing it, the Commonwealth appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. Breathitt, Atty. Gen., Tom B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Chas. H. Sanford, for the Commonwealth. D. H. Peak, Eugene Mosley, and Edwards, Ogden & Peak, for appellee.

SETTLE, C. J. The following indictment was found and returned against the appellee by the grand jury of Trimble county: "The grand jurors of the county of Trimble, in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Kentucky, accuse Harry Mosser of the crime of manslaughter, com-moniously kill Mattie Hensley by shooting the said Mattie Hensley with a gun and pistol, a deadly weapon, from which shooting and wounding the said Mattie Hensley died within a year and a day, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Kentucky." Appellee interposed a demurrer to the indictment, which the court sustained, and dismissed the indictment. The commonwealth excepted to this ruling, and from the judgment resulting therefrom prosecutes this appeal.

The Criminal Code of Practice (section 122, subsec. 2) requires that an indictment shall contain "a statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended; and with such degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment, on conviction according to the right of the case." Section 124 provides that the indictment must be direct and certain as regards "(1) the party charged; (2) the offense charged; (3) the county in which the offense was committed; (4) the particular circumstances of the offense charged, if they be necessary to constitute a complete offense." We do not think the indictment in question conforms to either of the foregoing sections. If the word "murder" had been substituted for the word "manslaughter" wherever the latter occurs in the indictment, and the words "with malice aforethought" had been added immediately following the word "feloniously" appearing therein, it would have been good as an indictment for murder, and under it the appellee might have been convicted of voluntary or involuntary manslaughter, if proof of the facts of the homicide had warranted the jury in finding him guilty of either instead of murder. But the acts charged in the indictment are not sufficient to make it good as to any of these offenses. Murder is the unlawful, willful, and felonious killing of another with malice aforethought, not in the necessary or apparently necessary self-defense of the slayer. Voluntary manslaughter is the unlawful, willful, and felonious killing, without previous malice, of another, in a sudden affray or in sudden heat and passion, not in the necessary or apparently necessary self-defense of the slayer. Wharton (10th Ed.) § 303; Mitchell v. Commonwealth, 88 Ky. 351, 11 S. W. 209; Roberson's Criminal Law, § 189. Involuntary manslaughter is the unintentional killing of another in the performance by the slayer of an unlawful act, or by the doing of a lawful act in an unlawful manner. The omission from the indictment of the word "voluntary" malice." In other words, as the indictment fails to charge that the homicide was committed by appellee in a "sudden affray or in sudden heat and passion," it fails to set forth the particular facts or circumstances that would make the homicide voluntary manslaughter.

Section 1150, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 3628), declares what punishment shall be inflicted for voluntary manslaughter, but does not define the crime. It is not therefore a statutory, but a common-law crime, and in determining whether the indictment is sufficient we must apply the common-law rules in effect adopted by the Criminal Code of Practice, which requires, as in subsection 2 of section 122, that the indictment shall contain "a statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended," and, as in section 124, by stating "the particular circumstances of the offense charged"; such circumstances being necessary to show a complete offense, it being apparent from the indictment itself that the grand jury were attempting to indict appellee for voluntary manslaughter.

The indictment is also far short of being a good indictment for involuntary manslaughter, as it fails to allege any facts from which it can be inferred the appellee was engaged in an unlawful act from which the homicide unintentionally resulted, or that it resulted from an improper or unlawful performance by appellee of a lawful act. It is true the indictment follows the form prepared by the Code commissioners, but, as the form does not conform to the provisions of the Criminal Code of Practice contained in sections 122 and 124, it, too, must be declared insufficient. Obviously, the indictment is not good as an indictment for murder, voluntary manslaughter, or involuntary manslaughter. It follows, therefore, that the demurrer was properly sustained.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

TRUMBO et al. v. PERSONS et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 30, 1909.)

MINES AND MINERALS (§ 66*)—LEASES—FORFEITURE—RECOVERY OF POSSESSION.

Where plaintiffs leased the mineral rights in certain land to defendants, on condition that, if the property was idle for 30 successive days, the contract should be void, plaintiffs, on breach of such stipulation, were not limited to an action of forcible detainer, or a bill in equity to cancel the lease for forfeiture, but could sue for possession.

against the persons and was sustained for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Edward F. W. Kaiser and J. W. Blue, for appellants. Moore & Moore, for appellees.

BARKER, J. The appellants (plaintiffs below), being the owners in fee of a tract of land in Crittenden county, Ky., which is described in the petition by metes and bounds, on the 21st day of February, 1907, leased the mineral rights therein to the appellees for a period of three years, and placed the lessees in possession. It is not deemed necessary to state all of the stipulations and conditions of the lease, except to say that among others it contained the following provision: "If the property lays idle for thirty successive days, this contract becomes null and void." Evidently deeming that the contract had become void by reason of a breach of the foregoing stipulation, the appellants instituted an ordinary action in the Crittenden circuit court for the recovery of the possession of the land, alleging themselves to be the owners and entitled to the possession thereof. The appellees (defendants below) filed an answer, admitting the ownership in appellants of the property, but denying the right of the latter to the possession, and setting up and relying upon the lease before mentioned in bar of appellant's right to recover possession. The appellants then by reply alleged the condition in the lease before set forth, and that the lessees had wrongfully permitted the property to lie idle for more than 30 successive days, and claimed that thereby the lessors became entitled to recover possession of the property. A general demurrer was filed to this reply, and sustained by the court, whereupon, the appellants declining to plead further, their action was dismissed.

There is nothing in the record to show the grounds for sustaining the demurrer to the reply; but it is said in the briefs that the court thought that the plaintiffs' remedy was by an action of forcible detainer, or by bill in equity to cancel the lease for forfeiture. We cannot agree to the soundness of either position. The lessees' right to hold the property was under the lease, and they could not rightfully retain possession of the property after wrongfully forfeiting the lease by breaking the stipulation for the continuous operation of the mine. The lessors had a right to treat the lease as null and void after condition broken, and sue for possession. When the lessees pleaded the lease, it was a sufficient reply that the condition upon which the lease was to remain valid had been broken.

We are of opinion that the court erred in

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 603*)—CONTINUANCE—GROUNDS—APPLICATION.

Where a prosecution for homicide had been twice continued while accused was being defended by attorneys appointed by the court when he employed counsel, and the attorneys appointed were permitted to withdraw, an affidavit by the counsel employed for a third continuance because he had not had time to become sufficiently acquainted with the case to undertake the defense, but failing to disclose how long he had been in charge thereof before it was finally called for trial, was insufficient.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 600*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF WITNESSES.

Where the attorney for the commonwealth permitted accused to read his affidavit for a continuance as the deposition of two absent witnesses, subject only to exceptions for competency and relevancy, the denial of the application was not prejudicial to accused.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McCracken County.

"Not to be officially reported."

George Freeman was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Graves and T. N. Hazelp, for appellant. James Breathitt, Atty. Gen., and Tom M. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BARKER, J. The appellant, George Freeman, was indicted by the grand jury of McCracken county charged with the willful murder of Essie Cobb. To this indictment he pleaded not guilty, but a trial by a petit jury resulted in his being found guilty as charged, and his punishment fixed at death. To review the judgment based upon this verdict he is in this court on appeal.

Briefly, the facts are as follows: George Freeman and Essie Cobb, both of color, were living in a state of concubinage in the city of Paducah. Freeman had a wife living in Metropolis, Ill. On the day of the tragedy Essie Cobb went into a restaurant and called for oysters, and was seated at a table ing Freeman fled, but, his flight having been observed by two policemen, they without knowing what he had done pursued and captured him. His defense, when placed upon trial, was that he was forced to kill his mistress in order to protect his own life.

The witnesses for the commonwealth who saw the tragedy all state positively that the shooting was done without cause or provocation; that the woman was not armed with a knife or any other weapon; that she was seated at the table when defendant came into the restaurant, and, as said before, the shooting was wanton and without provocation so far as appeared at that time. Both of the policemen state that, when they captured him and it was ascertained that he had shot his mistress, he gave as a reason for killing her that "she had too many men," and that he intended to "kill the whole bunch." Without going into the evidence in detail, it may be stated that the commonwealth's witnesses, if they were to be believed, established a most wanton and cruel murder without any extenuating facts or circumstances. In his own behalf the defendant stated that his mistress was jealous of his wife, and had said to him that she would kill him if he ever spoke to his wife; that he had awakened from sleep in the night, and found her standing over him with a drawn knife in her hand; that, when she observed that he was awake, she laughed, and he went back to sleep; that at the time he went into the restaurant and found her seated at the table as soon as she saw him she threw her hand into her bosom as if to draw a knife; that he knew she carried a knife, and, believing his life was in danger at her hands, he fired the fatal shots. He was also permitted to read his own affidavit as to what two absent witnesses would say if present. This evidence tends to corroborate his own. The jury believed the witnesses for the commonwealth, and disbelieved the testimony adduced in behalf of the defendant, as they had a right to do; and it is not for us to disturb their verdict in so far as it is based upon the testimony.

The appellant insists that the definition of the word "aforethought," as given in instruction No. 3, is erroneous. The definition is as follows: "The word 'aforethought,' as used in said instruction, means a predetermination to kill, however recently formed in the mind before the killing. This definition has been approved so often that we need not stop to cite the cases." The main contention of the appellant for reversal, however, is based upon the fact that the court refused to grant him a continuance when the ance of the case for further preparation on the part of the defendant. When next called on the docket, the case was continued upon the motion of the commonwealth. When called for the third time for trial, it appears that the defendant had employed counsel, and the appointed counsel were permitted to withdraw from the case. The employed counsel, T. N. Hazellip, filed his own affidavit that the defendant was not ready for trial, owing to the fact that he had not had time to become sufficiently acquainted with defendant's case to undertake his defense. Without citing the allegations of the affidavit, we deem it sufficient to say that the affidavit nowhere discloses how long he had been in charge of the case before it was finally called for trial, and his affidavit was wholly insufficient to authorize the court to continue the case for the third time. The defendant filed his own affidavit for a continuance based upon the absence of Albert Bozzer and G. W. Davis, but the commonwealth's attorney permitted the affidavit to be read as a deposition, subject to exceptions for competency and relevancy. Upon the trial the court permitted all the affidavit that was material or competent to be read as a deposition, and the defendant has nothing to complain of on this score.

Surveying the whole case, we think, without doubt, that the defendant had a fair and impartial trial, that no errors of law were committed to his prejudice, and that the jury were fully warranted by the testimony in reaching the verdict of guilty.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bourbon County.

"Not to be officially reported."

appellant, Russen Mann and Denis Dandou, for appellees.

LASSING, J. James W. Wright, Sr., died testate, resident of Bourbon county, Ky., on the 20th day of February, 1898. His will was duly admitted to probate. He had been twice married, and left surviving him his second wife and three children by her, and three children by the first marriage. By his will he gave to his children by his first wife nothing, but recited therein that he had given to these children their full share or portion of his estate. Mrs. Laura W. Bayless, a daughter by the first marriage, had for many years prior to her father's death been on such unfriendly terms with his second wife and two of her children that she did not visit at her father's home. She was very much dissatisfied with the will, in that it made no provision for her, and she and her husband took an appeal from the order of the county court probating her father's will, and proceeded to contest same. Summons was issued upon the appeal, and served upon James W. Wright, a son by the last marriage, and Isaac Wright, a son by the first marriage. Shortly after process had been served upon him, and upon the same day, James W. Wright met Mrs. Bayless, his half-sister, and a proposition was made and accepted whereby he obligated himself to give to his sister his note for $2,000, due and payable upon the death or termination of the widowhood of his mother, and secured by mortgage lien upon certain real estate, in consideration of which she ordered the suit contesting the validity of the will discontinued. This was on the 12th day of March, 1898. Thus matters stood until the 1st day of June, 1904, when James W. Wright instituted a suit in the Bourbon circuit court against his half-sister, Mrs. Laura W. Bayless, and her husband, in which he sought to have set aside and canceled the said note and mortgage for $2,000 executed by him to her on the ground that they were procured through the fraud and undue influence of his half-sister and her husband over him, and were without any consideration to support them. To this petition the defendants filed an answer in three paragraphs, the first of which is a traverse; the second, a plea of the statute of limitations; and the third a plea of estoppel. A demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer was overruled, and a reply was filed, in which the plaintiff stated that the fraud which had been perpetrated upon him was not discovered by him until within less than five years before the date of the institution of this suit. Upon the issues thus formed a mass of tes-

It appears from the testimony of appellant that he had a high regard for the business capacity of his brother-in-law, and was fond of his sister, the appellee, and that he visited her perhaps as many as eight or ten times during the course of a year. Considering that they lived in the same neighborhood, and were near of kin, this degree of friendship cannot be regarded as evidencing that appellee or her husband had or exercised a controlling, unusual, or undue influence over appellant. The record shows that Issac Wright, his half-brother, lived with his sister, the appellee, and it is urged that these visits on the part of the appellant to his sister's home were for the purpose of seeing and being with his half-brother as well as for the purpose of seeing his sister; but, be that as it may, it is certainly no evidence of undue influence on the part of his sister that she should have her brother visit her as often as the record shows appellant did, and, in fact, it would not have excited suspicion had his visits been much more frequent than they were. He is shown to be a man of average intelligence, fair education, and as much business experience as one of his years would be expected to possess. Further than his own testimony, the record fails to show that any influence, undue or otherwise, was exerted over him by either his sister, the appellee, or her husband. It is shown, however, by the testimony of appellant himself, that upon the occasion of almost every visit to her home she would discuss with him the relations which existed between herself and her father and his family, and would frequently state that her father had not done for her what she expected him to do, and that, if he did not make proper provision for her in his will, she would contest same. When she learned, after the death of her father, that no provision had been made for her in the will, and upon the very day it was first read to the family, she testifies that she again told appellant that she intended to contest it, and that appellant thereupon said to her if she would not do so he would give her $2,000; that, relying upon said promise, she permitted the will to be probated without objection; that thereafter, as her brother did not comply with his promise to her, she instituted a suit contesting the will by taking an appeal from the order of the county court probating same. Appellant denies that he made to his sister any proposition to pay her $2,000 if she would not resist the probate of the will, but he does admit that upon the very day that the appeal was taken he met his sister on the street near the post office in Paris, and told her that, if she would dismiss her appeal, he would execute a note for $2,000, and secure it by a mortgage, and immediate-missed in accordance with the agreement which she had upon that day made with her brother. At the time the agreement was reached and the mortgage executed, summons had been served upon but two of the defendants to the litigation, and the sheriff was directed by appellee Mrs. Bayless not to serve the summons upon the other defendants named therein. This fact is commented on at length by appellant's counsel, but the explanation which is offered concerning this conduct on her part is entirely reasonable and altogether natural; for, having adjusted the matter, it would have been a useless expense to have permitted the sheriff to go ahead and serve the remainder of the summonses. Thus matters stood for more than six years, during which time appellant made no complaint to his sister or anyone else, so far as the record discloses, which would indicate that he was dissatisfied with the settlement and adjustment which he had made with his sister; nor did he claim to them or to any one that he had been overreached, defrauded, or deceived by his sister or her husband. The execution of the note and mortgage was the free voluntary act of appellant, and the evidence utterly fails to support his claim to the contrary.

This brings us to the consideration of the further question as to whether or not there was a consideration for its execution. Much stress is laid by counsel for appellant upon the fact that the proof taken in this case failed to establish any evidence of lack of capacity on the part of the testator to make a will. This is true, but appellee was not limited in prosecuting her contest to the question of capacity alone, but it would have been her right to show that, although her father had sufficient capacity to make a will, yet he himself was overreached and unduly influenced by his wife or other members of his family or the conduct of his daughter or other cause to make the will in the way and manner in which he did; and the fact that appellee when called upon to testify in this case, after a lapse of nearly seven years, was unable to present a state of facts which would warrant an intelligent jury in overthrowing the will, cannot be seriously taken as evidence tending to show that the contest of her father's will was not instituted in good faith. Nor can the further fact that others of her brothers and sisters did not join with her in the proposed contest be accepted as militating against her honesty of purpose in instituting same. They may all have been satisfied with the provision which their father made for them. They may have felt that, although the division was not equal, still, it being their father's will, they would accept it without complaint. Unfortunately sons than he had with his daughters. He had given to his sons their property in fee, or at least a goodly portion thereof, while he had given to his daughters only a life estate. Appellee was very much dissatisfied with what her father had done for her; and this feeling was, no doubt, intensified and aggravated by the fact that she was not on friendly terms with her stepmother and other members of her father's household. It is but natural that she would attribute her father's treatment of her and his scant provision made for her as she regarded it to the exercise of some influence in his home which was operating to her detriment. That the contest over his will was not trumped up for the purpose of extorting money from her half-brother, he in his own testimony furnishes the most conclusive evidence, for he makes it plain that some time before her father's death she notified appellant that she had not received a fair portion of his estate, and that, if in his will she was not properly provided for, she would contest it.

The inequality of division furnished to her, if not a meritorious, certainly a sufficient ground to warrant the institution of the contest. As soon as he learned that the contest had been instituted, and, in fact, as soon as it was talked about, appellant busied himself to prevent it, and, whether he proposed to his sister to pay her the $2,000 as she says he did before it was instituted, he certainly took the initiative to have the suit dismissed at his earliest opportunity after it was commenced. He no doubt recognized the fact that his sister had not been fairly treated by their father in the division of his estate. She was a woman past middle life, and had no children; and, while her brothers could use the property received from their father as they saw fit, and make such disposition thereof as they desired, yet she, under the terms of the deed which he made to her, was limited merely to the use of her property, and was denied the right to make disposition thereof either by will or deed. He knew of the estrangement which had existed between her and other members of his father's family for many years, and whether he was actuated in making this settlement by a fear that the will might not be upheld, or by a desire to avoid having the breach in the friendship of the family circle widened, or for the purpose of avoiding and saving the expense which such a litigation must necessarily bring upon the estate, and particularly to him, it is immaterial. Any one of these grounds would have furnished a good and sufficient consideration for the contract which he made and entered into with his sister. She had a for a promise if there is any benefit to the promisor, or any loss or detriment to the promisee. It is not necessary that a benefit should accrue to the person making the promise. It is sufficient that something valuable flows from the person to whom it is made, or that he suffers some prejudice or inconvenience, and that the promise is the inducement to the transaction, and, in the matter of a benefit, a mere expectation or hope or a contingent benefit is sufficient, as, for example, the expectation of advantage or profit from the thing promised. Indeed, there is a consideration if the promisee in return for the promise does anything legal which he is not bound to do, or refrains from doing anything which he has a right to do, whether there is any actual loss or detriment to him or actual benefit to the promisor or not." In Pugh v. Barton, 7 Ky. Law Rep. 822, it was held that the dismissal of an action to recover land was a sufficient consideration for the execution of a note. And in Cobb v. Cowdery, 40 Vt. 25, 94 Am. Dec. 310, it was held that an agreement to settle and arrange matters to prevent a suit from being brought against a promisor was a sufficient consideration to uphold a contract. Instances of cases of this character might be cited almost without number, where the promise to do or forbearance from doing a given act which is not in itself illegal, or unauthorized in law, has been held to be a sufficient consideration to support a contract.

Being of opinion that the evidence in the case fails to support appellant's contention that the note and mortgage were procured through fraud or undue influence, and the dismissal of the appeal from the order of the county court probating the will being a good and sufficient consideration for the execution of the note and mortgage, it is unnecessary to consider the other questions raised upon this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

FORD LUMBER & MFG. CO. v. GRIGGS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 5, 1909.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 35*)—UNAUTHORIZED CUTTING OF TIMBER.

Where a third person bought a certain number of trees of plaintiff and sold them to defendant, who hired the third person and others to cut the trees, and they cut in addition other trees belonging to plaintiff, defendant was liable to plaintiff for the other trees so cut, though plaintiff did not own the land upon which some of them stood.

Action by L. E. Griggs against the Ford Lumber & Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. E. Moore, Jr., and Miller & Ward, for appellant. F. J. Eversole and P. T. Wheeler, for appellee.

NUNN, J. This action was instituted by appellee to recover $725, the alleged value of 145 poplar trees which he averred appellant and A. B. Asher had cut and hauled from two surveys of land, and which timber trees belonged to him. Upon the conclusion of the testimony appellee dismissed his petition as to Asher, and the jury, after being properly instructed, returned a verdict in favor of appellee for the sum claimed. Appellant claims that it is not responsible in this action, for the reason that A. B. Asher and his hands cut and hauled away the timber, and that it did not trespass upon appellee's land.

The testimony shows that Asher bought a certain number of trees from appellee and sold them to appellant, and that it employed Asher and a lot of hands to cut the trees; that they not only cut the trees which Asher purchased from appellee, but in addition cut the 145. Appellant does not deny having received these trees, and that it has not paid either Asher or appellee therefor, but makes the contention that appellee did not own the land from which 88 of the trees were cut. It is true that he did not own this land, but the testimony shows that he owned the trees. This was proved by appellee as well as by the owner of the land.

Appellant also contends that the verdict is excessive. It was shown by the testimony that a large number of the trees were 6½ feet in circumference at the stump, and would make 2 logs, each 14 feet in length. Appellant stated that the trees were worth $5 apiece. Asher stated that their value was about $2.50. We do not feel authorized to disturb the verdict of the jury on this question. The jury had a right to believe either witness on this question, and, in addition, the members thereof lived in that vicinity and probably knew the value of timber as well as either witness.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

CITY BONDS—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACT.

A city may tax its bonds in the hands of another; there being no express or implied provisions to the contrary, and hence no impairment of the obligation of contract of sale.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Logan County.
"To be officially reported."

Action between the Bank of Russellville and the City of Russellville. From an adverse judgment, said bank appeals. Affirmed.

S. R. Crewdson, for appellant. S. J. Browning, for appellee.

CLAY, C. Appellant, Bank of Russellville, is the owner and holder of $24,000 worth of bonds issued by the city of Russellville. The sole question involved on this appeal is whether or not said bonds should be taken into consideration in determining the value of appellant's capital stock for the purpose of taxation. The case arises on an agreed statement of facts. The court below gave judgment in favor of appellee, city of Russellville. From that judgment the Bank of Russellville prosecutes this appeal.

It is the contention of appellant: That appellee is without power to tax its own indebtedness; that, if this could be done, it would impair the obligation of its contract to pay the debt and interest contracted to be paid. This is not a case where the ordinance providing for the bond issue specially exempts the bonds from municipal taxation. It will not be necessary therefore to discuss that question. The bonds in this case have no such provision. They are simply obligations on the part of the city to pay certain sums, with certain interest, within a specified period.

An interesting case upon this subject is that of Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432, 24 L. Ed. 760. In that case the plaintiff was a resident of Bonn, Germany, and was the owner of $35,262.35 of stock issued by the city of Charleston. This stock was equivalent to municipal bonds. One-third of the interest due the plaintiff on the 1st days of April, July, and October, 1870, and January and July, 1871, having been retained by the city, he brought an action to recover the sums retained. The city sought to justify the retention of the interest by virtue of certain ordinances which it had enacted. By these ordinances the city appraiser was directed to assess a tax of two cents upon the dollar of the value of all real and personal property in the city of Charleston, for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the city government. It was further provided that the taxes assessed on city stock should be retained by the city treasurer out of the interest thereon when the same became due and payable. The court held that the levy and collection of the tax in the manner provided by the ordinances of the city of Charleston impaired the obligation of its contract, and gave judgment in favor of plaintiff. In discussing the question involved, the court uses the following language: "Is, then, property, which consists in the promise of a state, or of a municipality of a state, beyond the reach of taxation? We do not affirm that it is. A state may undoubtedly tax any of its creditors within its jurisdiction for the debt due to him, and regulate the amount of the tax by the rate of interest the debt bears, if its promise be left unchanged. A tax thus laid impairs no obligation assumed. It leaves the contract untouched; but, until payment of the debt or interest has been made, as stipulated, we think no act of state sovereignty can work an exoneration from what has been promised to the creditor, namely, payment to him, without a violation of the Constitution. 'The true rule of every case of property founded on contract with the government is this: It must first be reduced into possession, and then it will become subject, in common with other similar property, to the right of the government to raise contributions upon it. It may be said that the government may fulfill this principle by paying the interest with one hand, and taking back the amount of the tax with the other; but to this the answer is that, to comply truly with the rule, the tax must be upon all the money of the community, not upon the particular portion of it which is paid to the public creditors, and it ought besides to be so regulated as not to include a lien of the tax upon the fund. The creditor should be no otherwise acted upon than as every other possessor of money, and, consequently, the money he receives from the public can then only be a fit subject of taxation when it is entirely separated [from the contract] and thrown undistinguished into the common mass.' 3 Hamilton, Works, 514 et seq."

It will be observed that the facts of the above case differ from those of the case at bar. There the owner of the bonds was a nonresident, and the ordinance provided that the tax should be deducted from the interest to be paid by the city of Charleston, and that the owner should receive merely the balance. Here the bonds are owned by a resident of the city of Russellville, and have an actual situs in that city. They are not sought to be taxed by any arrangement by which the amount of the tax is deducted from the interest agreed to be paid. The bonds are sought to be taxed like any other property.

In the case of People v. Home Insurance

Co., 29 Cal. 533, the power of a state to tax its own bonds was sustained. The bonds, issued by the state and owned by a foreign insurance company doing business in that state, and deposited with a banker, were held to be property within the meaning of the revenue act. The court, in passing upon the question, said that the state had the power to tax its own bonds equally with other property, and that the exercise of such a power involved no violation of the contract.

In the case of Champaign County Bank v. William Smith, 7 Ohio St. 42, it was held that stocks or bonds of the state of Ohio, which were not expressly exempted from taxation either by their own terms or by the provisions of the laws under which they were issued, were subject to taxation by the Legislature. In discussing the question the Supreme Court of that state said: "One man invests capital in state stocks, as a source of income and profit to himself. From the same motives of interest, other capital is invested in the bonds of a private corporation, or the notes of individuals. These investments are equally taxed, as property, as sources of profit and income. The consequence is that the profit is diminished in both cases. This is an effect, but not the object of the law imposing the taxation. It contemplates no such purpose. As between the parties, the contract is left in full force; but the property invested, or acquired by the contract, is taxed, not by way of interference with the rights of the parties, as borrower and lender, but for the support of government, and the consequent protection and welfare of the whole community. No one doubts the power of the state to tax land within its territorial limits, whether held by direct grant from the state, or by title from a different quarter; and if the taxation of capital invested in state bonds impairs the obligation of a contract which contains no stipulation for exemption, upon what principle shall the taxation of bank bills, or corporation bonds, or the notes of individuals, be justified? The principle that, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, a sovereign state possesses the power of taxing all property held under it, and within its jurisdiction, is fundamental and essential to the very being of government. Property can only be acquired and held subject to this condition, and this infirmity of tenure furnishes the only adequate means for its protection."

And in the case of Phil. & Wil. R. R. Co. v. Maryland, 10 How. 393, 13 L. Ed. 461, Chief Justice Taney uses the following language: "This court on several occasions has held that the taxing power of a state is never presumed to be relinquished, unless the intention to relinquish is declared in clear and unambiguous terms."

There can be no doubt that the power of were property, and it held and owned by it were, under the charter of the city of Russellville and of the statutes of the state of Kentucky, subject to taxation. There is neither an express nor an implied contract on the part of the city of Russellville to surrender its power of taxation. The contract of purchase of the bonds was made subject to the taxing power. The imposition and collection of a tax upon the bonds cannot therefore impair the obligation of the contract, which was certainly made subject to the right of the city of Russellville to exercise the power of taxation.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

Action by Alabama Bowling against Nancy J. Bowling, wherein M. F. Bowling intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, intervenor appeals. Affirmed.

D. K. Rawlings, for appellant. Greene, Van Winkle & Schoolfield and J. W. Wright, for appellees.

LASSING, J. In October, 1897, J. S. Bowling and his wife conveyed to their daughter, Alabama Bowling, two small tracts of land. She was placed in possession following the execution of the deed and held the land until in March, 1903, when she sold same to Nancy J. Bowling. A part of the consideration was paid in cash, and purchase-money notes were executed for the remainder. No deed was executed at the time, but a bond for a deed was given instead; the deed to be executed upon the payment of the remainder of the purchase money. The notes matured, and, being unpaid, suit was instituted to enforce their collection and sell the land or a sufficiency thereof to satisfy the debt.

Defendant Nancy J. Bowling answered, admitting the purchase and sale, the execution of the notes sued on, and the delivery of possession of the land to her. She pleaded fur-vendor, Alabama Bowling, could not make her a good and sufficient title to the land, that the land which had been sold to her by Alabama Bowling had, together with other lands, been sold by the master commissioner of the Clay circuit court under an order of said court to one M. F. Bowling, and that a deed had been executed to him for his said purchase. She asked that said M. F. Bowling be made a party to the suit and required to assert any claim that he might have against said land, or renounce his right to do so. Upon being brought before the court, M. F. Bowling answered and made his answer a counterclaim. In this he alleged: That in March, 1897, J. S. Bowling, his grandfather, who, at that time, owned the land in question, together with other lands, conveyed these lands to himself and his brothers and sisters in consideration of love and affection; the said M. F. Bowling and those to whom the land was conveyed being the children of John E. Bowling, a son of J. S. Bowling. That, after the execution of this deed, the First National Bank of Pineville brought suit in the Clay circuit court against J. S. Bowling and the grantees in the aforesaid deed, in which it sought to have the same set aside as fraudulent, and the land therein described subjected to the payment of a judgment debt which it had procured against J. S. Bowling, etc., upon which there had been an execution issued and returned no property found. All of the defendants were duly summoned, but made no answer, and in March, 1898, judgment was rendered adjudging the deed fraudulent, and same was canceled. The land was adjudged to be in lien to the bank for the payment of this judgment debt, and a sufficient amount thereof was ordered sold to satisfy same. That, after the rendition of the judgment directing the land to be sold, he (M. F. Bowling) had paid various sums on said judgment, amounting in the aggregate to about $175; the last of said payments being in July, 1900. That by making these payments a stay or postponement of the sale had been procured. That the bank took no steps to enforce a sale of the land until in March, 1902, at which time the court ordered its commissioner to sell said lands, and in June following a sale was made, whereupon he (M. F. Bowling) became the purchaser of all the lands described in the deed of March, 1897, for the balance of the money due said bank, to wit, $180, interest, and some costs. The sale was in due time reported and confirmed, and in June, 1903, a deed was ordered and made to him. That he had been in the possession of all of said lands except the two small tracts described in the plead-

J. S. Bowling, had conveyed to his aunt, Alabama Bowling, the said two tracts of land set out in her petition. He stated that there was no consideration for said conveyance, and that same was made for the purpose of defeating the bank in the collection of its debt, and that in this way and manner the said Alabama Bowling became possessed of the land described in her pleading. He prayed for a writ of possession, and a decree adjudging him to be the owner of the lands described in the petition, under his commissioner's deed.

To this answer and counterclaim the plaintiff filed a reply, in which she admitted the execution of the deed by her father in March, 1897, but denied that it was made for the object and purpose of defeating the bank, denied that the defendant M. F. Bowling was entitled to said land or the possession thereof, and alleged: That the order of sale entered at the March term, 1902, of the Clay circuit court was procured by M. F. Bowling through fraud upon the rights of herself and his brothers and sisters; that the debt for which the judgment was rendered in March, 1898, was the debt of John E. Bowling, the father of said M. F. Bowling; that said J. S. Bowling was in fact merely the surety for him; that these facts were well known to M. F. Bowling, and after the judgment had been rendered he and his father undertook to satisfy same, and did, from time to time, pay the sums of money set up by said defendant in his answer and counterclaim; that M. F. Bowling pretended to pay said money in his own name, but that in fact his father furnished the money, and had the payments made in the name of his son for the purpose of covering up his property, defrauding others of his creditors; that the defendant M. F. Bowling was at that time and still is an unmarried man and lived with his father; that in March, 1902, in order to perpetrate a fraud upon her, the said M. F. Bowling procured and induced the bank to take the supplemental judgment and have the lands sold in satisfaction thereof in order that he might purchase same. She further pleaded: That in March, 1897, her father, who owned some 1,200 or 1,500 acres of land, undertook to make a partial allotment and division of same among his children, and that, his son John E. Bowling being heavily in debt, her father conveyed the portion to which the said John E. Bowling would be entitled to his children. That thereafter, and without any purpose to defeat the bank in the collection of its debt, which only amounted to $224, he and his children became dissatisfied with the division he had made, and he selected two housekeepers and lands, and in this said division they set apart to the children of John E. Bowling, one of whom was the defendant M. F. Bowling, all of the land which her father had described in the deed of March, 1897, except the two small tracts which were set apart to this plaintiff, Alabama Bowling, and which are the subject-matter of this litigation. That in this division the defendant M. F. Bowling and his father not only acquiesced, but actively assisted. They knew that J. S. Bowling and his wife conveyed these two tracts of land to Alabama Bowling in October, 1897, and some time during the spring following a deed was made to defendant M. F. Bowling and his brothers and sisters conveying to them the lands which the said commissioners had found to be their equitable share. That the said M. F. Bowling never made any claim whatever to the lands described in the petition, or asserted any right thereto until after he was made a party to this litigation, but had, all the time, recognized the same as the property of his aunt, the plaintiff, and during a part of the time both he and his father had rented a portion of the land and paid rent to plaintiff. That neither plaintiff nor her father paid any attention to the bank suit for the reason that they each regarded it as a debt which was properly chargeable to the interest in the estate of their father, which the children of John E. Bowling received from their grandfather. That the land which was sold in satisfaction of the $180 bank debt was in fact worth more than $1,500. And that the defendant M. F. Bowling, with full knowledge of plaintiff's title and possession, and his acquiescence in the transactions under which she became possessed thereof, had procured the sale of the lands in the way and manner in which he did, for the fraudulent purpose of procuring her land. She asked that his claim to so much thereof as was covered by the deed from her father to her be rejected.

The affirmative matter in this reply was traversed in a rejoinder. On the issues thus made proof was taken, and on final submission the chancellor found in favor of the plaintiff, Alabama Bowling, and dismissed the counterclaim of the defendant M. F. Bowling, from which ruling and judgment he prosecutes this appeal.

It is admitted that all of the land referred to in this litigation belonged, in March, 1897, to J. S. Bowling, that there was no consideration save love and affection for any of the conveyances which he made to his children and grandchildren, that he desired to divide his land among his children and grandchildren during his lifetime, and that such division should be equal. One of his sons, John

As evidenced by the pleadings, the first division was made in March, 1897. At that time the deed which was made to M. F. Bowling and his brothers and sisters contained two tracts of land, and included within which were the parcels in controversy in this litigation. In October following, for some reason not altogether clear, the land was divided again, and this time, before the deeds of conveyance were made, J. S. Bowling caused his lands to be surveyed and divided by commissioners especially selected and sworn for that purpose. Each of his children accepted the portions allotted to them, and were placed in possession thereof, and likewise the children of John E. Bowling were placed in possession of the portion set apart to them. In this allotment they were given the fee, while their father, John E. Bowling, was given a life estate; the deed to them being executed and delivered in April, 1898, after the judgment setting aside the deed of March, 1897, had been entered, and in this deed of April, 1898, the two small parcels involved in this litigation, and which had been included in the deed of March, 1897, were excluded. Appellant and his father were fully advised concerning this partition and allotment, and knew that appellee Alabama Bowling had been placed in possession of the two small tracts so allotted to her. They recognized her ownership and possession thereof from the date of the conveyance in the fall of 1897, until after the institution of this suit in January, 1905.

After the default judgment had been taken by the bank in this suit, in which it sought to set aside the deed executed in March, 1897, no further steps were taken by the bank to enforce this judgment until in 1902, during which time the debt had been reduced until there remained unpaid on same $180. These payments had all been made by M. F. Bowling, with the exception of one, which was made by John E. Bowling, in his name, but John E. Bowling had been quite active during this time in securing a stay of proceedings on the part of the bank. He and his son M. F. Bowling were living together, and at one time they had procured the assistance of J. S. Bowling in getting further time from the bank, even going so far as to induce him to pledge to the bank a collateral note for the purpose of securing said debt, and preventing a sale of the land in satisfaction of the judgment, and it is evident, from the conduct of John E. Bowling, and M. F. Bowling as well, that it was understood and agreed, at the time the deed from J. S. Bowling to the children of John E. Bowling was delivered and accepted in the spring of 1898, that this balance of the bank debt was to be paid, and this testimony on his part nowhere denied.

In 1902 appellant, M. F. Bowling, for the alleged purpose of securing himself in the money which he had theretofore paid on the debt, induced the bank to have its judgment executed, and the land which had been sold in lien to it to satisfy this judgment. This the bank proceeded to do. The land was appraised at $400. The proof shows that it was worth anywhere from $1,500 to $2,000. The plaintiff was not a party to the suit, either as originally brought or before the supplemental judgment was entered. Neither she nor her father paid any attention to the proceeding of the bank, for they each understood that was an obligation which was the duty and right of appellant and his brothers and sisters to satisfy; and this is especially true of plaintiff, Alabama Bowling, for the reason that she knew that her nephew, M. F. Bowling, had all along recognized her claim and right to the tract of land on which she was in possession, and it never occurred to her that the appellant was attempting to disturb her title or possession. With plaintiff and her father lulled into quiet inaction, he proceeded to have the decree of court enforced, and the land sold. He became the purchaser thereof for a mere pittance without advising either his grandfather or his aunt, the plaintiff, that he was desiring or attempting to disturb her possession, and, in fact, the whole proceeding was carried along on his part under the guise of securing him in the moneys which he had theretofore paid. He was not acting in good faith in thus attempting to purchase his aunt's property, as is further evidenced by the fact that, after having made his said purchase, he possessed himself of all the lands covered thereby save and except the two tracts which had been conveyed to her by her father. Now, had he been acting in good faith, when the deed was made to him by the commissioner, he would have taken his writ of possession and attempted to enforce his right; but, on the contrary, he takes his deed, but makes no effort whatever to secure possession of this property until after the lapse of two years, and he is brought into court and called upon to show cause why his claim thereto should not be rejected.

The rule that a purchaser at a judicial sale, when the sale has been confirmed and the deed made, takes by virtue of his purchase all the rights of the parties to the land conveyed to him, has no application to a case like that under consideration, for, while it is true that appellee acquired title to the property from her father, who was a party to the bank suit under which the land in question was sold, it is also true that appellant before and after the order of sale was entered, and before and after he became the purchaser at the commissioner's sale, and he knew that his aunt, the plaintiff, was not a party to that litigation, and he therefore is in no position to claim that the decree and deed conveyed to him the property of plaintiff, and that her claim and title thereto was void. If appellant had been attempting to perpetrate no fraud upon his aunt, the plaintiff, after he purchased the same, and with a knowledge that she was in possession of same, and claiming it under a deed, he would have filed exceptions to the report of sale after he became the purchaser, and had the question of her right and title decided by the court; but, as he failed to do so, he is not now in a position to complain because he was not put in possession of her land. He was not misled by the plaintiff or any one else at the time he bought it at the commissioner's sale. No fraud was perpetrated upon him, but, on the contrary, he, himself, was attempting to perpetrate a fraud upon his aunt, the plaintiff, in procuring the sale in the way and manner in which he did, and later, in receiving from the commissioner a deed for plaintiff's land, and then concealing from her the fact that he had done so until compelled, under process of court, to disclose the fact.

The chancellor, in adjudging that appellant had no right or claim to the two tracts of land described in the petition, reached a just, equitable, and proper conclusion, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. SUMMERS. (Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 5, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 276*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—DIRECTION OF PASSENGER TO WRONG TRAIN—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by a passenger for damages from being directed to a train which did not stop at her destination, instead of the proper one, which followed a few minutes later, testimony that her son had been directed to meet her on arrival of the train which did not stop, and that he did so, and, not finding her, returned home so that she was compelled to walk, was improperly admitted on the question of damages, since, if she had been directed to the proper train, her son would still not have met her.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bullitt County. "To be officially reported."

Action by Susan Summers against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Charles Carroll and Benjamin D. Warfield, for appellant. Nat. W. Halstead and Ben. Chapeze, for appellee.

CLAY, C. Appellee, Susan Summers, a lady 65 years of age, on Sunday, April 28, 1907, purchased of appellant's ticket agent at Union Station in Louisville, Ky., a ticket over its line of railroad to Gap-in-Knob, a station on appellant's railroad in Bullitt county, Ky., about 17 miles from Louisville. After purchasing the ticket she went in company with her brother to the gate through which passengers go in leaving the station to board trains. She presented her ticket to the gatekeeper, and claims that he told her to take the Bardstown & Springfield Accommodation train, which was known as train No. 91. In obedience to the direction of the gatekeeper, she, in company with her brother, approached train No. 91 for the purpose of boarding it, and the brakeman stationed at the door of the car looked at her ticket and directed her to take that train. From this time on the evidence is conflicting.

According to appellee, the conductor in charge of the train, shortly after it left Union Station, came to her, and she presented her ticket. He took it, looked at it, and said, "Gap-in-Knob." He then punched the ticket and went on collecting fares or tickets from other passengers. Some time before reaching the station on appellant's line known as "South Louisville," which is distant about three miles from Union Station, the conductor returned and told appellee that she would have to take her ticket back, that he would not stop at Gap-in-Knob, and that she would have to get off at South Louisville. She refused to accept the ticket, and he then told her she would have to get off the train. As the train approached South Louisville, he picked up her suit case and said: "Come on. You have got to get off." As she got off, the conductor directed the agent to take charge of her and flag some train and instruct the conductor thereof to put her off at Gap-in-Knob. The depot was locked or fastened, and she was compelled to remain standing on the platform about an hour until the arrival of the train upon from which she was ejected. He was there to meet her, but, finding that she was not on the train, returned home. When appellee reached Gap-in-Knob, she was compelled to walk over rough and muddy roads and to carry a suit case weighing from 40 to 50 pounds to her home, a distance of about a half mile. Owing to her excitement and mortification in being ejected from the train and being compelled to remain at South Louisville, and having to walk a distance of a half mile in the dark and carry a heavy valise, she was made sick and suffered a great deal for two or three weeks thereafter.

The testimony for appellant was to the effect that train No. 91, a Bardstown & Springfield train, and the one which appellee boarded, left for Bardstown at 6 p. m. Train No. 95 left for Bowling Green at 6:10 p. m., and train No. 93 left for Greensburg at 6:30 p. m. All of these trains ran over appellant's main stem from Louisville to points beyond Gap-in-Knob. Train No. 91 left the main line for the Bardstown & Springfield branch at Bardstown Junction. Train No. 93 left the main line at Lebanon Junction for Greensburg via Lebanon. Train No. 95, which ran to Bowling Green, ran the entire distance on the main line. These trains were all in the train shed at Union Station, Louisville, loading passengers at the time appellee passed through the gate and boarded Springfield train No. 91. On Sundays the Springfield train No. 91 did not stop at any point between Louisville and Bardstown Junction to let off passengers, and train No. 95, the Bowling Green train, did not stop at any point between Louisville and Lebanon Junction to let off passengers. Train No. 93, the Greensburg train, made all of the stops that were required to be made between Louisville and Lebanon Junction. Instead of taking train No. 91, appellee should have taken train No. 93. Appellant's conductor testified: That, as he was walking through the train on leaving Union Station, he found appellee about the middle of the ladies' car sitting on the west side of the coach. She presented a ticket for Gap-in-Knob. He told her: That they did not stop at Gap-in-Knob on that run; that it was a bad place to stop, a bad place to flag from; that if anything happened they couldn't get around that curve; that No. 93 made all the stops and followed No. 91 out of Louisville in 30 minutes; that she would have to get off in South Louisville and catch No. 93 out. He then passed on through the car, took up the rest of the tickets, then came back to where Mrs. Summers was, and explained to her the reason that they running into them from the rear. He further testified: That he was not rude or insulting or bolsterous in any way towards Mrs. Summers; that he knew her and all of her family.

Upon the conclusion of the evidence the case was submitted to the jury, which returned a verdict in appellee's favor for $1,000. From the judgment based thereon, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company prosecutes this appeal.

It is first insisted: That the court erred in permitting appellee and her son to testify to the fact that he had been directed to meet appellee on the arrival of the Bardstown & Springfield train, and to the further fact that appellee's son, after he had gone to that train and found she was not a passenger thereon, left the station, and upon her arrival she was compelled to walk to her home and carry a valise; that the court also erred in instructing the jury to consider these facts in determining the amount of damages to be awarded. Our conclusion is that appellant's contention is correct in both respects. The Bardstown & Springfield branch train did not stop at Gap-in-Knob on Sundays. If appellee and her son supposed it did, it was their mistake. The fact that her son failed to meet her, and she was therefore compelled to carry her valise to her home, was not due to any negligence on the part of appellant's servants in directing her to take the Bardstown & Springfield branch train, or in ejecting her from the train. If she had been directed to take the proper train, No. 93, he still would not have met her. Under the circumstances, then, it was error to admit such evidence and to predicate any right of recovery thereon.

It is next insisted that the court erred in permitting appellee to testify that the conductor, in a rough, rude, and insulting manner, told her to get off. The argument is made that such testimony is only an expression of opinion on the part of the witness; whereas, she should have simply testified to the facts and let the jury conclude therefrom whether or not the conductor's manner was rough, rude, or insulting. In the same connection it is contended that the facts of the case did not justify an instruction authorizing punitive damages. For the purpose of determining these questions, we give below the exact language of the witness: "Q. After the train had pulled out, shortly thereafter, while you were in Louisville, did the conductor, Ike Wright, come around? A. He came around as usual to collect the tickets. Q. Now, then, what occurred first between you and the conductor?

car. Q. Now, after that, did he come back to you before you reached South Louisville? A. Yes, sir; he came to me and says; 'Here take your ticket, I will not stop and put you off at Gap-in-Knob.' I said: 'What are you going to do with me?' He says: 'I will put you off at South Louisville.' I says: 'I won't take the ticket back. You've punched the ticket, and I bought it for Gap-in-Knob, and I won't take it back.' Then he, in a rough, rude, insulting manner, told me, said, 'You get off of here.' Q. Then what occurred there? A. We came nearer and nearer the depot. He picked up my baggage, and he says: 'Come on. You've got to get off.' He was mad. I didn't take the ticket back, I think, was the reason."

While we think it was proper to permit the witness to testify that the conductor's manner was rude or insulting, yet we are also of the opinion that, where the facts to which the witness testifies do not show that he was insulting in words, manner, or tone, a punitive damage instruction should not be given. We have carefully examined a number of cases wherein this court approved of a punitive damage instruction, and in every one of them facts were testified to showing that the railroad company's agents were rude or insulting. Thus in the case of Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Ballard, 88 Ky. 159, 10 S. W. 429, 2 L. R. A. 694, the conductor told the plaintiff, who was a woman, that, if she would not go on, she would have to get off the train and walk back. He waived his hand towards the door, and she went carrying a bundle and valise. He followed her to the door and stood on the platform without offering to assist her. The brakeman, who was on hand, offered her no assistance, but seemed to enjoy the situation. As she stepped on the ground from the coach, the brakeman grinned at her with a broad grin. Both he and the conductor seemed to enjoy her discomfiture. Other facts were testified to showing the conductor's tone of voice and manner towards her were insulting. In the case of Memphis & Cincinnati Packet Co. v. Nagel, 97 Ky. 8, 29 S. W. 743, the plaintiff, accompanied by another young lady, took passage for New Albany, Ind., on defendant's steamboat. When the boat approached New Albany, the porter came to her and asked her for her check, and told her to get her trunk ready to get off. She got ready, and on coming out of her stateroom found that the boat was opposite the New Albany landing and was making no effort to land there. She went to the front of the boat and told the captain that she wanted to land at New Albany. His answer was, "I thought you is." The plaintiff then said to the clerk, "You know I wanted to get off at New Albany," and he replied, "I never dispute a lady's word." There were other facts showing that the captain spoke roughly to her. The language of the clerk was an intimation that the plaintiff was not telling the truth, although, as a matter of fact, she was. In the case of Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Winslow, 119 Ky. 877, 84 S. W. 1175, the facts testified to showed that the brakeman abused the plaintiff, who was a passenger in a caboose attached to a freight train, and threatened to "knock a lung out of him." In the case of Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Fowler, 123 Ky. 450, 96 S. W. 568, and 107 S. W. 703, there was testimony that the conductor's tone of voice was harsh and his manner abrupt, and that he took hold of plaintiff's arm, roughly pulled her from her seat, and ejected her from the train, because she did not produce her ticket or tender her fare. Others present, however, did volunteer to pay her fare. On the other hand, this court, in the case of Southern Railway in Kentucky v. Hawkins, 121 Ky. 415, 89 S. W. 258, held that a punitive damage instruction should not have been given. In that case the party who was ejected from the train and brought the action testified as follows: "The conductor looked at it [the ticket] and said it was no good, that I could not ride on that. I asked him why, and he said the ticket wasn't any good. I told him that I got it the evening before and paid full fare for it. He still said it was no account, and I would have to pay my fare or get off. I told him that I couldn't pay my fare, that I didn't have any money. He said there wasn't any use in talking about it, and he pulled the bell cord and stopped the train. He walked in front of me, and when we got to the step he took me by the arm until I got down the steps. He did not get off the train. He helped me down to the bottom step, it seemed to me in a pretty rough way. He held me tolerably tight, but did not hurt me." In discussing the question this court said: "It will be observed that the conductor was neither offensive nor insulting to appellee. He applied to him neither force nor threats and did not even place his hand upon him except to assist him down the car steps. It is true the witness thought he helped him down the steps in a pretty rough way, yet when he describes his manner and explains what he did it is apparent that he was neither rough nor unkind. It is patent therefore that the conduct of the conductor was not such as to manifest a wanton or reckless disregard of appellee's rights or a disposition to oppress or humiliate him. What he said or did gave no cause for the infliction of punitive damages upon his employer. Therefore the instruction as to punitive damages should not have been given."

From a careful reading of these and other cases, we conclude that the following is the correct rule: Where the facts testified to, in and of themselves, show that the agent ejecting the passengers was insulting in words, manner, or tone, an instruction authorizing punitive damages should be given. Where the witness, however, merely expresses an opinion that the conductor or other agent was insulting, and then proceeds to testify to facts which, in and of themselves, do not show that the employee's conduct was insulting in words, manner, or tone, a cause for punitive damages is not made out. Applying this rule to the facts of this case, it is manifest that appellee was not entitled to recover punitive damages. The words which she says the conductor used were not insulting. She testifies to no fact showing that his manner was offensive or insulting. As far as the record discloses, she did not attempt to describe the tone of his voice or to imitate it, so that the jury could determine whether or not his tone was insulting. From her own testimony it appears that the conductor was simply positive or emphatic in his manner and in the use of the language which he employed. This gave no cause for the infliction of punitive damages upon his employer.

Upon the return of the case, if the evidence be the same, the court will instruct the jury, substantially, as follows:

"(1) If you believe from the evidence that plaintiff, on the occasion in question, purchased a ticket from defendant's agent in Louisville, Ky., for Gap-in-Knob, and at and by the direction of defendant's agent or agents took passage upon defendant's Bardstown & Springfield branch passenger train, and that defendant's conductor thereafter ejected plaintiff from said train upon its arrival at South Louisville, you will find for the plaintiff.

"(2) Unless you believe from the evidence that plaintiff, on the occasion in question, purchased a ticket from defendant's agent in Louisville, Ky., for Gap-in-Knob, and at and by the direction of defendant's agent or agents took passage upon defendant's Bardstown & Springfield branch passenger train, and that defendant's conductor thereafter ejected plaintiff from said train upon its arrival at South Louisville, you will find for the defendant.

"(3) In case you find for plaintiff, you will award her such sum in damages as you may believe from the evidence will fairly compensate her for any mortification or humiliation, for any inconvenience or discomfort, and for any sickness which you may believe from the evidence she suffered as the direct or proximate cause of being ejected from said train."

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion

DIXON v. CHAPPELL.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 4, 1909.)

LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 7*)—LIBELOUS PUBLICATION—“GRAFT.”

A newspaper article, charging that justice has been outdone, that it is a matter of self-exposure, self-ignorance, bad recollection, no bookkeeping, or downright graft on the part of the county officials, that, when things go wrong, the county judge has a very bad memory, and his graft continues to extract money from the taxpayers' pockets, touches the county judge in his office, and charges him with graft, and is libelous per se; the word "graft" meaning the fraudulent obtaining of public money unlawfully by the corruption of public officers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Leslie County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by William Dixon against H. C. Chappell. From a judgment of dismissal rendered on sustaining a general demurrer to the petition, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Cleon K. Calvert and J. G. Begley, for appellant. J. M. Bicknell, Jas. H. Jeffries, and T. G. Lewis, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. William Dixon is the county judge of Leslie county. H. C. Chappell is the publisher of a newspaper at Hyden, Ky., called "Thousandsticks," which circulates in the county. In that paper on October 22, 1908, Chappell printed the following article: "Right is Our Motto. There has been quite an inquiry by the taxpayers of Leslie county to the editor of Thousandsticks as to whether he had abandoned his fight for good government on the part of our county officials. We can say that we have not and never will. Defeat does not spell anything to us, when justice has been outdone, overruled by the sleight of hand. It is a matter of self-exposure and self-ignorance, bad recollection, no bookkeeping, or it is downright graft on the part of our county officers. There is no better way of doing anything than a plain show down, which has been evaded by the fiscal court. When things go wrong the county judge has a very bad recollection, and his graft continues to extract the money from the taxpayers' pockets. In Harlan county the taxpayer is assessed only 25 cents on the $100.00 for his county levy. That 25 cents on the $100.00 pays the officers' salaries, paupers and other county claims and still has enough left to lay up a road and bridge fund, and out of that fund they have Evidently some one has been getting fat jobs. Now, we are going to push this fight for a better condition of our financial affairs and demand of our public officials to show their record so the taxpayers may know where their money has gone. If any taxpayer thinks he is an interested party, we would be glad to hear from him." Dixon thereupon brought this suit against Chap-pell, charging that he had made the publica-tion with express malice, and to his damage in the sum of $5,000. The circuit court sus-tained a general demurrer to the petition on the ground that the article is not libelous per se, and that no special damage was al-leged. His petition having been dismissed, the plaintiff appeals.

The only question arising on the appeal is whether the article is libelous per se. In Newell on Libel and Slander the rule is thus stated: "Defamatory words falsely spoken of a person, which impute to the party un-fitness to perform the duties of an office, or employment of profit, or the want of in-tegrity in the discharge of the duties of such an office or employment, are actionable in themselves without proof of special dam-ages." The same principle is thus stated in Townsend on Slander and Libel, § 196: "As regards language concerning one in an office, the same general principles apply as to lan-guage concerning one in trade. Language concerning one in office, which imputes to him a want of integrity or misfeasance in his office, or a want of capacity generally to fulfill the duties of his office, or which is cal-culated to diminish public confidence in him, or charges him with a breach of some public trust, is actionable. But as in the case of one in trade, the language, to be actionable, must touch him in his office." To same ef-fect, see 18 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, 954; 25 Cyc. 346. In Robbins v. Treadway, 25 Ky. 540, 19 Am. Dec. 152, the charge was that the judge lacked capacity as a judge, and that he had abandoned the common principles of truth. Holding this actionable, the court said: "Anything which assails the integrity or capacity of a judge is action-able." In Commonwealth v. Duncan (Ky.) 104 S. W. 997, which was a prosecution for libeling L. E. Pierce, the clerk of the quar-terly court of Fayette county, the article charged that the county had been plundered by the county officials, and, after referring to the county judge, used this language in re-gard to the quarterly court clerk: "Did he promise that his 'Fidus Achates'—that ubiq-uitous county official who is sometimes 'County Auditor,' sometimes 'County Bookkeeper,' sometimes 'Clerk of the Quarterly Court' and been industriously at work for four years bringing order out of chaos, correcting unsat-isfactory entries and making new ones, sup-plying missing vouchers and putting every-thing in 'apple pie' order for investigation?" Holding this libelous, the court said: "The article speaks of the plunderers of the county. It speaks of Pierce as the holder of many of-fices, who has been industriously at work for four years correcting unsatisfactory en-tries and making new ones, supplying miss-ing vouchers, and putting everything in ap-ple pie order for investigation. It charges that he will elucidate, explain, modify, or magnify the numerous entries and vouchers which are to be submitted. If such charges are not calculated to bring an official into contempt, it is hard to understand what would." See, also, Penn Iron Works v. Henry Voght Machine Company (Ky.) 96 S. W. 551, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1023.

In the article before us it is charged: That justice has been outdone, overruled by sleight of hand; that it is a matter of self-exposure, self-ignorance, bad recollection, no bookkeeping, or downright graft on the part of the county officials; that when things go wrong the county judge has a very bad mem-ory, and his graft continues to extract mon-ey from the taxpayers' pockets. The natural meaning of this is that the misuse of the county money is due to ignorance, bad recollection, no bookkeeping, or downright graft on the part of the county officials, and that the county judge has both a bad recollection and by graft continues to extract money from the taxpayers' pockets. The word "graft" has a well-defined popular meaning at this time. It means the fraudulent obtain-ing of public money unlawfully by the cor-ruption of public officers. It is constantly so used in the daily press, and is thus defined in Clarkson's American Dictionary: "The act of any one, especially an official or pub-lic employé, by which he procures money surreptitiously by virtue of his office or posi-tion." "Grafter" is thus defined: "A dis-honest official." The charge touches the county judge in his office. To charge an of-ficial with graft is to charge him with want of integrity. The article in question, if true, would necessarily destroy the respect of the people of Leslie county for the county judge. Its necessary tendency was to degrade him in public estimation, for no one could regard him as a capable and upright official who believed the statements of this article to be true. The publication was therefore action-able per se, and the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the petition. Judgment reversed.

PADUCAH COOPERAGE CO. v. HAZEL HEADING CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 4, 1909.)

1. SALES (§ 364*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESENTATION OF ISSUES.

Plaintiff's petition alleged that it sold a certain number of whisky heads to defendant at 10 cents each, a certain number of oil heads at 6 cents, amounting in all to $1,079.20, and that defendant had agreed to pay that amount for the heads. Defendant's answer alleged that it did not take the heads at the price named, but under an agreement to pay therefor the reasonable market value, which was $676, which amount it had paid. Held, that instructions that if the heads were sold at the price charged, and the quantity sued for was delivered, the jury should find for plaintiff $1,079.20, less a credit for the amount defendant had paid, but, if the heads were received under an agreement that defendant should pay plaintiff the reasonable market value of them, then it was responsible only for such market value, properly presented the issues made by the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

2. SALES (§ 359*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE.

In an action for the balance of the price of headings, evidence held to sustain a verdict for plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 359.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, McCracken County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Hazel Heading Company against Paducah Cooperaage Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wheeler, Hughes & Berry, for appellant. Miller & Miller, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. The Hazel Heading Company brought this suit against the Paducah Cooperaage Company alleging in its petition: That at the special instance and request of the defendant it had furnished and delivered to it lumber for making barrel heads of the value of $1,079.20, for which the defendant agreed to pay it that sum. That the material was sold as follows:

June 1, 1906.	3,132 whisky heads at 10 ct..	$ 313 20
June 14, "	4,080 " " " "	408 00
June 16, "	2,350 " " " "	235 00
June 16, "	2,050 oil heads " 6 ct..	123 00

Making a total of..... $1079 20

It was alleged that the material was reasonably worth $1,079.20 at the regular market price therefor at the time, that the defendant promised to pay that sum in a reasonable time, but had only paid $676, leaving a balance due of $403.20, for which judgment was prayed. By the first paragraph of its answer the defendant traversed the allegations of the petition. By the second paragraph it pleaded: That the plaintiff shipped the heading to it voluntarily and without solicitation, plaintiff advising it to go ahead and work the heading up, and give the plaintiff what there was in it; that it accepted the heading on this understanding; that there were only 2,486 sets of whisky heading worth at the market price 20 cents each, making $497.20, and 1,490 sets of oil heading worth at the market price 12 cents each, making $120.80, or in all $676, and this amount it had paid the plaintiff. A reply was filed denying the allegations of the answer. A trial was had resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals.

It is insisted that the instructions of the court did not submit to the jury properly the issue in the case. The instructions are as follows:

"(1) Gentlemen of the jury: It is undisputed evidence that defendant has paid plaintiff $676 on the heading sued for in this action, and if you shall believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff, at the instance and request of the defendant, sold and delivered to defendant on June 1, 1906, 3,132 whisky heads at 10 cents per head, amounting to $313.20, June 14, 1906, 4,080 whisky heads at 10 cents each, amounting to $408, June 16, 1906, 2,350 whisky heads at 10 cents per head, amounting to $235, June 16, 1906, 2,050 oil heads at 6 cents per head, amounting to $123, and in all $1,079.20, then the law is for the plaintiff, and you will find for them $403.20, the balance claimed by plaintiff, and the amount sued for in this action, with interest thereon from the 16th day of August, 1906.

"(2) If, however, you shall believe from the evidence in this case that the heading mentioned and described to you in instruction No. 1 herein was shipped by plaintiff to defendant, and that the same was used and worked up by defendant, under an agreement that it would pay plaintiff the reasonable market value therefor, and that the reasonable market value was only and not more than $676, then the law is for the defendant, and you will so find. But if you shall believe from the evidence that the reasonable market value of said heading so shipped by plaintiff to defendant was more than $676, then you will find for the plaintiff whatever sum you may believe from the evidence said heading was reasonably worth, in excess of said sum of $676, if anything."

The sum of the plaintiff's petition is that it sold a certain number of whisky heads to defendant at 10 cents each, and a certain number of oil headings at 6 cents each, amounting in all to $1,079.20, and that the defendant had agreed to pay it this amount for the heads. The sum of the defendant's answer is that it did not take the heads at the price named in the petition, but took them under an agreement to pay therefor the reasonable market value, and that the reasonable market value was $676, the amount which it had paid. In instructing the jury the court should present the issues made in the pleadings. This the court did, by the instructions given. He told the jury, in sub-received under an agreement that the defendant would pay the plaintiff the reasonable market value of them, then it was responsible only for such market value.

The defendant also insists that the verdict is palpably against the evidence. The plaintiff introduced on the trial R. W. Christman, who was its manager, and proved by him that he made a contract verbally with Paul Dysart, who was the manager of the defendant, by which he sold him the heads at 10 cents each for the whisky heads and 6 cents each for the oil heads, and that he shipped the quantity of heads stated in the petition and delivered them to the defendant. On cross-examination he stated: That under the trade Dysart was to send an inspector to Hazel to inspect the heads before they were shipped, and they were to be received at this price on board the cars at Hazel; that Dysart did not send a man to inspect the heads at Hazel, and when he saw him again he and Dysart agreed that the heads should be shipped and inspected when they reached the defendant; that Dysart proposed that he should take circle count; that he said he knew nothing about circle count. Dysart replied: "If you will go back home, and measure every car as you have been doing and take circle count, I will guarantee that it will hold out, and if there is any gain you shall have the benefit of it." Christman said that with this guarantee he went home, measured the stuff as he had been doing, and shipped it to defendant, and that the quantity was as sued for. He also said that there was no one present when he made the contract with Dysart. The defendant did not introduce Dysart as a witness. It introduced Blain Kilgore, who said he made the contract with Christman in connection with Dysart, and that the contract was substantially as stated in the answer; Christman agreeing to take circle measure. He also stated that he did not measure the stuff, that it was measured by H. Petter, and, being asked where H. Petter was, said that he was in the courtroom. Neither Dysart nor Petter were introduced as witnesses. Christman, being introduced in rebuttal, testified that he did not make a contract with Kilgore, and that Kilgore was not present when he made the contract with Dysart.

Under this evidence it is manifest that the real issue between the witnesses is: How much of the stuff there was. There was no dispute as to the price. One witness stated that the plaintiff agreed to take circle measure, and the other witness stated that he agreed to take circle measure with the guarantee that it would not be less than his meas-

It is true the defendant introduced on the trial a number of letters from Christman, and from it to him, which go far to sustain its contention as to the contract; but these letters are not conclusive, and, after all, the real question in the case is: How much heading there was. On this question the jury had before them the testimony of Christman as to his measurements by square measure, and there was no evidence for the defendant as to what it was by circle measure, as Kilgore had not measured it, and no witnesses who had personal knowledge of the facts were introduced by it.

Judgment affirmed.

1. MARRIAGE (§ 48*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—PROOF.

Marriage may be proved by reputation, as well as by record, or by the testimony of those who saw the rites performed.

2. MARRIAGE (§ 50*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—PROOF.

Reputation of a marriage, coupled with a man holding himself out as the husband and father of the family, is sufficient.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lincoln County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action between S. B. Caldwell, Jr., and others, and Sarah J. Williams and others. From a judgment for the latter, the former appeal. Affirmed.

P. M. McRoberts and Hendrick, Miller & Marble, for appellants. P. H. Taylor, for appellees.

O'REAR, J. James R. Napier was a bachelor, who died intestate. This suit involves the relationship of the appellees, who claim to be heirs at law of the decedent. Appellees claim, and the circuit court found, that the father of James R. Napier had been married three times, and had children born to him as the result of each marriage. The issue of the first marriage was, besides James R. Napier, a son and a daughter. The son died intestate and unmarried during the war with Mexico. The daughter married Dr. S. B. Caldwell of Paducah. Upon the death of the first wife, the three children, who were small, were given into the custody of their maternal aunts and separated. Mrs. Caldwell was taken to Boyle county, where she lived until her marriage. James R. Napier removed to Lincoln county and settled near Houstonville, where he lived till his death recently. Their father's name was John Napier, and he lived in Casey county. Appellees claim that, after the death of his first wife, John Napier married again, and by that wife had born three children. After the death of his second wife he again married, and it is claimed by appellees had eight children as the result of this union. All the children of John Napier were dead when this suit was prepared for trial, except appellee Sarah J. Williams. She testified: That she was the youngest child of John Napier by his last wife; that he died in 1854 when she was five years old; that his name was John Fox Napier; that he had lived in Casey county, Ky., but was moving in 1854 to Missouri, stopping at Hawesville, in Hancock county, on the way; that he was taken sick and died there; that James R. Napier was her brother of the half-blood; and that Mrs. Caldwell was her sister of the half-blood. She testified to the relationship of the other appellees. Two other witnesses, each uninterested, who lived at Hawesville, but who had lived in Casey county, testified: That they knew John Fox Napier when he lived in Casey county; that he had married three times, or at least more than once, and had children by each marriage; that they saw him when he came to Hawesville in 1854; that appellee Mrs. Williams is his daughter. Two witnesses, old people residing at Liberty in Casey county, testified that they knew John Fox Napier, who was married three times (one says two times), and who moved to Missouri before the War and died in Hancock county on the way; that he had a number of children, one named James, who subsequently moved to Houstonville in Lincoln county, where he owned a farm, and lived there till he died. Two witnesses testified: That they were near neighbors and intimate friends of James R. Napier in Lincoln county; that each heard him say that his father had married again, and that as a result he had a number of half-brothers and half-sisters (one testified he said 11); that he was talking of making his will so that his full sister Mrs. Caldwell would get all the property. So it is established that John Fox Napier of Casey county was the father of James R. Napier, was the one who moved to Missouri in 1854 and died on the route in Hancock county, and was the father of Mrs. Williams and the ancestor of the other appellees. It is true that Dr. Caldwell testified he had never heard his wife speak of having any brother or sisters of the half-blood, and had never heard that his father-in-law's middle name was Fox, or that he had a middle name; nor did he ever hear his brother-in-law James R. Napier mention having had brothers or sisters of the half-blood. He testified that his father-in-law's name was John Napier, and he had lived in Casey county, but he had never known him. The records of Casey county do not show that John Napier or John Fox Napier was married in that county. In a number of minor details there are some contradictions and improbabilities in the evidence; but not more than might be expected after the lapse of so many years, when the memories of different witnesses are called upon to detail occurrences more than half a century past.

It is insisted that there was not evidence that John Fox Napier was married to the mother of Mrs. Williams. There is not record evidence of the fact, nor the testimony of the eyewitnesses; but marriage is a fact that may be proved by reputation, as well as by a record, or by the testimony of those who saw the rites performed. On that score the reputation of the marriage, coupled with John Napier's holding himself out as the husband and father of that family, establishes the relationship.

We perceive no reason for disturbing the judgment of the chancellor.

Consequently, the judgment will be affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO. v. SMITH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 11, 1909.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 383*)—CONTRADICTION—COLLATERAL MATTER.

Where, in an action for injuries to plaintiff by his mule becoming frightened at a railroad pumping engine in a highway, defendant's employé in charge of the engine testified that he did not remember having stated that he would sue the company if he was in plaintiff's place, and that he would not have been in plaintiff's place for the railroad company, but that it was true, was a collateral matter and hence evidence that he made such statement was inadmissible to contradict him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1224; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1053*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

The court having charged that testimony offered to show that a witness had made certain immaterial statements could be considered only to contradict him, and not as substantive testimony in the cause, the erroneous admission thereof was trivial, and not prejudicial to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4182; Dec. Dig. § 1053.*]

3. HIGHWAYS (§ 184*)—USE—ACTION FOR INJURIES—VARIANCE—"PUBLIC HIGHWAY."

Civ. Code Prac. § 129, provides that no variance is material which does not mislead a party to his prejudice, and that a party claiming to be so misled must show such fact, when the court may order the pleading amended, and section 130 declares that, if such variance be not material, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence and order an immediate amendment. Held that, where plaintiff alleged the maintenance of a nuisance by defendant in a highway of G. county, evidence that the place was a public street in a village, in the absence of a claim of surprise, did not constitute a material variance, a public

4. HIGHWAYS (§ 184*)—OBSTRUCTION—FRIGHTENING ANIMALS—ISSUES.

Where, in an action for injuries to plaintiff by his mule becoming frightened by a railroad pumping engine alleged to have been maintained in a highway, defendant's answer put in issue the fact that the engine and coal therefor were within the highway, but did not deny the legality of the establishment of the highway, the court was not required to submit the circumstances under which the highway was created.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

5. HIGHWAYS (§ 68*)—EXTENT—EVIDENCE.

Where the existence of a highway is admitted, its width could be shown by the record, if one existed, otherwise by the testimony of witnesses who knew it, or by evidence of the extent of travel between its lateral edges.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 227-223; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DAMAGES—ASSUMED FACTS.

In an action for personal injuries, an instruction that the jury could award such sum as would reasonably compensate plaintiff for any mental and physical pain and suffering caused by the injury, not exceeding $2,000, was not objectionable as assuming that plaintiff had endured mental and physical suffering.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 431; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURING ERROR—OMISSION OF REQUESTS.

Defendant's failure to offer correct instructions, while ineffective to cure error in those given, is persuasive that the instructions given were not regarded as prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628-641; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

8. DAMAGES (§ 131*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EXCESSIVENESS.

Plaintiff was bruised in an accident, made sore, and continued to be disabled for some months, so that he could not do his customary work and suffered considerable pain when he did work. Held, that a verdict for $700 was not so excessive as to indicate passion or prejudice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 357-367; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Grayson County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Warren Smith against the Illinois Central Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. A. Faurest, J. M. Dickinson, Marion A. Arnold, and Trabue, Doolan & Cox, for appellant. H. L. James, for appellee.

O'REAR, J. This is the second appeal of this case. The opinion delivered upon the first appeal states the cause of action. Smith v. I. C. R. R. Co., 105 S. W. 98. Upon the new trial there was a verdict for $700 for appellee. The grounds relied upon by appellant for a reversal are: (1) Admission of irrele-highway was the alleged cause of appellee's injury. Campbell testified for appellant. An issue in the case was whether the pumping engine was located in the highway. Campbell testified that the space between the engine and the fence on the opposite side of the road was about 16 feet. He did not know the limits of the road, and was not present when the engine was put there. He also testified that coal dumped near the engine for its use was piled by the side of the engine, and that some of it extended out into the wagonway; but he did not regard it as material. He was asked on cross-examination whether he did not say, on the day of the injury to appellee, in the presence of Cal. Stone, that "he (meaning Campbell) would sue the railroad company" (if he were Smith), and that "he wouldn't have been in Mr. Smith's place for the Illinois Central Railroad Company." He answered that he did not remember having made the statement, but that it was true. He would not have been in Smith's place for the Illinois Central Railroad. Stone and Smith were introduced in rebuttal for appellee and testified that Campbell made the statement alleged. The court thus admonished the jury: "The testimony of Mr. Smith and Mr. Stone can only be considered by you for the purpose of contradicting the witness Campbell, and not as substantive testimony in the case." Campbell's statement to Smith and Stone seems to us to have been immaterial and irrelevant. He may have meant by it that he regarded the railroad company as liable for the injury whether the pumping engine was on the highway or not, and upon that supposed liability he would have sued the company on account of the injury. It was only his opinion as to the company's liability in the premises, based upon what is not disclosed. The fact that he would not have been in the predicament that Smith was in when his mule threw him and fell on him, with a runaway team dragging them, for the consideration of a railroad, was even less relevant to any issue being tried by the jury. The matter was collateral. If he had testified to any fact showing that the company was not liable, or indicated his belief that it was not liable, when his belief was admissible in evidence, it would have been competent to impeach him by evidence that he had made a different statement about the matter. Civ. Code Prac. § 597. The contradiction of this witness on the matter to which this testimony was directed served to cancel that statement, as it were. The court's admonition retrieved the testimony objected to from being substantive evidence for any purpose, and limited it to "contradicting"

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Campbell. If the court had said that it was to be considered as impeaching evidence, the question would look more serious. On the whole, the matter seems trivial. The witness Campbell's evidence was not controlling, and was not as to matter that was particularly material. We cannot think the evidence complained of was prejudicial.

The petition alleged that the obstruction was upon a public highway of Grayson county. The evidence was that it was within an incorporated village, Spring Lick. Therefore the highway, if a public way at all, was a street of that village. It is contended by appellant that this constituted a variance between the pleading and the proof. If it be admitted that there was a variance, still appellant is not in a position to claim a reversal on that score. Section 129, Civ. Code Prac., provides that: "No variance between pleadings and proof is material which does not mislead a party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. A party who claims to have been so misled must show that fact to the satisfaction of the court; and, thereupon the court may order the pleading to be amended upon such terms as may be just." By section 130, Id., it is provided: "If such variance be not material, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, and may order an immediate amendment." There was not a claim of surprise in the trial court. If there had been, then the court could have ordered an amendment of the petition to show that the highway was a village public street, and, as it was not a material variance, the trial would have proceeded, for a public street is a public highway of the county in a broad sense. The plaintiff had the same right to travel the street as if it were a county road. The defendant was equally liable for so obstructing either as to endanger the public travel upon it.

The third complaint on this appeal is that the trial court erred in not laying down to the jury some rule by which they could determine the extent of the highway in question. The instruction was: "If the defendant erected, in the public highway leading from Spring Lick to Caneyville, a stationary engine which was calculated to scare horses of ordinary gentleness by reason thereof," etc. The answer did not put in issue the existence of that highway as a public highway, but it controverted the allegation of the petition that the defendant placed the named obstructions in it. It denied that it "fostered or maintained a common nuisance in Grayson county by obstructing one of the highways of said county. It denies that it placed upon said public highway a steam engine, which it used for pumping water to one of its water tanks upon its line of railroad. * * * It denies that it erected or placed or maintained or operated said engine on said highway, and it denies that it placed large quantities of coal or any coal near to said public highway in such a manner as to obstruct the travel thereon, or render it unsafe for persons to travel along said public highway in vehicles or on horseback." Construed liberally, this pleading does not put in issue the existence of the public highway or the legality or sufficiency of its establishment. It did put in issue, if anything, the fact that the engine and coal were within that highway. It was not therefore necessary for the trial court to have submitted to the jury under what circumstances a public highway is created, whether by dedication or acceptance, or long use from which such dedication and acceptance are presumed. The existence of the public highway being admitted, its width was then the point in question. It could be shown either by the record, if there was one, or by other competent evidence showing the fact. The public records of Grayson county had been destroyed by fire. The width of that road was then to be proved by the testimony of witnesses who knew it, and by the evidence shown upon the ground as to the extent of the travel upon it between its lateral edges. Evidence was introduced upon those points, and the instruction left it to the jury to say whether the engine, boiler, and coal were in the public highway.

In instructing the jury as to the measure of damages, the court said: "If the jury find for the plaintiff, they will award him such sum as will fairly and reasonably compensate him for any mental and physical pain and suffering caused by said injury, not exceeding in all $2,000, the amount claimed in the petition." It is contended: That this instruction assumed that the plaintiff had endured mental and physical suffering; that the court should have said "such mental and physical suffering, if any," etc. The preceding instruction had directed the jury before they could find for the plaintiff, they must find not only that the highway was obstructed as charged, but that by reason thereof plaintiff's team became frightened and ran away, thereby causing injury to him. When the jury found all those elements, as they had to do before applying the measure of damages, it follows that they must have found that plaintiff was injured in his person, and, if so, that he had suffered from it mental and physical pain, so that nothing was assumed. Nor did the defendant complain of the form of these instructions in the court below, by offering any other covering those points. While the fact that defendant did not itself offer instructions correct in form would not cure error in those given by the court, it is persuasive argument that the form was not then regarded as prejudicial. Nor was it. Appellee was thrown under his mule, which fell upon him, and he was dragged for some distance by the runaway team. He says he was bruised and made sore, and continued to be disabled for some months, so that he could not do his customary work, and suffered considerable pain when he did work.

it is, we ought not to, and will not, disturb it. Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Leslie County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Charlotte Feltner and others against John C. Huff and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Cleon K. Calvert, for appellants. J. M. Bicknell, for appellees.

NUNN, J. This action was instituted by appellants to recover of appellees a tract of land, and their petition was dismissed. It appears that prior to the year 1888 one John Huff, Sr., sold the land to one Henry C. Patton and executed to him a title bond therefor. Some time after that Patton sold it to one William Huff. Patton, having never received a conveyance of the legal title, caused John Huff, Sr., to execute a bond for title to William Huff. William Huff executed to Patton his note for the balance of the purchase price, $100, and reserved a lien upon the land for its payment. Huff paid Patton several dollars on this note. Huff died prior to 1889, and in the year 1888 or 1889 Patton instituted an action to enforce his lien against the land for the balance of the purchase price. He made the widow and all of the children of William Huff parties defendants to the action. The children, at the time, were all under 14 years of age. John Huff, Sr., was also made a party, as he held the legal title to the land. The return on the summons issued delivering a copy to Charlotte Huff for each of them, they being under fourteen years of age, having no legal guardian, and their father having died January 17, 1889. B. T. Fields, S. P. C. Granville Burton, D. C." Thereafter the guardian ad litem filed an answer for the infants, and a judgment was rendered enforcing Patton's lien and the land ordered sold. At the sale one John C. Huff, a brother of John Huff, Sr., purchased the land, and the sale was confirmed, and he afterwards conveyed it to appellee, Jasper N. Huff, who has been in possession of it for many years.

Appellants claim that the proceedings had in the case of Patton against Huff, under which John Huff claims title by purchase at the commissioner's sale, were void, and therefore John Huff obtained no title or interest in the land. They present several alleged reasons why the proceedings in that case were void: First, there was no affidavit or demand of claim as required by Gen. St. c. 39, art. 2, §§ 35-37. Second, there was no affidavit filed authorizing the court to appoint a guardian ad litem for the infants or any order of the court showing that it did appoint a guardian ad litem for them. Third, because the decrees and orders of the court confirming the sale and directing the deed to be made to appellee John Huff were made and entered by a special judge who was of counsel for the plaintiff Patton. It will be observed from the return, entered on the summons above copied, that the infants were properly before the court under the provisions of the Code of Practice as it then existed. Therefore it appears that the court in that action had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter.

In Derr v. Wilson, 84 Ky. 17, the court said: "Where the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the parties, the judgment would be void; but where the court has jurisdiction, and the defendant appears or is warned according to law, the judgment is not void, although it may be erroneous in all its parts; nor can an erroneous judgment be assailed collaterally." In the case of Northington v. Reed (Ky.) 75 S. W. 206, no summons appeared to have been served upon the infants, and this court in considering that question said: "It is unnecessary for us to determine whether the judgment in contest could be held valid in a direct proceeding to set it aside, instituted in proper time by some person entitled to maintain it. It is attacked here collaterally. It was rendered in a court of general jurisdiction, and when a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is attacked collaterally every presumption is made in favor of its integrity. If no sum-

Nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which expressly appears to be so. Hence, though the existence of any jurisdictional fact may not be affirmed upon the record, it will be presumed upon a collateral attack that the court, if of general jurisdiction, has acted correctly and with due authority, and its judgment will be as valid as though every fact necessary to jurisdiction affirmatively appears.' Jones v. Edwards, 78 Ky. 6; Newcomb's Ex'rs v. Newcomb, 13 Bush, 554, 26 Am. Rep. 222." See, also, the cases of Myers v. Pedigo (Ky.) 72 S. W. 734, and Sorrell v. Samuels (Ky.) 49 S. W. 762, which affirm the doctrine as to collateral attacks upon judgments of a court of general jurisdiction, and further decided that the only way to correct such errors is by appeal, and infants are given 12 months after obtaining the age of 21 to show cause against the judgment.

In this case, however, it is shown by the uncontradicted evidence that the courthouse in Hazard, where the action of Patton against Huff was pending, was destroyed by fire after the sale of the land, and the book containing the orders of the court for the years 1888 and 1889 was destroyed as well as many papers in the office, and the presumption is that the action of the court in that proceeding was regular; that every legal step necessary to make the proceeding valid was had. It appears from the record that the last order made in the case of Patton against Huff, which distributed the purchase money received from John C. Huff and approved the deed made by the commissioner to him, was indorsed by L. H. N. Salyer and D. K. Rawlings. It is proved that at that term of the court, September, 1890, Salyer was elected by the bar as special judge for that term, and it also appears that he was one of the attorneys for the plaintiff, Patton. It is unnecessary for us to determine the effect, if any, it had upon the validity of the deed made by the commissioner to John C. Huff, as it is shown by the record that he was the purchaser at the sale which was confirmed, the presumption is, by a regular judge, and the purchase money paid. This made him the owner of the land. The only necessity for the conveyance was that it might be recorded in the county court clerk's office as evidence of his title. We will say, however, that in our opinion the deed conveying the land to John C. Huff was valid for the reason that the proof shows without contradiction that, in every case where Salyer signed his name as judge, there also appeared, when Salyer was counsel for either of the parties, the name D. K. Rawlings, a member of that bar, as judge, that an attorney could act as judge by agreement of parties or their counsel. For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Warren County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Consolidated actions by Renson Rathfon against John B. Gaines and another and by Mrs. John B. Gaines against Renson Rathfon. There was a judgment dismissing Rathfon's petition, and judgment rendered against him in the other action, and he appeals from both judgments. Affirmed.

Sims, Du Bose & Rodes, for appellant.
Wright & McElroy, C. U. McElroy, and Thomas W. Thomas, for appellees.

LASSING, J. Prior to April, 1906, Mrs. John B. Gaines was the owner of a newspaper and printing outfit at Bowling Green, Ky., known as the "News Publishing Company." Her husband, John B. Gaines, was the manager of said plant for her. Desiring to dispose of said plant, she caused it to be advertised, and a notice of the advertisement fell into the hands of Renson Rathfon. He was a printer and had saved up some $3,000 or $4,000, and, as he wanted to purchase a newspaper plant, he answered this advertisement, and the correspondence relative thereto resulted in his meeting John B. Gaines in Louisville, where the proposition to purchase at least an interest in the plant was discussed. The representations made to him by Gaines at this time were such as to induce him to go to Bowling Green and inspect the plant with a view of purchasing, if upon inspection it measured up to his expectations. After inspecting the physical properties of the plant, and conferring with John B. Gaines relative to the nature, character, and extent of the business done by said company chased a one-third interest in the company upon the same terms. This purchase carried with it, not only the physical property, but also the good will, subscription list, and such evidences of indebtedness in the way of accounts, etc., as were held by the company. It was agreed that the company should thenceforth be operated by Gaines, representing his wife, Andrews, and Rathfon; that each was to receive $25 per week out of the gross earnings of the company, and each assumed to pay the one-third part of a debt of $1,550 which the company owed for a linotype machine. Under this agreement the said parties took charge of the company and operated it for some time, when Rathfon became dissatisfied, and instituted a suit wherein he sought to rescind the contract and compel Mrs. Gaines to repay to him the $3,166.66 which he had paid to her, and to cancel the note for $1,000 which he had executed to her for the purchase price of his interest in the plant, on the ground that her husband and agent, John B. Gaines, had falsely and fraudulently represented to him that said plant and property was worth at least $12,500, and that the earning capacity thereof was at least $12,000 per year in gross, and that the net earnings were at least $5,000 per year; that the earnings of the plant for the year 1905 were about $12,000, while the gross expense for the year was about $6,000; that the net earnings for the year 1905 amounted to at least $5,000, and that it had run as high as $5,000 per year for some years prior to 1905. He alleged that each of these statements so made to him by Gaines was false, and known by him to be false at the time they were made, and were made for the purpose of deceiving him, and that they did deceive him, to his prejudice and injury. He pleaded further that the plant was not worth to exceed $6,500, and that its total earnings did not exceed $6,000 per year, and that all of this sum was required to operate said plant, and get out the daily and weekly paper which it edited. To this petition an answer was filed, traversing all of the allegations of fraud and misrepresentation, and pleading affirmatively that Rathfon was a practical printer of long experience, and that before purchasing the property he had examined it fully, and investigated its earning capacity, especially as to the year 1905, which was taken as a basis, and had satisfied himself that the gross and net earnings of said plant for that year were as represented. Andrews was made a party defendant to the suit, and filed his separate answer, in which he sided with his codefendant Gaines. Thereafter the note which Rathfon had ex-

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

to rescind the contract. Proof was taken and the cases were submitted and heard together. The chancellor found against the claim and contention of plaintiff Rathfon as to the allegations of fraud and misrepresentation, and dismissed his petition, and rendered judgment against Rathfon for the $1,000 note, with interest, in favor of Mrs. Gaines, and directed that his interest in the plant be sold in satisfaction thereof. From both of said judgments Rathfon appeals.

The correctness of the judgment for the $1,000 in favor of Mrs. Gaines depends upon the disposition that is made of the suit for rescission. If the finding and judgment of the chancellor upon the questions raised in that suit is correct, then, of course, the judgment directing a sale of Rathfon's interest in the plant to satisfy his $1,000 debt must stand, for his only defense thereto is that he was deceived and overreached in the purchase by John B. Gaines, her agent. Quite an effort is made in the record to show that the defendant Andrews never, in fact, paid his part of the purchase price, and that he was acting in collusion with Mrs. Gaines in perpetrating a fraud upon Rathfon by inducing him to purchase an interest in the plant; but, after a careful inspection of the record, we are satisfied that plaintiff failed in this particular, for the evidence fairly establishes the claim of Andrews that he paid his part of the purchase price, as stipulated in the contract, and was not guilty of any reprehensible conduct in bringing about the negotiations which resulted in the sale of the interest in the plant to appellant. Hence the sole question open for determination is whether or not John B. Gaines, as the agent of his wife, falsely and fraudulently represented to appellant a state of facts relative to the company's business, which he knew to be untrue, for the purpose of making the sale.

The fraudulent representations relied upon by appellant to support his contention are the statements which he alleges John B. Gaines made to him relative to the value of the physical property of the plant and its business. First, as to the physical property, he alleges that it was represented to him as being worth $12,500, when as a matter of fact it was not worth to exceed $6,500. Upon this point the weight of the evidence is against his contention. Two witnesses are introduced by appellant, who fixed the value of the physical property at about $6,500, whereas the witnesses introduced by defendants place the value of the physical property at from $8,750 to $10,000, and the average value, as fixed by the witnesses for the defendant, some four or five in number, exceeds $9,000. However, as appellant is shown to be a practical printer, and familiar with printing presses and other machinery, contrivances, and apparatus in general use about a printing establishment, his claim that he was deceived as to the value of this property cannot be seriously taken, since the property was exhibited to him in full, and he was given every opportunity to examine same and satisfy himself as to its value. The testimony of the witnesses for appellee as to the value of the physical property of the plant is much more satisfactory, and is clearer than that of the appellant, and, considering all of the testimony upon this point, we are of the opinion that the physical property of the plant was at the time of which the witnesses spoke worth not less than $9,000, and $10,000 could not be said to be an exorbitant valuation thereon. Appellant himself, while fixing the valuation upon this property at a much lower figure, states, that, if the earning capacity of the plant was $5,000 net per annum, the plant would be easily worth $12,000.

It is shown that the accounts held by the plant on April 2, 1906, the date of the purchase, amounted to about $1,700. To this must be added the value of the good will of the company, its subscription list, etc., which the testimony shows under normal conditions is worth 50 per cent. of the value of the physical property, which would make the total value of plant at that time, in round numbers, about $16,000. Of course, if this was its value, then appellant did not pay more for the one-third interest therein, which he bought, than it was reasonably worth. But it is argued that the statement of John B. Gaines, the manager, as to the gross and net earnings of the company for the year 1905, was false and fraudulent, and that, even though it be conceded that appellant is not in a position to complain as to representations made to him concerning the value of the physical property, still as to these latter statements he had no means of informing himself, and had relied wholly upon the word and representations of the manager, John B. Gaines, and in this way the deceit was practiced and fraud perpetrated. Appellant called to his aid an accountant, and had him investigate and report on the business done by the company for the year 1905. The receipts for that year were kept in a book called a "Cash Book." This book showed the various sums collected during the year, the date upon which each was paid, and by whom. According to this book there was received from January 1, 1905, to January 1, 1906, a total of $10,587.07. Of these collections a part were for work that had been done in 1904, and it is argued in favor of appellant that for these collections a deduction should be made, and that, while the books show receipts for the year 1905 amounting to more than $10,500, as a matter of fact the receipts for this period were much less than this sum. On the other hand, appellee urges that, while it is true that a portion of the receipts taken in during the year 1905 were for business done during the year 1904, there was likewise a large part of the collections which should have been made during the latter part of the year 1905 for business done in that year that were not made, but were carried over into the year 1906, and were or should have been collected during that year, and that, as a matter of fact, the cash book does not show all of the business done by the company during the year 1905, for the reason that the accounts or claims for business done in 1905, which were uncollected, exceed the amount of claims for business done in 1904 which were collected and reported in 1905.

As the business was owned solely by Mrs. Gaines during the year 1905, no itemized account of the expenses for that year was kept, and this item is estimated by Gaines, and reported on in a very unsatisfactory way by the accountant representing appellant. John B. Gaines says that the expenses for that year amounted to $5,506.75, and that this was arrived at by taking into account all of the various items of expense per week which he had during that year. If we accept the statement as shown by the cash book as correct, the receipts exceeded the expenditures for that year by something in excess of $5,000. According to the calculation of the accountant, the cash from business in 1905 amounted to $7,596.55, and the profits for the same time amounted to $2,589.80, and he reports "accounts uncollected" which went over into the succeeding year amounting to $3,360.48. Now, then, what proportion of these accounts were old claims which had been brought over into 1905 from 1904 is not clear, nor is this method of determining the amount of business each year as satisfactory as that suggested by the manager, Gaines, for the reason that, where accounts are carried over from one year into the next year's business, it would be difficult in keeping the books of the company to determine with nicety the amount of business transacted in any one year, but, where the business for the year is taken to be the amount of money actually collected on new business and old accounts during a given year, a very simple method, and one easily understood, is presented, and, if from these gross receipts of the year there is deducted the actual expenses, we have then what would be generally understood to be the net income from the business during that year. As this was the method which was employed by Mr. Gaines in keeping the book accounts of the company, it is but natural that in making his report of the business for the year 1905 he should have been governed by these figures. If he was, and the cash book represents the real amount collect-

However, we apprehend that it, at the time appellant was investigating the financial condition of the company and looking into the nature and extent of the business, he had been told that the company had done a given amount of business during the year, and that it had received in cash the amounts which his accountant showed it had received, $7,598.55, and had realized a cash profit of $2,589.90, and had uncollected accounts amounting to $3,360.48, claims for work done, the report would have been as satisfactory and acceptable to him as it was in the form in which it was made. While certain statements are shown to have been made by Mr. Gaines, the manager, relative to the circulation of a periodical in which he was interested for the purpose of securing advertisements, which, we confess, are somewhat confusing, if not misleading, still no such statements were made to appellant upon this account which induced him to enter into the trade, and therefore they have little or no bearing upon the question at issue. Nor is much light thrown upon the question as to the extent of the business done by the company in 1905 by showing that it did a much less business in 1906, nor by showing that another newspaper plant conducted in the same town did as good, if not better, business in 1906 than it did in 1905. The success of a newspaper plant, like that of any other enterprise, depends upon its management. Under one management it may thrive and flourish, while under a different management it may be a complete failure. Certain it is that when managed by John B. Gaines, as agent for his wife alone, the cash receipts were much larger than they were during a similar period when the business was conducted under the new arrangement. The record shows conclusively that the business done in 1906 was much less than that proven to have been done in 1905, and no satisfactory explanation is given for all of this decrease. There are likewise sharp conflicts in the testimony which we cannot reconcile or harmonize; still the weight of the evidence is in favor of the contention of appellee, and, while the conclusion we have reached is not altogether satisfactory, it is in accord with the judgment of the chancellor, who was on the ground, and, no doubt, more or less familiar with the surroundings, the litigants, and their witnesses. His opinion is entitled to some weight, and, as has often been held, where the mind, upon consideration of the whole case, is left in doubt, the finding and judgment of the chancellor should and does exercise a controlling influence.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 80, denning a general demurrer as an objection to a pleading because it does not state a cause of action, and providing that a failure to make such objection is not a waiver thereof, a defendant answering to the merits without first having his general demurrer to the petition disposed of does not waive the defects in the petition.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 82*)—PRESUMPTIONS—DISCHARGE OF OFFICIAL DUTY.

In the absence of a showing to the contrary, the presumption is that a warrant issued by the judge of the county court was regular, and that the judge discharged his duty with reference thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 104; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 8*)—SUFFICIENCY—CONCLUSIONS.

A petition in an action for false imprisonment, which shows that plaintiff was arrested under a warrant issued by the judge of the county court, but which fails to allege that the judge issued the warrant without information on oath or without affidavit filed showing the nature of the offense, or that the judge did not have personal knowledge of the commission of the offense charged, but which merely avers that the judge, "without probable cause or any cause," issued the warrant, etc., does not allege that the warrant was illegally issued; the quoted averment being a mere conclusion of the pleader.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-28½; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 8*)—CONCLUSIONS.

A petition in an action for false imprisonment, which shows that plaintiff was arrested on a warrant issued by defendant as judge of the county court, and which avers, with reference to an examining trial, that there was no testimony heard by the judge tending to show that any act was done or omitted by plaintiff since the law alleged to have been violated by him went into effect, and that, though not proven guilty, defendant as judge had required of plaintiff excessive bail, etc., states only a conclusion of the pleader, and does not allege any wrongful conduct of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-28½; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

5. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 20*)—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

A petition in an action for false imprisonment which alleges that defendant as judge of the county court required excessive bail of plaintiff, and refused to permit third persons to sign to a bond, and that plaintiff was committed to jail, but which fails to allege that the third persons authorized any one in writing to sign their names to the bond as required by Ky. St. § 482 (Russell's St. § 1799), is insufficient for failing to allege that the third persons executed a power of attorney authorizing some one to sign their names to the bond and to file the power.

Action by Jones Schooler against W. P. Yancey and another. From a judgment of dismissal rendered on sustaining a general demurrer to the petition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Settle, for appellant. J. L. W. Slaughter, John W. Douglas, and J. G. Val-landingham, for appellees.

NUNN, J. This action was instituted by appellant against W. P. Yancey and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, his surety, for false imprisonment. The court sustained a demurrer to appellant's petition and dismissed his action; he failing and refusing to plead further. Omitting that part of the petition setting up the election and qualification of appellee Yancey as county court judge, the execution of bond as such, and other formal parts, it is as follows: "The plaintiff further states that on the 23d day of July, 1908, the defendant W. P. Yancey, as judge aforesaid, without probable cause, or any cause, issued a warrant of arrest against this plaintiff, and caused plaintiff to be arrested thereunder, and that on the 3d day of August, 1908, still acting as judge aforesaid, proceeded to hold an examining court to ascertain if this plaintiff had violated the law as charged in said warrant of arrest, and at said 'trial' announced that he (the judge) 'wanted the law read to the crowd,' which was done, and plaintiff says that there was no testimony whatever heard by said defendant judge tending to show that any act was done or omitted to be done by this plaintiff in Owen county or in the state of Kentucky since the said law said to have been violated by plaintiff, and known as the 'Crecelius Act,' went into effect. But plaintiff says that, although not proven guilty, the defendant Yancey, as judge aforesaid, and legally empowered to preside, hear, and determine questions of both law and fact, in violation of the Constitution, required of plaintiff 'excessive bail,' and all without testimony to support his judgment, and thereupon the plaintiff offered to execute bond as demanded by said judge, with M. H. Stonestreet and June W. Gayle, personally known to said judge to be solvent and amply sufficient, as sureties thereon, the said judge announcing publicly that either of said sureties alone is 'good,' but then and there unlawfully and over plaintiff's protest refused to permit the said Stonestreet or Gayle either of them to have their names signed as sureties to said bond, which they were willing to do and offered to do as by law required, and that said defendant Yancey, as judge aforesaid, then and there did willfully and unlawfully cause the body of this plaintiff to be committed to the jail of Owen county where he was incarcerated for hours against plaintiff's will, and without semblance of legal justification for his said act. The plaintiff says that by reason of the cruel, inhuman, and unlawful act of said judge in committing plaintiff to prison that the plaintiff has been humiliated and subjected to taunts and jeers of his fellow men, and caused to suffer indescribable mental anguish, and to expend $50 attorney fee for services in securing plaintiff's release, and that he has been damaged," etc.

At the first term of the court after the filing of the petition, appellee Yancey filed a general demurrer thereto. The court took time to consider the demurrer, and pending this motion Yancey filed his answer. At a subsequent term, by permission of the court, Yancey withdrew his answer and filed another. At the same term of the court the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company filed its separate answer, and the court disposed of the general demurrer by the following order, to wit: "The general demurrer heretofore entered to plaintiff's petition herein having been considered by the court and the court sufficiently advised, said demurrer is sustained and leave given plaintiff to amend, to which plaintiff excepts, and plaintiff, declining to amend, it is ordered that the petition be, and the same is now dismissed, and it is adjudged that the defendants recover of the plaintiff the cost here expended, may have execution, to all of which plaintiff excepts." Appellant contends that the court erred in sustaining this demurrer for two reasons: First, that appellees had waived the defects, if any there were, in the petition by filing their answers to the merits without first having the demurrer disposed of; second, that the petition stated a good cause of action. Section 93, Civ. Code Prac., is in part as follows:

"(1) A general demurrer is an objection to a pleading because it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or a defense, or because it does not state facts sufficient to support a cause of action or a defense.

"(2) Failure so to make such objection is not a waiver thereof," etc.

This section is conclusive of the first question raised by appellant.

The lower court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the petition. It will be observed that the action was instituted against appellee Yancey as county judge of the Owen county court to hold him liable for damages which appellant claims to have sustained by reason of the judge's decision against him on an examining trial, and for refusing to allow certain persons to have their names signed to his bail bond. It appears from the petition that appellant was arrested under a warrant which was issued by appellee as judge of the Owen county court. While it is not stated in the petition the substance of the warrant under which he was arrested, nor is there a copy of it filed with the petition, it is intimated that the warrant was issued against appellant for a violation of the Crecelius act. Other than this, he gave the court no statement of the nature of the offense or crime with which he was charged. Without this, the presump-arrest for appellant and caused him to be arrested, and that he, acting as judge aforesaid, proceeded to hold an examining trial to ascertain whether or not appellant had violated the law as charged in the warrant. The phrase "without probable cause or any cause," without showing any reason for such statement, is a conclusion of the pleader, and for that reason is bad. He did not allege that the judge issued the warrant without information given him on oath, or without affidavit filed in his office showing the nature of the offense for which the warrant issued, or that the judge did not have personal knowledge of the commission of the offense charged in the warrant. Therefore no fact was alleged in the petition from which the court could have been authorized to conclude that the warrant was illegally issued. The petition is equally defective with reference to the alleged examining trial. It was alleged in the petition that "there was no testimony whatever heard by said defendant judge tending to show that any act was done or omitted to be done by this plaintiff in Owen county or in the state of Kentucky since the said law said to have been violated by plaintiff, and known as the 'Crecellus Act,' went into effect. But plaintiff says that, although not proven guilty, the defendant Yancey, as judge aforesaid, and legally empowered to preside, hear, and determine questions of both law and fact, in violation of the Constitution, required of plaintiff 'excessive bail.'" This amounts only to a conclusion of the pleader. The amount of the bail required is not alleged. There is an admission in the pleading that evidence was introduced on the examining trial; but appellant was of the opinion that it did not tend to show that he was guilty of any offense, but it appears that the court differed from him on that point. There was no positive fact alleged which indicated that the lower court erred in that matter, even if the court could have been made liable for an error in its opinion, which it is not necessary to determine or discuss, as the petition is so defective that it fails to present that question for determination.

It is also alleged in the petition, in substance, that the court required excessive bail of appellant; that he could have avoided going to prison, however, but for the fact appellee Yancey refused to permit one Stonestreet or Gayle, or both of them, to have their names signed as surety to said bond, which they were willing and offered to do as by law required. It was also alleged that Yancey said at the time that either of the gentlemen would have made the bond

"No person shall be bound as the surety for another by the act of an agent, unless the authority of the agent is in writing, signed by the principal," etc. It is not alleged in the petition that Stonestreet or Gayle in this manner authorized any person to sign their names to the bail bond. It is alleged that they offered to do this as required by law. This, however, is merely a conclusion of the pleader. It should have been alleged that they executed a power of attorney under section 482, Ky. St., authorizing some one to sign their names to the bond, and the power of attorney should have been filed, or the substance of it copied into the pleading, so that the court might have determined whether or not it conformed to the requirements of the law.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Calloway County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by B. F. Stone against James Lamb and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

N. B. Barnett, for appellant. A. D. Thompson, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. The appellant, B. F. Stone, as plaintiff below, brought this action in ordinary against the appellees, defendants below, to recover a small tract of land, which he alleged was wrongfully held by them, and $50 for its detention. The appellees filed an answer, denying that the appellant was the owner of the land, and setting up title in themselves. After the pleadings were made up, a trial by jury was waived, and the law and facts submitted to the court. The court, after hearing the evidence, adjudged—and correctly, as we believe, from a reading of the record—in favor of the appellees. From the judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

The appellant did not make any motion in the court below for a new trial, nor did he the appellants are sufficient to support the verdict there can be no doubt, and so the judgment must be affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1008*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

Findings of fact in a case tried before the court will not be disturbed unless clearly wrong. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3955-3969; Dec. Dig. § 1008.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Muhlenberg County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by W. J. Ross against R. Y. Thomas, Jr. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Willis & Meredith and Johnson, Wickliffe & Johnson, for appellant. Taylor & Eaves, for appellee.

BARKER, J. The appellant, W. J. Ross, who is an attorney at law, was employed by J. J. Farmer as next friend of his infant son, Ellis Farmer, to prosecute an action against the Louisville Cooperage Company to recover damages for injuries sustained by the infant caused by the negligence of the cooperage company. Appellant instituted the action, and, when the case was called for trial, the appellee, R. Y. Thomas, Jr., who is also an attorney at law, was associated with appellant to assist in the prosecution of the action. The case was tried out before a jury, with the result that a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $3,500. To reverse this judgment an appeal was prayed to this court, and here the judgment was affirmed. Afterwards the cooperage company paid over the full amount of the judgment to John S. Miller, guardian of Ellis Farmer, and the amount was deposited in the Muhlenberg County Savings Bank. The appellant, Ross, and the appellee, Thomas, having disagreed as to what part of the judgment Thomas was to receive for his services, the latter instituted this action in the Muhlenberg circuit court, making W. J. Ross, the Muhlenberg County Savings Bank, and John S. Miller, guardian of Ellis Farmer, parties defendant. In his petition he alleged his employment and services and the agreement to pay him the sum of 20 per cent. of the amount recovered, and prayed a judgment therefor. Ross denied all the material allegations of the petition, and alleged that under his contract of employment with J.

J. J. Farmer as next friend of plaintiff agreed to give Thomas 10 per cent. of the amount recovered which was coming to the infant. This was denied by Thomas, and the issue was made up; the question being simply whether Thomas was to receive a sum equal to 10 per cent. or 20 per cent. of the judgment recovered for his services. The case was tried before the court without the intervention of a jury. The trial court held that the next friend had no authority to make a contract for the infant; but, it being proved that the services of the attorneys were reasonably worth a sum equal to 50 per cent. of the judgment recovered, this was allowed on a quantum meruit. As neither the infant nor his guardian is complaining of this allowance, it must stand; but by this we do not mean to be understood as questioning the judgment of the lower court in this particular. As between the attorneys the circuit judge awarded Thomas two-fifths of the amount allowed counsel for their fee and Ross three-fifths. From this judgment Ross has appealed.

The question is one wholly of fact, and we are unable to say that the trial court erred in sustaining Thomas' side of the contention. The record indubitably shows that Thomas did much more than one-half of the work involved in the recovery; and, if the question was one simply of merit, he should have received certainly not less than one-half of the allowance.

A careful reading of the record convinces us that no injury was done to the rights of the appellant by the judgment; and it is therefore affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. POINDEXTER et al. (Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 7, 1909.) SODOMY, (§ 1*)—NATURE OF OFFENSE—"BUGGERY."

The word "sodomy" is derived from Sodom, where the crime was prevalent, and the crime consists in carnal copulation by human beings against nature with penetration, but penetration of the mouth is not sufficient to constitute the crime, and consent does not affect its criminality, but makes the consenting party an accomplice; and buggery is the same offense between a man and a beast.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sodomy, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 2; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Caldwell County.

"To be officially reported."

C. H. Poindexter and Frank Moore were convicted of sodomy. The verdict was set aside, a demurrer to the indictment sustained, and the Commonwealth appeals. Affirmed.

James Breathitt, Atty. Gen., and Tom B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SETTLE, C. J. The appellees, C. H. Poin-dexter and Frank Moore, both negroes, were indicted in the court below for the crime of sodomy. Upon being arraigned for trial they severally entered a plea of guilty, and the trial jury by the verdict returned found them guilty, and fixed their punishment at confinement in the penitentiary two years each. After the return of the verdict appellees entered a motion and grounds for a new trial. The principal ground urged for the new trial was that in entering the plea of guilty on the trial they and their counsel labored under a misapprehension of the law, in that he and they believed the acts charged in the indictment, of which they still admitted their guilt, constituted the crime of sodomy, whereas they did not as they were advised after the trial constitute that crime or any other under the law. The circuit court set aside the verdict, and granted appellees a new trial. Thereupon they, by counsel, interposed a demurrer to the indictment, which the court sustained on the ground that the acts charged therein did not constitute sodomy, and dismissed the indictment. From the judgment entered pursuant to that ruling the commonwealth has appealed.

The acts charged against the appellees are so disgusting that we refrain from copying the indictment in the opinion. They, however, manifest the perpetration between appellees and by each against the other of an offense against nature committed by the insertion of the private part of the one into the mouth of the other and thereby producing an emission. The question for decision is: Did these acts constitute the crime of sodomy? We have in this state a statute which makes sodomy a felony, and prescribes the punishment to be inflicted for its commission, but the statute does not define the crime. As it is nevertheless a crime at common law in this state, we must look to that source to ascertain its constituent elements and meaning. However, the word "sodomy" is derived from the city of Sodom, where the crime against nature had its origin, and was universally prevalent until that city was destroyed by the wrath of God.

In 2 Bishop's New Criminal Law, § 1191, it is thus defined: "Sodomy is a carnal copulation by human beings with each other against nature, or with a beast." By many of the common-law writers sodomy is spoken of as "the infamous crime against nature"; the terms "sodomy," "buggery" and "crime against nature" being often used as synonymous. Strictly speaking, however, sodomy is the crime when committed between two human beings, or man and man, while buggery is the same offense committed by a man with a beast. Sodomy in ano is the most common form of the offense between man and man; penetration being necessary to complete the crime. Unlike the crime of rape, the consent of the victim in the crime of sodomy does not remove the criminal element, but simply makes the consenting party an accomplice. 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (New Ed.) 1146; 2 Bishop's New Criminal Law, § 1193.

After thus considering the derivation and meaning of the word "sodomy," it remains to be seen whether the form of carnal copulation adopted by appellees, viz., penetration of the mouth, constituted sodomy in the meaning of the law. With one accord the authorities hold that it does not. Again referring to Bishop's New Criminal Law, we find in volume 2, § 1194, this statement from the learned author: "A penetration of the mouth is not sodomy." The same conclusion is expressed in 2 Russell on Crimes, p. 698, Wharton's Crim. Law, § 579, and McClain's Crim. Law, § 1153, and likewise announced in the following cases, in which the question was considered and passed on, viz.: Prindle v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 551, 21 S. W. 360, 37 Am. St. Rep. 833; Mitchell v. State, 49 Tex. Cr. R. 535, 95 S. W. 500; People v. Boyle, 116 Cal. 658, 48 Pac. 800; Rex v. Jacobs, Russ. & Ry. 331. We must confess that we are unable to see why the act with which appellees stand charged is not as much a crime against nature as if done in the manner sodomy is usually committed; but as the only authorities we have been able to discover decide otherwise, we regard it our duty to follow precedent, and for this reason alone we hold that the circuit court properly held the indictment bad, and dismissed it. It is to be hoped, however, that the Legislature will by proper enactment make such an infamous act as that of which appellees confess themselves guilty a felony and punishable as such.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Laurel county.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Millie McHargue and others against John C. Jackson's administrators. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry C. Hazelwood, for appellants. E. H. Johnson, for appellees.

CLAY, C. This is the second appeal of this case. The opinion on the first appeal may be found in 106 S. W. 871. The board of trustees of the town of London, in Laurel county, Ky., passed an ordinance for the improvement of Main street by making a flagstone sidewalk, five feet in width, in front of the property owned by the appellants. The cost of the improvement, amounting to $659, was assessed against appellant's property on March 12, 1904. Appellants refused to pay said warrant, which had been sold to appellees. Thereafter appellees instituted an action to enforce their lien. Instead of a judgment for $659, the trial court rendered judgment in favor of appellees for the sum of $646, with interest from March 12, 1904, and the costs of the action. On appeal to this court, the judgment was attacked on the ground that the proceedings leading up to the construction of the sidewalk were invalid, and that a personal judgment was given against the appellants. After a consideration of the questions raised, this court held the proceedings valid, but reversed the judgment for the sole reason that a personal judgment was rendered against appellants. On the filing of the mandate in the lower court, judgment was entered setting aside the personal judgment. Appellants then paid off said judgment in full, with the interest thereon and the costs from the date of the filing of the mandate, with the exception of the sum of $100 which they offered to pay. Appellees declined to accept same in full settlement and satisfaction of said judgment, claiming that the balance was the sum of $287, which is the true amount if appellants were liable for the interest on said debt from March 12, 1904, until paid, together with the costs that accrued in said action prior to the filing of the mandate. As appellants declined to pay the full amount of the judgment, the lower court directed a sale of appellants' property. Appellants filed exceptions to the report of sale and objected to the confirmation of same. The exceptions were overtionment, the property holder is not liable for interest and costs on an apportionment warrant until the error has been corrected and the amount has been definitely fixed, either by the town authorities or the court in which an action has been brought. There can be no doubt as to the correctness of this proposition of law. Boone v. Gleason, 4 Ky. Law Rep. 1001; Conner v. Clark, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 126; Gosnell v. City of Louisville, 104 Ky. 201, 46 S. W. 722. But this question should have been raised upon the former appeal. It was not, however, made. The only questions raised were the validity of the proceedings leading up to the construction of the sidewalk, and the fact that a personal judgment had been rendered against the appellants for the enforcement of the lien. As the judgment on the former appeal was reversed for the sole reason that a personal judgment was given, the effect was to affirm the judgment of the lower court in all other respects. As the judgment provided for a recovery of the sum of $646, with interest from March 12, 1904, that part of the judgment was affirmed. The question now raised was fully determined by the judgment of this court on the former appeal, and is therefore res adjudicata.

So far as the question of costs is concerned, appellants should have made a motion in this court to have the costs retaxed in case any mistake was made in the taxation of the costs. The procedure adopted by appellants for raising the question was not proper.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is affirmed.

BROWN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 7, 1909.)

1. LARCENY (§ 55*) — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a prosecution for stealing chickens held not sufficient to authorize a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 534*) — CONFESSION AS EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN CONVICTION.

A confession, by one accused of stealing, that he stole the articles he was charged with stealing, is not sufficient, standing alone, to justify a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1222; Dec. Dig. § 534.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Will Brown was convicted of stealing, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

lant seeks the reversal of a judgment entered by the court below upon the verdict of a jury finding him guilty of chicken stealing and fixing his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary one year. The indictment in the usual terms charged appellant with the larceny, and that the value of the chickens exceeded $2. He filed three or more grounds in support of his motion for a new trial, and the same are now urged for a reversal.

The complaint that the jury were not properly instructed is not well taken. The instructions correctly presented the law, if the case should have gone to the jury. We also find that the complaint as to the admission of incompetent evidence is unsupported by the record.

The only tenable ground relied on for the reversal asked is that there was not sufficient evidence to support the verdict and that the court should have peremptorily instructed the jury to find appellant not guilty, and this ground we shall proceed to consider. The evidence of the commonwealth conduced to prove that appellee is a negro boy 18 years of age; that Jackson and wife, who are also negroes, lost 11 chickens, of "frying size," a year or more before appellant was indicted. The latter lived with his mother on a lot adjoining that of the Jacksons. The wife of Jackson testified that on Sunday afternoon, the day before the loss of the chickens was discovered, she saw appellant and another negro boy chasing a hen belonging to her and some of the chickens from his mother's lot. She did not claim that the boys caught any of the chickens, but, on the contrary, admitted that when she spoke to them they quit running after the chickens. Whether appellant was merely driving the chickens from his mother's lot, or was after them for some other purpose, does not appear. The loss of the chickens was not discovered until after Jackson's wife returned from a neighbor's the following day. The manner of their disappearance was not stated, nor does it appear that any effort was made by Jackson and wife to ascertain whether or not the chickens had wandered to the premises of a neighbor.

Testimony was furnished by a negro woman of the neighborhood that, two or more months after the loss by the Jacksons of their chickens, she purchased of appellant four or five chickens; but there was no attempt by the commonwealth to prove that they were of the size, age, or description of the chickens lost by the Jacksons. The only evidence that tended in the remotest degree to connect appellant with the theft of the Jackson chickens was the statement, made by Jackson, that money, that what appellant then said amounted to a confession of guilt. They were in a quarrel, and it is hardly reasonable that such an admission would have been made by appellant to an enemy and the owner of the chickens, who might be expected to immediately have him indicted for stealing the chickens. There was also a discrepancy between the testimony of Jackson and that of his wife as to the time of the loss of the chickens. She said they were lost two years before appellant was indicted, while the husband fixed the time at something over a year. Moreover, if appellant took the chickens, it was not reasonable that he would have kept them two months or more before selling them. It would have been far more natural for him to have sold them at once.

So, weighed as a whole, there was nothing in the evidence, aside from his alleged confession, which can fairly be said to connect appellant with the theft of the chickens. Manifestly, his confession alone, if made at all, was not sufficient to authorize his conviction. To have done so, it must have been accompanied by other proof showing that the crime with which he was charged had been committed. There was not evidence sufficient to prove that the chickens of the Jacksons were stolen. Viewed as a whole, the evidence more strongly tends to establish a feud or negro quarrel between appellant and the Jacksons than it does a theft of the chickens. In other words, there was not enough evidence to authorize a submission of the case to the jury. Therefore the court should have given a peremptory instruction directing a verdict for appellant.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with the opinion.

CITY OF LATONIA v. EBENSCHWEIGER. (Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 7, 1909.)

Action by Mary Ebenschweiger against the City of Latonia. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. A. Glenn and J. L. Elliston, for appellant. L. T. Applegate and Lewis L. Manson, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. Ohio avenue in Latonia runs practically east and west. McKee avenue runs practically at right angles to it, but does not cross it. Along the north side of Ohio avenue there was a cinder walk. There was no walk on the south side. The street had not been macadamized. Mary Ebenschweiger lived on the north side of Ohio avenue, and near where McKee avenue runs into it from the south. In putting down a sewer the city had dug a ditch in Ohio avenue, and when the sewer had been put in, and the ditch filled up, the earth settled, leaving a hole about 2½ feet wide, and from 1 to 2 feet deep, which was on the side of the street, and not far from the cinder walk. On November 28, 1907, Mary Ebenschweiger, as she returned home, stopped to visit a friend on McKee avenue, and after seeing her friend came on from her friend's house to her house walking northward on McKee avenue. When she got to the intersection of Ohio avenue, she undertook to cross the street so as to get to her house. It was so dark that she could not see, and in crossing the street in the dark she veered a little from a direct line across the street, and fell into the hole referred to, breaking some of her ribs, injuring her arm, and lacerating the muscles of her chest. She brought this suit against the city to recover for her injuries. A trial was had which resulted in a judgment in her favor for the sum of $1,000. The city appeals.

The instructions given by the court are, in substance, the same as those approved by this court in City of Latonia v. Hall, 103 S. W. 354. They fairly submitted the case to the jury. But it is earnestly insisted that under the evidence the jury should have been peremptorily instructed to find for the defendant. The plaintiff testified that she saw the hole there four or five weeks before, but that she left her house every morning before light, and went to her work at an infirmary, going along the cinder walk, and returning in the evening after dark the same way; that at the time she fell into the hole it was so dark that she could not see the hole, and that she fell into it before she knew that she was near it. This court has held in several cases that, where the person injured lives

See City of Covington v. Manwaring, 113 Ky. 592, 68 S. W. 625. But that is not this case. Here the plaintiff was walking in the dark, and could not see where she was. While she knew there was a hole in Ohio street, she did not know she was near it. If the hole was of the size stated by the plaintiff, it was a dangerous defect in the street. It had existed for months. The rule that cities must keep their streets in reasonably safe condition is based on the ground that people must be expected on the streets, and that, too, at times when they will not be able, by the exercise of ordinary care, to avoid the danger incidental to an unsafe condition of the street. The case of Maysville v. Gullfoyle, 110 Ky. 670, 62 S. W. 493, is not unlike this case. There the plaintiff admitted that she knew of the hole into which she fell, but she was going along the street hurriedly in the dark, on a mission of necessity, and fell into the hole before she knew she was near it. In City of Glasgow v. Gillenwaters, 113 Ky. 140, 67 S. W. 381, a barbed wire was stretched across the street. The plaintiff was injured by it in the nighttime. It was held that he could recover, and that, without being chargeable with contributory negligence, he might leave the sidewalk to cross the street at any point. The same rule was, in effect, applied in City of Louisville v. Brewer's Adm'r (Ky.) 72 S. W. 9. It was a question for the jury under the evidence whether the street was reasonably safe for travel by persons using ordinary care, and whether the plaintiff exercised ordinary care in crossing it as she did under the circumstances. These matters were fairly submitted to the jury by the instructions of the court, and the verdict is not against the weight of the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. GAGEN.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 7, 1909.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 75*)—LICENSES—DISCRETION—"ARBITRARY" EXERCISE—APPEAL.

An unreasonable exercise of discretion by a city license board in refusing a saloon license is within the rule authorizing an appeal in case the discretion of the board has been arbitrarily exercised.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 487.]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 59*)—LICENSES—SALOON—LOCATION—PROXIMITY TO CHURCH.

saloon for 10 years and the premises had been used for saloon purposes for 50 years, it was an abuse of discretion to deny petitioner's application for a new license because a church had been constructed in the meantime on the opposite side of the street.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

"To be officially reported."

On rehearing. Petition overruled.

For former opinion, see 116 S. W. 745.

HOBSON, J. In Thompson v. Koch, 98 Ky. 400, 83 S. W. 96, it was held that it should appear that the judgment of the board was the exercise of an arbitrary discretion before the circuit court would disregard its judgment. In Hodges v. Metcalfe County Court, 116 Ky. 527, 76 S. W. 381, it was said that the action of the county judge in granting a license will not be interfered with unless manifestly erroneous. In Commonwealth v. Campbell (Ky.) 107 S. W. 797, it was said that the board is invested with broad discretion in granting or refusing licenses, and that its decision, in the absence of an abuse of discretion, ought to prevail. In the opinion in this case the following language was used: "And unless it appears from the evidence heard by the board that the discretion lodged in it has been abused, or, to put it in another way, not reasonably exercised, the court should not reverse or set aside its finding." We are unable to see that there is a substantial difference between any of these statements of the law. The purpose of allowing an appeal in cases of this sort is to correct any injustice that may have been done by the action of the board, and when the decision of the board is not a reasonable exercise of discretion it is within the meaning of the rule heretofore laid down the arbitrary exercise of discretion.

We have upon the petition for rehearing carefully read the record a second time, and adhere to the statement of the facts of the case therein made. We are satisfied from the proof that the real objection of those who made the remonstrance is not so much to the appellee's saloon as it is to there being any saloon across the street from the church. In other words, the real reason of the remonstrance is that there should not be a saloon on the opposite side of the street from the church. A saloon has existed at this point for 50 years. The appellee has been there for 10 years. The church has been built there in the meantime. A saloon business, like any other, is built up at a place, and the appellee should not be deprived of the business which he has built up upon a mere sentiment. The saloon business is legalized in Louisville, and there must necessarily be saloons in the neighborhood of churches, where the churches are built in the business part of the city.

Under all the facts, we are of opinion that the board abused a sound discretion in refusing the license.

Petition overruled.

CUNNINGHAM v. AYER & LORD TIE CO.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 30, 1909.)

NEGLIGENCE (§ 32*)—DUTY TOWARDS LICENSEES—DRUNKEN PERSONS.

The captain of a steamboat moored to a bank sent an employé to fetch decedent to do some work on the boat. Decedent had been drinking, but was not drunk, and voluntarily started for the boat with the employé. On the way they visited a saloon, took a drink, and decedent bought a bottle of whisky. When they reached the boat, another had been engaged to do the work, but decedent remained on the boat, and, after drinking from his bottle, attempted to pass from one part of the boat to another along a narrow passageway, and fell into the river and was drowned. Held, that in view of the fact that the boat was moored to the bank, and that decedent was not in such a drunken condition that his mentality was impaired, those in charge of the boat were not required to guard him to prevent his falling overboard, and the owner was not liable for his death.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McCracken County.

"To be officially reported."

Death action by Minnie Cunningham, administratrix of D. C. Cunningham, against the Ayer & Lord Tie Company. There was a directed verdict for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hendrick, Miller & Marble, for appellant.
C. C. Grassham and Wheeler, Hughes & Berry, for appellee.

LASSING, J. Appellant instituted suit in the McCracken circuit court wherein she sought to recover damages for the death of her husband, who fell from the steamer Margaret in June, 1907, and was drowned. The petition alleged that his death was due to the negligence and carelessness of the employes of appellee in taking him to and upon said boat, and leaving him unattended in a place of danger while he was in a drunken and practically helpless condition. Appellee answered, denying liability, and pleaded contributory negligence as a defense. In a reply the affirmative matter in the answer was traversed, and upon the issue thus joined the case was submitted to a jury. At the close of appellant's evidence a peremptory instruction was given to find for defendant, which was done. From the judgment predicated upon this verdict, this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellee was the owner of the towboat Margaret, which was then undergoing repairs at the wharf or landing on the river front opposite Paducah. The services of a brick mason were needed to lay the furnace work, and D. C. Cunningham, being skilled in that line, was called upon by the agents of appellee to render this service. The facts as brought out in the evidence, and upon which appellant relies, as shown by the record, are as follows: The said boat was to be inspected at 2 o'clock on the day upon which deceased was drowned. On the morning of that day Capt. Baker directed Joe Lord, one of their employes, to find or get Daniel Cunningham, or Uncle Dan, as he was commonly called, and have him complete the brickwork around the boiler. It appears that Nimmo, another employe, heard this order delivered, and whether on his own initiative, or under the direction of Lord, to whom the message was delivered, he set out to find Uncle Dan. He located him at his own home, asleep. He had been drinking, and Nimmo was so notified by Mrs. Cunningham. She aroused her husband, and he and Nimmo went into his kitchen, where they each took a toddy, and Mrs. Cunningham stated, in substance, to Nimmo that if her husband was kept away from liquor, and not allowed to drink any more, he would be all right. He was not drunk at this time, though drinking. Together they walked from his home to the river, and on the way passed a saloon, in which they took a drink of beer, for which Uncle Dan paid, and he also purchased a pint of whisky in this saloon. From there they went on to the river, where they met Lord. While waiting for a boat to take them across the river, Uncle Dan stumbled or staggered into the water, although he did not fall. He was taken out, and they all got into a boat, and together went across the river to the Margaret. When they went upon the boat, they found that the services of another brick mason had been secured, and that Uncle Dan was not needed. They went back into the boiler room where the work either had been or was being done, and Uncle Dan took another drink of whisky from his bottle. Some time thereafter, just exactly how long it is not clear, while attempting to walk from the boiler room to another part of the boat along a passageway something less than three feet in width, he fell into the river and was drowned.

For appellee it is insisted that, conceding all that appellant claims, she has failed to make out a case; that none of the authorities relied upon by appellant are in point, or support her contention; that the relation of master and servant did not exist between appellee and deceased, but that, at most, he was a mere licensee; that he was invited or requested to go over to appellee's boat and perform certain services; that he accepted the invitation and accompanied the servant of appellee from his home to the river, and was there by appellee provided with a means of conveyance over to the boat; that he was so long in reaching the boat that appellee had procured the services of some one else to do the work, and hence did not employ deceased; that at this time, although drinking, and to some extent under the influence of liquor, the proof does not show that deceased was in the condition as he is described in the pleadings, to wit, drunk and helpless, but, on the contrary, he was able to go about, and, as far as could be observed, knew what he was doing. He was familiar with boats, it appearing in the evidence that he was skilled in the line of business for which his services on this occasion were sought, and, while he had stumbled into the river before being brought over to the boat, there was nothing in his conduct after reaching the boat that would indicate to the employes of appellee on the boat that there was danger that he would fall overboard.

There is no merit in the claim that the servants or agents of appellee took deceased from his home over to the boat. On the contrary, the proof shows that the employment was offered him, and he voluntarily went to accept same, and this with the full knowledge, consent, and acquiescence of his wife. Nor was appellee in the least responsible for his being under the influence of liquor. Upon this point the record shows that he was partially so when he left home; that he voluntarily contributed to intensify this condition before reaching the river, and again after arriving at the boat. Certainly appellee is in nowise responsible for these acts on the part of deceased, and this brings us, then, to the question as to whether or not appellee owed deceased a duty to guard and protect him while on its boat, knowing that he was more or less under the influence of liquor. If it did, then the peremptory instruction should not have been given, and this is the sole question in the case.

This court has on several occasions been called upon to pass upon the degree of care which common carriers are required to exercise in dealing with trespassers found upon their cars or about their premises in a drunken condition. In the case of C. N. O. & T. P. R. R. Co. v. Marrs, 119 Ky. 954, 85 S. W. 188, 70 L. R. A. 291, 115 Am. St. Rep. 289, deceased was run over and killed by a switch engine of appellant in its yards, and it developed in the proof that those in charge of the switchyard had seen him helped from a train while in a drunken condition, and later found him lying in a stupor between the tracks in the yard in the nighttime. In upholding the ruling of the lower court in refusing to give a peremptory instruction, this court held that, having found deceased in this condition, the employes of the company could not arouse him, and start him wandering in the dark through the network of switches and tracks, and then afterwards run over him, and say they owed him no lookout duty because he was a trespasser; but it was their duty when they aroused him have relieved itself from all liability by exercising ordinary care to avoid injuring deceased while in its yard, although in an intoxicated condition. In the case of Fagg's Administrator v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 111 Ky. 30, 63 S. W. 580, 54 L. R. A. 919, a trespasser was ejected from a freight train in a drunken and helpless condition in a cut on a dark night, and he was later run over and killed by a train which followed, and it was held that the company was liable because, notice of the drunken and helpless condition of the deceased having been brought home to the company, it was its duty to have exercised ordinary care to save his life, and that its failure so to do rendered it liable. Here, again, the negligence upon which a recovery was justified was the failure of the company to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring deceased after notice of his helpless and drunken condition was brought home to it. In the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Ellis, 97 Ky. 330, 30 S. W. 979, deceased was put off a train in a drunken and helpless condition because he refused to pay his fare, and was later run over and killed by another train. This court held that the company was liable in damages for his death because deceased was put off the train in a cut, away from a station, with banks and fences on either side of the track, and at a time when he was in such a helpless condition, mentally and physically, that he was incapable of taking care of himself, and because the deceased at the time he was ejected had neither the physical ability to avoid danger nor mental capacity to discern it. In this case all the authorities in this state bearing upon this question are reviewed, as are also authorities in many other states; and the court there concluded from a consideration of all such that if the deceased was ejected from the train when he was in such a physical or mental condition from intoxication or other cause as to render him incapable of caring for himself, and the officers or agents in charge of the train knew of his then helpless condition, and, knowing this, put him off in a place where he would necessarily or probably be exposed to death or great bodily harm from passing trains, and he was thereafter run over and killed, the company would be liable. In all these cases where a liability has been upheld, it has been upon the ground that the negligent acts complained of were the proximate cause of the resulting injury, and in each particular case it will be observed the party injured was so intoxicated as to be mentally incapable of appreciating the danger in which he was placed and physically unable to avoid it.

Measured by this rule or standard, did ap-perer or stumbled into the water, although he did not fall. Considered by itself, this would tend to show that he was drunk to such an extent as that he did not have entire control over his movements, and yet in going from his home to the river, a distance of some eight or ten squares, there is no evidence from his movements or deportment that he was not capable of taking care of himself; and after the river had been crossed, and he had gone upon the boat, there is no evidence tending to show that he could not intelligently direct his movements, and, in fact, it is urged with a great deal of earnestness that his fall into the river, which is supposed to have resulted in his death, was due to heart failure or a stroke of apoplexy rather than to his inability to walk along the passageway which he was traveling when he fell into the water, nor is there any evidence which would justify the conclusion that he was drunk to such an extent that his mentality was impaired. Hence we conclude that the facts brought out in evidence do not bring this case within the rule announced in the various decisions of this and other courts, relied upon by appellant, and, while the record shows conclusively that deceased was drinking, it fails to show that he was drunk enough to bring his case even within the rule announced in the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Ellis, in which the principle here contended for was carried to its extreme limit. Appellee had been guilty of no act of negligence or breach of duty in offering deceased employment. It had not exposed him to danger, but he had voluntarily gone to the boat to accept employment. The boat was not moving, but was moored to the bank, and was in as safe a condition as a boat of that character could reasonably be made. Appellee did nothing to cause deceased to fall into the river, and is no more responsible for his doing so than it would have been for an injury he might have received had he fallen from his doorstep when starting from his home with the agent of appellee, or had he fallen in the street and hurt himself, or when he staggered into the water at the river's edge, if he had fallen and been drowned before he could have been rescued. It will hardly be contended that, had the accident happened to him in any of these ways, appellee would have been responsible therefor; and yet there would be as much reason for so holding in these cases as in the case at bar. A different case would be presented if, after deceased had voluntarily gone to the boat, he had been taken charge of by the officers or other agents of appellee and exposed to the danger, and by means thereof met his death. It might then, with some degree of while in an intoxicated condition, and 2., upon discovering that he was intoxicated after he had reached his house, should tell him that he had decided not to have the work done, and B., when in the act of leaving, should fall out of the door and down the steps to his injury, would A. be responsible therefor? Clearly not; and the case at bar is no stronger. A man cannot voluntarily drink to intoxication, and while in this condition negligently bring an injury upon himself, and hold another responsible therefor on the ground that the latter should have guarded or restrained him so as to have prevented the injury, unless such person owed him some duty. In such a case the injury is the result of his own wrong, and he alone must suffer. In the case at bar it does not appear that appellee owed any duty to deceased, and the trial court, having so found, did not err in taking the case from the jury. Judgment affirmed.

STEVENSON v. MOORE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 4, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 11*) — DOCKETS — TRANSFER OF CAUSES.

The trial judge is not required to transfer a case involving a complicated account to the equity side of the docket on his own motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 29; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. JURY (§ 88*)—COMPETENCY—PECUNIARY INTEREST—STOCKHOLDERS.

Stockholders in a bank are not disqualified to sit as jurors in a case in which the bank's teller alone is interested.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Daviess County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Allene Stevenson against E. W. Moore. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert G. Hill, for appellant. Little & Slack and Ben D. Ringo, for appellee.

BARKER, J. The purpose of this litigation was the recovery by appellant, Allene Stevenson, of $1,000 from E. W. Moore, which she alleged he without legal authority retained out of money of hers coming through his hands. The facts out of which the litigation grows are, briefly, as follows: When the plaintiff, Allene Stevenson, arrived at the age of 21 years, she desired to borrow the sum of $5,000, to secure which she proposed to execute a mortgage upon a business house which belonged to her in Owensboro, Ky. She alleged in her petition that she borrowed the money from the appellee, E. W. Moore, and delivered to him her notes secured as aforesaid; that out of the proceeds coming to her he paid certain debts which she owed and other debts which members of her family owed, and gave her some cash, but retained out of her money the sum of $1,000. The pleadings were somewhat confused and prolix, but, when properly analyzed, this was the sole issue presented, to wit: Whether or not Moore kept back $1,000 of the money he proposed to loan the appellant. This issue was submitted to a jury under instructions which we shall hereafter notice, with the result that they returned a verdict in favor of appellee, Moore. During the trial of the case Moore in his testimony showed that he did not loan the appellant any money whatever, but that he was the teller of Eagle Bank, and, when applied to for the loan, he told the appellant that he had no money to loan, but referred her to Henry Cline as one who would probably negotiate the loan for her for a consideration; that she did go to Cline and paid him $85 to secure the money for her; that Cline indorsed the notes himself, and discounted $2,000 of them to the Mechanics' Bank and $3,000 to the Eagle Bank. He then testifies to the various notes which were the indebtedness of appellant and those of her family, which were paid by her direction, and the amount that he paid over to the appellant in cash; thus showing, if his testimony was true, that she received all the money coming to her. He testifies that he was acting only in a friendly way, and had no interest in the transaction himself. These various notes made a rather complicated account, and undoubtedly the trial court would have transferred the case to equity had there been a motion so to do; but, in the absence of such a motion, we do not think he erred in failing to transfer it upon his own motion.

Appellant complains that the court refused to allow her counsel to interrogate the jurors as to whether they were stockholders in the Eagle Bank. We do not think this was error. The Eagle Bank was not a party to the litigation or interested in it in any way. While Moore was teller in the bank, he was sued as an individual, and the stockholders in the bank were no more interested in the issue than the stockholders in any other bank in Owensboro would have been.

Appellant also complains that the court erred in refusing to allow her brother to answer certain questions propounded to him by her attorneys. No avowal is made as to what the witness would have said had he been allowed to answer the questions, and we have uniformly refused, in the absence of such an avowal, to reverse the case for the supposed error.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"(1) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff turned over to the defendant the notes mentioned in the pleadings and evidence for $5,000 signed by herself and one Henry Cline, negotiable and payable at the Bank of Commerce, and defendant either advanced to her the money on said notes and retained $1,000 of same or any less sum, or that the defendant discounted said notes in the Mechanics' Bank and Eagle Bank, or either of them, and retained out of the proceeds $1,000 or any less sum, then the jury should find for the plaintiff such a sum as the defendant retained in excess of the interest thereon not exceeding $1,000.

"(2) If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant accounted to the plaintiff for all the money he received belonging to the plaintiff, and paid it to her or to persons or banks for her, or if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant did not cash the notes and charge her any usury, then they should find for the defendant."

These instructions we think fully cover the law of the case. They include the theories which were developed in the pleadings and the evidence: First, that contained in appellant's petition, that she undertook to borrow $5,000 from appellee, and that he paid over to her and for her use only $4,000, leaving $1,000 due her; and, second, the theory that was developed by the appellee that he merely aided her in discounting her notes and paying off her indebtedness. The court told the jury (1) that if they believed appellee advanced to her the money on her notes and retained a thousand dollars of the same, or any less sum, they should find for the plaintiff the sum so retained; and (2) if the defendant discounted the notes for appellant in the Mechanics' or Eagle Bank, or either of them, they should find for the plaintiff such sum that he retained in excess of the interest thereon, not exceeding $1,000. The first instruction is criticised because the court used the words "in excess of the interest thereon." These words relate only to the second proposition in the instructions; that is, if the defendant discounted the notes for appellant in the banks. The interest means the discount retained by the banks. Of course, appellee was not to be held liable for that sum, whatever it was. Therefore he was to be allowed a credit for whatever discount was retained by the banks, and the appellant was to have a judgment for the remainder. The instruction is perfectly plain and lucid, and covers the whole case, and no jurymen of ordinary mind could misunderstand it. The second instruction is merely the converse of No. 1, giving affirmatively appellee's side of the case.

Appellant insists in her brief that she was entitled to a judgment non obstante veredicto, and produces certain figures from the evidence which she insists show that her motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict should have been sustained. It is hardly necessary to say that a judgment non obstante veredicto must be based upon what the pleadings show, and not from deductions from the evidence; but we do not think the evidence justifies the assumption on the part of appellant that the verdict of the jury did her an injustice. From the testimony of E. W. Moore, the cashier of the Eagle Bank, and from the testimony of B. H. Poindexter, the cashier of the Mechanics' Bank & Trust Company, we have constructed the following statement of appellant's account, showing the amount that she received as the proceeds of her notes and what became of the money. Of course, we do not undertake to say that this evidence is true, where it is contradicted by the evidence of appellant, if it is so contradicted; but, if this evidence is true (and of this the jury were the judges), then appellant has no just cause of complaint of the verdict against her. The following is the statement of her ac-

Mr. Poindexter does not give the item of $70 discount, but his omission to do so is clearly a mistake on his part. Of course, the bank charged the usual discount on the notes, and, if this addition is not made to the account, it would appear that the bank still owes appellant $70; but this would not affect appellee's account with appellant, as the evidence, without contradiction, shows that he had only to do with the $670 cash paid to Henry Cline. Of this $670 Cline deducted $65 as pay for his trouble in assisting appellant to raise the money on her notes. Cline, after deducting $65, turned over to appellee, for the benefit of appellant, his check for $605. Of this appellee paid a check of appellant on Eagle Bank for $385.62 in favor of the Pearson Drygoods Company, leaving a balance of $219.38, which he placed to her credit in the Eagle Bank, and which he testifies she checked out in small amounts. As said before, if the foregoing account, which is supported by the evidence for appellee, be correct, appellant received every penny of the $5,000 which was due her, certainly all of it which was due from so much as went into the hands of appellee. Whether the evidence was true was submitted to a jury, and they found adversely to appellant's interest. She cannot now be heard to complain that the court did not of its own motion transfer the case to the equity side of the docket. On the surface it was much to her interest to try her case against the money lender before a jury rather than before an accountant; and it was this consideration, no doubt, which the result.

Judgment affirmed.

ANDERSON v. DAWSON et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 6, 1909.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 343*)—DEFICIENCY IN QUANTITY OF LAND SOLD—REMEDY.

Where land is sold in gross, and the words stating the quantity are mere words of description, there can be no recovery for a deficiency in the absence of fraud and mistake, unless the deficiency is substantial; but, where the sale is by the acre, a recovery may be had for any deficiency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 1024; Dec. Dig. § 343.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 343*)—DEFICIENCY IN QUANTITY OF LAND SOLD—REMEDY.

A deed with covenant of general warranty described the land by courses and distances as "containing 74.30 acres, more or less." The vendor represented that the land consisted of 74.30 acres, while, in fact, it consisted of a little over 68 acres. Held that, as the sale was in gross, the purchaser could not recover for the deficiency in the absence of fraud or mistake.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Logan County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by B. C. Anderson against S. N. Dawson and another. From a judgment of dismissal rendered after sustaining a demurrer to the amended petition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Browder & Browder, for appellant. S. R. Crewdson, for appellees.

CLAY, C. On September 11, 1906, appellee S. N. Dawson and his wife executed and delivered to appellant B. C. Anderson a deed conveying the following tract of land: "A certain tract or parcel of land in Logan county, Ky., on the waters of Little Whippoorwill creek and bounded and described as follows: Beginning at a rock in center of land in Faullin line corner to Fletcher; thence N. 85¼° W. 39.17 chains with Fletcher line to a rock in Rob't Carr's line; thence with Carr's line S. 57¼° E. 20.25 chains to a rock corner to Carr; thence S. 45¼° W. 5.80 chains, to center of Schochoh road; thence S. 35° E. 16.52 chains; thence S. 69° E. 5.00 chs.; thence S. 77° E. 14.26 chains to rock; thence N. 4° E. 30.00 chs., to the beginning, and containing 74.30 acres, more or less." The consideration set forth in the deed is the sum of \$2,311 paid and payable as fol-forever, with covenant of general warranty releasing all rights of homestead and dower." Some time thereafter appellant Anderson instituted this action against appellees S. N. Dawson and E. F. Dawson to recover the sum of \$248.33 $\frac{1}{4}$, charging in his petition that he purchased said land from appellees, not as a whole, but by the acre, and that said transaction was based on the valuation per acre; that appellee represented to appellant, and the deed in addition thereto states, that the land conveyed consisted of 74.30 acres; and that, by the terms of said deed, appellee warranted the said title and the quantity of said land to be 74.30 acres, whereas, as a matter of fact, said tract of land contains only 68 acres, 3 rods, and 30 poles, a difference of 5.3625 acres. He further charges that he agreed to and did pay \$46.31 per acre for said land, and, there being a deficit of 5.3625 acres, appellee is indebted to him in the sum of \$248.33 $\frac{1}{4}$. Thereafter appellant filed an amended petition, stating certain facts, with reference to the note for the deferred payment, and charging that the note was negotiable, and that on the date of its delivery the appellee then knew of the deficiency in the land, and, with the view of preventing appellant from recovering on account of said deficiency, when the same should be by him subsequently discovered, sold and transferred said note to one Herring, so that the same would pass out of appellee's hands and into the hands of an innocent holder for value, thus depriving appellant of any defense to said note. A demurrer was sustained to the petition and the amended petition, and, appellant declining to plead further, the petition was dismissed. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

In the well-considered case of Harrison v. Talbot, 2 Dana, 258, the various kinds of cases in actions to recover for a deficit in the quantity of land sold are classified as follows: "First, sales strictly and essentially by the tract, without reference in the negotiation or in the consideration to any estimated or designated quantity of acres; second, sales of the like kind, in which, though a supposed quantity by estimation is mentioned or referred to in the contract, the reference was made only for the purpose of description, and under such circumstances or in such manner as to show that the parties intended to risk the contingency of quantity, whatever it might be or how much soever it might exceed or fall short of that which was mentioned in the contract; third, sales in which it is evident from extraneous circumstances of locality, value, price, time, and the conduct and conversation of the parties that they did not contemplate or intend to risk more than in gross,' are in fact sales by the acre, and so understood by the parties." The court then says: "Contracts belonging to either of the two first-mentioned classes, whether executed or executory, should not be modified by the chancellor when there has been no fraud. But in sales of either the latter kinds an unreasonable surplus or deficit may entitle the injured party to equitable relief, unless he has by his conduct waived or forfeited his equity." In the recent case of Anthony v. Hudson (Ky.) 114 S. W. 782, the description was as follows: "First. The northwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section thirty-four (34) in township fifteen (15) north of range eight (8), east of third principal meridian, containing according to United States survey two hundred (200) acres. Second. * * * Containing according to the United States survey three hundred and sixty (360) acres." In that case it was held that the expression, "containing according to United States survey" 200 acres in the one instance and 360 acres in the other instance, constituted mere words of description. The court in the latter case used the following language: "A contract for the sale of land must be gathered from the writing. No outside conversation or oral statement, which is not directed to the end of impeaching a writing for fraud or mistake, which takes place before the writing is drawn, can explain, modify, or change it."

In the case of Russell v. Phillips (Ky.) 22 S. W. 220, the following from Worvelle on Vendors (volume 2, p. 925) was quoted with approval: "Mere enumeration of quantity at the end of a particular description of the premises, where there has been no fraud or gross mistake, has ever been regarded as matter of description only, and not of the essence of the contract; and in such cases the purchaser is not entitled to an abatement of price because on survey the tract is found to contain a less number of acres than that specified." There is nothing on the face of the deed to show that the sale was made by the acre, and it is manifest that the words, "containing 74.30 acres, more or less," are simply words of description. The question, then, is: Is the deficit sufficient to justify a recovery without an allegation of fraud or mistake? The petition merely charges that appellee represented, and in addition thereto the deed states, that the land so conveyed consisted of 74.30 acres. In a number of cases this court has granted relief where there was a deficit of 10 per cent. or over. Smith v. Smith, 4 Bibb, 81; Shelby v. Smith's Heirs, 2 A. K. Marsh. 504; Hazlip v. Austill, 4 Ky. Law Rep. 982; Hall v. Ely (Ky.) 76 S. W. 848. In these cases it was held that the deficiency, considering the quantity and tity were mere words of description, this court has never allowed a recovery in the absence of an allegation of fraud and mistake where the deficit was less than 10 per cent. Of course, if the deed itself showed that the transaction was a sale by the acre and there was a deficit, a recovery could be had. As the deed under discussion uses the language, "and containing 74.30 acres, more or less," and as under the uniform ruling of this court such words are regarded as words of description, it is manifest that, where the deficit is as small as it is in this case, there can be no recovery. That being the case, the mere representation by the appellee that the land sold contained 74.30 acres, in the absence of fraud or mistake, would not justify a recovery any more than the language employed in the deed itself.

We deem it unnecessary to pass upon the other questions raised, as the demurrer was properly sustained for the reasons set out above.

Judgment affirmed.

Wilson and wife, of the county of Leslie and state of Kentucky, of the first part, and John Ledford, of the second part. I, R. M. Wilson, and wife, do sell and convey to John Ledford, of the county of Harlan, a certain tract or parcel of land containing one hundred and fifty acres of land, more or less, lying on the waters of the Middle Fork on Sam's Branch in Leslie county, and fifty dollars to be paid November 1, 1903. I, R. M. Wilson, and wife, of the first part, do bind ourselves to make a deed to said land, Sam's Branch land, when John Ledford, of the second part, pays the purchase money on said land. Said land is to stand good for the purchase money until paid. [Here follows description.]" Ledford took possession of the land and settled on it. On April 28, 1902, he sold the Tennis Coal Company the mineral rights under the land, and bound himself to make it a deed when the purchase money was paid, and executed to it a title bond to this effect, which was regularly acknowledged and then recorded. The bond which he had from Wilson was then also recorded, although it had not been acknowledged, and was not, therefore, a recordable paper. On November 25, 1903, the purchase money for the mineral rights, amounting to $125, having been paid him, he executed to the Tennis Coal Company a deed therefor, which was duly acknowledged and recorded. He made to Wilson two payments on the purchase money due him, and when there was still $144 due Wilson, he assigned the bond Wilson had given him to W. N. Asher, in November, 1904, and thereupon Asher paid to Wilson the balance of the purchase money due from Ledford to him, and Wilson executed to Asher a deed for the land. The Tennis Coal Company then brought this suit against Wilson, Asher, and Ledford, setting up the above facts, and praying that the mineral rights purchased by it be conveyed to it and that its title thereto be quieted. On final hearing the circuit court adjudged it the relief prayed, and the defendants appeal.

Wilson knew of the purchase of the mineral rights by the Tennis Coal Company when he made the deed to Asher. He had been approached by the agent of the company and requested to make it a deed. Asher also knew of the purchase of the coal company when he took the assignment of the bond; for he says himself, when asked how long before this time was it that Ledford told him that he had sold the mineral rights off the land, he answered, "It couldn't have been over four or five days; he said he had contracted it." The bond executed by Ledford and the deed which he had made were both recorded, and so he had also constructive notice. It is insisted that, as Ledford had not paid Wilson all the purchase money, he had nothing to sell the coal company. The bond does not properly bear this construction. Wilson had a lien on the land for the balance of the purchase money due him; but it was Ledford's land, subject to this lien. He had not a legal title; but he had the equitathat part which had been sold for the unpaid purchase money. The part which Asher bought was worth much more than the balance due Wilson, and as the Tennes Coal Company had the older equity, and he purchased with notice of its claim, the circuit court properly adjudged its rights superior to his.

Judgment affirmed.

ROUNDS BROS. v. McDANIEL.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 4, 1900.)

1. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 6*)—WAGES OF CHILD—RECOVERY BY PARENT—EXPENSES.

Where the father of a nonemancipated minor sues to recover wages, the child's employer is entitled to have deducted from the recovery sums paid for board and clothes not furnished by the father.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. § 83; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 3*)—DUTY TO SUPPORT.

A parent is bound by positive law to protect, educate, and support the child.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 5*)—EARNINGS OF CHILD—RIGHTS OF PARENT.

A parent, being legally bound to support his child, is entitled to the child's services and earnings during minority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. § 70; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

4. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 5*)—EARNINGS OF CHILD—RIGHTS OF FATHER—RELINQUISHMENT.

A parent may lose his right to his child's earnings by failing to provide a home for his child if he is able to do so; by such cruel conduct, ill treatment, or neglect as forces the child to abandon his home; by becoming so degraded or dissolute that his child cannot in morals or decency live with him; or by emancipation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 72, 73; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

5. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 16*)—"EMANCIPATION"—"EXPRESS EMANCIPATION"—"IMPLIED EMANCIPATION."

"Emancipation" of a child is the relinquishment by a parent of control and authority over his child, conferring on the child the right to his earnings and extinguishing the parent's legal duty to maintain and support the child. Emancipation is "express" when the parent voluntarily agrees with the child, who is able to take care of and provide for himself, that he may go from home, earn his own living, and control his earnings, or when the father voluntarily transfers the custody and keeping of the child to another. An express emancipation cannot be renounced by the parent. An "implied emancipation" results where the parent, by his acts or conduct, impliedly consents that the minor may leave home and shift for himself; the father, under these circumstances, however,

6. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 16*)—EMANCIPATION—REVOCATION.

A child having reached the age when he could make his own living, the father consented in 1902 that he might leave home and continue in his employment. For nearly two years thereafter the child so remained with the father's knowledge and consent, during which time he received his own wages and disposed of them as he desired. The father did not object to the employment nor demand his wages until 1906, nor did he request the child to return to his home. Held, that the father's delay barred his right to revoke the implied emancipation thereby established.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Daviess County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by A. J. McDaniel against Rounds Bros. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney, for appellant.
W. E. Aud and J. R. Hays, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. This case presents the interesting question: What acts and conduct of a father will constitute an emancipation of his minor child so as to deny the father the right to recover the child's wages during his minority?

The mother of Byrne McDaniel died in 1900, when he was about 12 years old, leaving his father, the appellee, A. J. McDaniel, with six children to care for. The father, who was a poor but kindly disposed man, a carpenter by trade, did not own any property, and found it necessary to place the other children—all of whom were younger than Byrne—in orphan homes; but after doing so he aided in their support. After this the father and Byrne boarded with a sister of the father, and for two or three years thereafter Byrne worked at different places, earning a few dollars a week, which he contributed towards his support. In 1902 Byrne, who was then about 14 years old, commenced to work for appellant, Rounds Bros. They paid him small wages in the beginning, but, finding him to be an industrious, sober, well-behaved, and capable boy, gradually increased his compensation, until at the time this suit was brought in 1907 he was receiving some $8 or $10 a week. During the first two years that he worked for them he lived with his father at his aunt's, and contributed all or the greatest part of his wages towards paying for his board and clothing. In 1904, Byrne becoming dissatisfied with the accommodations received at his aunt's, left her house and procured board and lodging elsewhere. The evidence does not disclose any substantial reason why Byrne left the home tribute anything toward his support or maintenance or expend anything in his behalf. In fact, he did not, after leaving his aunt, need the assistance of his father, as he was earning sufficient money to take care of himself. His father did not object to his leaving home, nor did he make any provision or arrangement for another home for him, although it cannot be said that his acts or conduct or treatment of Byrne furnished any sufficient reason why Byrne should have abandoned the home provided for him by his father. His father was at all times aware of the fact that Byrne was working for the Rounds Bros., and knew that from 1904 to 1906 they paid him his wages, and that he was expending them for his own use and benefit; but he did not object or make any demand that the wages be paid to him until April, 1906, when he notified Rounds Bros. that they must pay him what the boy earned. This they declined to do, and in 1908, he brought this action to recover the amount Byrne earned after he notified the Rounds Bros. to pay the wages to him. The lower court rendered a judgment in favor of the father against the Rounds Bros. for the amount of the boy's wages after the notification, less the sum expended during this time by Byrne for board and clothes. It may be here stated that, if the father had not emancipated his son and was entitled to his wages, no just complaint could be made of the judgment. Having the view the lower court did of the law of the case, it was correctly held that there should be deducted from the wages received by the son the amount necessary to defray his expenses. Culberson v. Alabama Construction Co., 127 Ga. 599, 56 S. E. 765, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 411, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 507. From the judgment the Rounds Bros. prosecute this appeal, and ask a reversal upon the ground that the father had emancipated his son, and therefore was not entitled to recover his wages, and in this insistence they are joined by Byrne. The father's contention is that the facts before stated are not sufficient to amount to an emancipation of his son, and consequently he was entitled to recover from the Rounds Bros. the boy's wages after he notified them that he claimed them. He also makes the further point that even if it should be held that, by permitting his son to leave home and earn his own living, he impliedly emancipated him, yet he had the right at any time during the child's minority to revoke this constructive emancipation and resume parental control and authority, and that, after he had so revoked it by notifying the Rounds Bros. that he claimed his son's wages, the status of parent and child was re-established the same as if there had never been any emancipation.

tions of each, has furnished so much interesting matter for text-book writers, and has so frequently been considered by courts of other jurisdictions, that there is ample precedent and authority, both ancient and modern, from which to gather and formulate the general rules of law applicable to this relation. But this case presents some features of the law that are not so well settled, and concerning which there is conflict of authority. The duties and obligations of parent and child are, in a sense, at least reciprocal. Upon the parent is imposed by nature, as well as law, the obligation of supporting and caring for his offspring. As said by Blackstone (volume 1, p. 447): "The duty of parents to provide for the maintenance of their children is a principle of natural law; an obligation, says Puffendorf, laid on them not only by nature herself, but by their own proper act, in bringing them into the world, for they would be in the highest manner injurious to their issue, if they only gave their children life that they might afterwards see them perish. By begetting them therefore they have entered into a voluntary obligation to endeavor, so far as in them lies, that the life which they have bestowed shall be supported and preserved." In Schouler on Domestic Relations, p. 415, it is said: "Three leading duties of parents as to their legitimate children are recognized at the common law: First, to protect; second, to educate; third, to maintain them. These duties are all enjoined by positive law, yet the law of the natural affection is stronger in upholding such fundamental obligations of the parental state." From this duty resting upon the parent comes the right to the services of the child during his minority, intended to be at least in some measure compensation for the care and attention bestowed upon the child in infancy; and this right of the parent to the services of the child during his minority is everywhere recognized. Jones v. Tevis, 14 Ky. 25, 14 Am. Dec. 98; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Willis, 83 Ky. 57, 4 Am. St. Rep. 124; Illinois Central R. Co. v. Henon (Ky.) 68 S. W. 456; Blackstone, Commentaries, vol. 1, p. 454; Schouler on Domestic Relations, p. 334; Tyler on Infancy & Coverture, p. 200; 29 Cyc. 1623; 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of L. p. 1039.

It is equally well settled that the parent, although entitled to the services and earnings of his minor child, may relinquish or surrender this right: First, by failing to provide for his child a home if he is able to do so; second, by such ill treatment, neglect, or cruel conduct as forces the child to abandon his home; third, by becoming so degraded or dissolute a character that his child cannot in ner, or if he had so grossly neglected his parental duties as to cause him to leave his home, or if his life was so unworthy or discreditable that his son could not in decency or self-respect longer continue to recognize his authority, we would have little difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the father could not, after driving him away, or by his acts or conduct forcing him to shift for himself and make his own living, thereafter lay claim to his earnings. All the books are agreed upon this point, and indeed, in the absence of authority, we could have no doubt that under a state of case like this the father could not have the assistance of the courts to aid him in securing the services or wages of his child whom he had compelled by neglect, cruel treatment, or dissolute habits to secure another home. 29 Cyc. p. 1627; Godfrey v. Hays, 6 Ala. 501, 41 Am. Dec. 58; Nightingale v. Withington, 15 Mass. 272, 8 Am. Dec. 101; Swift & Co. v. Johnson, 138 Fed. 867, 71 C. C. A. 619, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1161; Tyler on Infancy & Coverture, p. 200. But the facts of this case do not warrant us in putting our decision upon any of these grounds, and so, if the judgment below is to be reversed, it must be because the father had emancipated his son. The doctrine of "emancipation," looking at it from a legal standpoint, is a recognition of the right of the parent to relinquish control and authority over his child to whose custody and service he is entitled; or to surrender, if he so elects and desires, to his minor son, who is capable of making his own living, the right to do so, and the privilege of receiving the wages that he earns. When this right of emancipation has been granted, it follows as a matter of course that the person for whom the child labors may pay him his wages, and that the child may do with them as he pleases. In other words, when a child has been emancipated, he occupies the same legal relation towards the parent as if he had arrived at full age. The legal duty of the parent to maintain and support him and defray his necessary expenses is extinguished, and so is the right of the parent to claim the services and wages of the child.

There are two kinds of emancipation that may be termed "express" and "implied." We should say that an "express emancipation" takes place when the parent freely and voluntarily agrees with his child, who is able to take care of and provide for himself, that he may go out from home and earn his own living and do as he pleases with his earnings, or when he willingly transfers to another the custody and keeping of his child without reference to his age. Where the emancipation is expressly agreed upon, the parent cannot afterwards renounce or set aside the the services of his child. An "implied emancipation" results when the parent, without any express agreement, by his acts or conduct impliedly consents that his minor son may leave home and shift for himself, have his own time, and the control of his earnings, and it may be inferred from and shown by circumstances. But where the child leaves home and goes out to make his own living under the assumption that his parent has emancipated him, his rights to his services and earnings are not absolute, as in the case of an express emancipation, and the parent may, by taking timely action, resume parental authority and reclaim the services of his child, but he must not delay until his implied emancipation has ripened into an express relinquishment, or wait until it would be hurtful to the best interest of the child to interfere with his individual aims and plans. It should, however, be kept in mind that whether or not the father emancipates his minor child rests with the father, and not with the child. The father may by his acts or conduct relinquish parental control and authority, but the child of his own volition, in the absence of mistreatment or other like cause, cannot sever the relation so as to deny the father the right to his services and wages during his minority.

Contenting ourselves with these broad statements of general principles, we will proceed to inquire whether the facts of this case authorize us in holding that the father had emancipated his son. After Byrne had reached an age when he could make his own living, and was mentally and physically able to do so, his father voluntarily consented that he might leave his home, and continue in the employment of the Rounds Bros. for whom he had been working, and for something like two years he remained in their services, with the knowledge and consent of his father. During this time he received his own wages, and made such disposition of them as he desired. That he was an industrious, economical, and capable boy, there is abundant evidence. He had the respect and confidence of his employers, and in a business way was rapidly advancing. His father did not object to his employment until 1906, or demand his wages until that time. He did not request him to return to his home, nor did he manifest any particular interest or concern in his welfare. He seemed to recognize that his son was well situated and comfortably provided for, and that his usefulness was being promoted by the service he was engaged in and the interest his employers were manifesting in his welfare, and so he was willing to give him an opportunity to make his own way in the world.

In our opinion these facts were not suffcient to establish an express emancipation, such as the parent could not afterwards revoke or set aside; but they do show the son left home under circumstances that amounted to an implied emancipation. But, when the appellee attempted to resume parental control and authority after the expiration of more than a year, it was too late to reclaim the right. In this time the interest and welfare of the child had become an important factor in determining the rights of the parties. In judging a case like this, the court will not look exclusively to the rights of the parent, but will consider what is best for the child. The father, when his child was in some measure at least a burden to him, voluntarily allowed him to go out and care for himself, and after the child, prompted by prudent and industrious motives, had become more than self-sustaining, sought to withdraw the consent he had given. To permit him to do so would, under the circumstances of this case, be detrimental to the best interest of the child. To deprive the boy of his wages or force him to abandon his employment would seriously check his aspirations and impair, if not destroy, the fine prospects for future success that were opening up to him by reason of his attentive, honest, and sober habits.

We do not wish to extend this doctrine of implied emancipation to cases which do not justify its fullest application, and do not mean to hold that every time a child who is old and strong enough to work becomes tired of or dissatisfied with his home he may leave, although without objection on the part of his parents, and live at some other place and work for other persons, and thereby sever the obligation he owes to his parents and destroy their right to his services and wages. Minor children cannot in this way cancel the duty they are under to the parent, who by acting promptly may reclaim the services of the child and the right to his earnings; but the parent must interpose his authority within a reasonable time. When a father gives freedom to a grown boy and tells him, in effect, if not in words, to go out and make his own living, and be his own man, and the boy, acting on this implied consent or direction, does commence for himself the battle of life, and is successfully meeting all its requirements, the father will not, unless he acts in seasonable time, be permitted to reclaim the boy's services or resume the parental authority he surrendered.

The conclusion we have reached finds support in the following authorities: In Abbott v. Converse, 4 Allen (Mass.) 530, the court said, in considering a similar question: "The basis of the father's right to the services of his children is his duty to support and educate them; but this duty is subject to many modifications growing out of the circumstances and conduct of the parties, and the right is not absolute or inalienable. It may be forfeited by misconduct, but cases may arise where the forfeiture would be held to be temporary. The cases referred to establish the doctrine that it may be transferred to the minor. It is to be regarded as being in the nature of property, and, as a minor may hold other property independently of his father, there seems to be no valid reason why he may not thus hold the right to his own time and earnings. As he may hold it by a contract with his father under seal, or for a valuable consideration, there is no more reason for holding that the father may revoke this contract, at his pleasure, than any other contract. On principle he should be as fully bound by it as by a conveyance of land or other property to his child. As it may be held by gift or license, without any consideration, there is no reason why the gift, when accepted, should be any more revocable, without the consent of the donee, than any other gifts."

In Nightingale v. Withington, 15 Mass. 272, 8 Am. Dec. 101, Chief Justice Parker said: "But where the father has discharged himself of the obligation to support the child, or has obliged the child to support himself, there is no principle, but that of slavery, which will continue his right to receive the earnings of the child's labor. Thus, if the father should refuse to support a son, should deny him a home, and force him to labor abroad for his own living, or should give or sell him his time, as is sometimes done in the country, the law will imply an emancipation of the son, and, although it will not enable him to contract to his prejudice, it will give him the benefit of such contracts as are made with him for his services, and a payment to the son, in such circumstances, will be a good discharge of such contract."

The same learned judge, in Whiting v. Earle, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 201, 15 Am. Dec. 207, said: "Although the general principle is clear that a father is entitled to the earnings of a son while under age, yet the court thought it equally clear that he might transfer to the son the right to receive them. This is necessary for the encouragement of young men, and it is often convenient for a father, wishing to be relieved from the burden of supporting his son, to allow him in this manner to support himself. Where such a contract is entered into without any fraud, for the advantage of the son, on the principles of common justice, and according to decided cases, he is entitled to the profits of his own labor. We go so far as to say that where a minor son makes a contract for his services on his own account, and the father knows of it and makes no objection, there is an implied assent that the son shall have his earnings." To the same effect is Morse v. Welton, 6 Conn. 547, 16 Am. Dec. 73; Wodell v. Coggeshall, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 89, 35 Am. Dec. 391.

In Beaver v. Bare, 104 Pa. 58, 59 Am. Rep. 567, the court said: "The exercise of parental authority is not necessarily for the profit of the parent, but for the advantage of the child; the duty of service by the child being deemed necessary to the proper exercise of parental authority for its own good. Although we still recognize the right of the father to the personal services of his children, that right is simply incidental to the duty of the father to discipline and direct them. His right to personal custody and personal service is secured to him therefore in order that through them, prompted by natural affection, he may successfully impart to them habits of industry, methods of thrift, and the means of personal success in life. * * * The right to their service being merely for their good, whenever the father finds their interest, or his own, better subserved by their emancipation, he can liberate them."

In Schouler on Domestic Relations, p. 346, it is said: "The father may by his own delay forfeit the right of action for his son's wages; as where the minor agrees to work at certain monthly wages to be paid to himself, and the father, knowing of the agreement, gives no notice of his objection, but waits until the work has been done and payment is made to the child, before making a demand. But if the father has given seasonable notice of his dissent and demand to the stranger hiring his son, the fact that the son continues to work against his express dissent, and that the stranger notified him to come and take his son away, and he neglected to do so, will not preclude him from recovering the wages." And so on page 370 the learned author says: "It is a well-settled rule in this country that if the parent absconds, turns his child out of doors, or leaves him to shift for himself, the son is entitled to his own wages; and our courts are very liberal in allowing children to avail themselves of any breach of parental obligation so as to earn an honest livelihood by their own toil. The presumption raised in such cases may be termed a presumption of necessity. So where the husband abandons his child to the care of his mother, his subsequent claims for the earnings of either are to be regarded with very little favor. Even slighter circumstances, which impute no misconduct to the father, but evince a consent for his son to leave the parental roof and go into the world to seek his own fortune, are often construed into emancipation."

In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Davis (Ky.) 105 S. W. 455, which was an action by the father to recover damages for a personal injury sustained by his minor son while in the employment of the railroad company, the court said: "Assuming that the boy was under 21 years of age, did his father consent or acquiesce in his employment? It may be admitted at the outset that the father did not know of the original employment, but his own testimony shows that, while his son was engaged at work on the railroad in making a fill, the father went out to where he was at work and saw him performing the duties of his employment. The father talked to the foreman, whom he told the boy was only 16 years of age, and upon the foreman's saying in reply that he hated to give him up, he was such a good boy, the father left without saying more, and went home. * * * Afterwards the father testified that his son came home on Sunday and then went back to work, and the evidence shows without contradiction that the boy was paid off several times before he was hurt. During all the time the father lived within 2½ miles of where his son was working in the employ of the railroad, and made no protest or objection to his remaining at work on the fill. We think that this was a consent on the part of the father to the employment of his son by the appellant. He had no right, if he objected to the employment, to remain silent about it until his son was hurt, and then complain that the employment was without his consent. He allowed the boy to draw his own wages, and it does not alter the case that the money was delivered to the father. If the father allowed the boy to keep the money, this was a practical manumission of him. If he required him to bring it home, this was a ratification of the employment."

After carefully considering this case, our conclusion is that the father was not entitled to the wages earned by his son, and therefore, the whole court sitting, the judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the petition.

EVERSOLE v. FIRST NAT. BANK.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 11, 1909.)

1. HOMESTEAD (§ 51*)—PROPERTY CONSTITUTION—SETTING ASIDE—PLEADING.

Under St. 1909, § 1702 (Russell's St. § 4661), exempting a homestead including the dwelling house to a bona fide housekeeper with a family, an owner is not entitled to homestead unless he occupies the property, unless he is temporarily absent from it, and a pleading praying for the setting aside of a homestead to a married woman, which fails to allege that she is a housekeeper, or that she and her husband occupy the land, does not show her right to a homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

2. DOWER (§ 46*)—BAR—FORECLOSURE—INCHOATE INTEREST.

A married woman's inchoate right of dower in land is not affected by a judgment against her husband and a third person for a debt secured by a mortgage on the land, which adjudges that the debt is a lien on the land, and directs that the interests therein, except her interest, shall be sold to pay the judgment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Perry County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by the First National Bank against W. C. Eversole and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Della Eversole appeals. Affirmed.

Eversole & Eversole, for appellant. Bailey P. Wootton, Jesse Morgan, and Greene, Van Winkle & Schofield, for appellee.

NUNN, J. On July 9, 1907, W. C. Eversole executed and delivered a note to R. C. Newberry, promising to pay him $700 on or before the 1st day of July, 1908. The note was transferred for a valuable consideration to appellee bank. To secure the payment of the note, the Eversoles, together with their wives, duly executed and delivered to Newberry a mortgage of even date with the note, upon two tracts of land in that county. One of the tracts belonged to W. C. and the other to H. C. Eversole. Appellee brought this action, January 6, 1909, to recover a personal judgment and to enforce the mortgage lien on the land for the payment of the judgment. The only defense made was by Della, the wife of H. C. Eversole. She filed an answer, the first paragraph of which controverted the allegations of the petition in so far as they applied to her. The second paragraph is as follows: "The defendant Della Eversole states: That she and her husband, H. C. Eversole, were duly and legally married in the town of Hazard, Ky., on the 7th day of November, 1906; that at the date of said marriage she was an infant, only 16 years of age, and at the date of the execution of the mortgage sought to be foreclosed herein she was an infant only 17 years of age; that they have constantly resided together as husband and wife since the date of said marriage; that on the 1st day of November, 1908, and before the institution of this action, there was born to them an infant son, who was named Berry; that her family now consists of herself, her husband, H. C. Eversole, and their infant son, Berry. She states that at the time of her marriage, her husband, H. C. Eversole, was the owner of the tract of land first described in plaintiff's petition, and that she and her husband, H. C. Eversole, have continuously cultivated and held said boundary of land for the purpose of making and earning their support from the date of their marriage until the present, and are still continuing to so use said land. She states: That they have no other land, in this state, from which to earn a support for themselves and family. She states that said boundary of land is not worth more than $500 and was acquired before the debt sued on was created. Her husband, H. C. Eversole, and W. C. Eversole, formed a partnership to do a general merchandise business in the town of Hazard, Ky. That said $700 note sued on was a debt created by them to R. C. Newberry as part payment on a stock of merchandise. That through the undue influence exercised over her and the persuasions used by her husband, H. C. Eversole, she was induced, against her will, to sign said mortgage. That at the time she signed the mortgage she did not know the import thereof. That she was then and is now an infant under the age of 21 years, and the said R. C. Newberry and the officials and agents of the plaintiffs herein knew that she was an infant and unable to contract. That by reason thereof the said mortgage is void and of no effect, and should be canceled, set aside, and held for naught, and said property set apart to her and her family as a homestead. She states that the partnership formed by W. C. Eversole and H. C. Eversole continued until the 15th day of December, 1908, at which time they became heavily involved financially, and since said date all the property owned by her husband, H. C. Eversole, except the boundary of land first described in plaintiff's petition, has been sold to satisfy the debts of said firm. She states that her husband, H. C. Eversole, has failed and refused to unite with her in this defense, and she elects to defend this action alone for the benefit of herself, her husband, H. C. Eversole, and their infant son, Berry Eversole." She then prayed that the mortgage be canceled to the extent that it affected the H. C. Eversole land, and that it be set apart and adjudged to her and her family as a homestead. The court sustained a demurrer to the answer, and rendered judgment against H. C. and W. C. Eversole for the debt, and adjudged a lien on the land, directing that the interest of the defendants, other than Della, in the land, be sold to pay the judgment, and Della alone appeals.

She asks a reversal under the provisions edged and recorded in the same manner as conveyances of real estate," etc. Appellee's demurrer to her answer admitted that she was under 21 years of age, and she contends for that reason she was not bound by her signature to and acknowledgment of the mortgage, and it is invalid, and therefore the homestead, the tract of land owned by her husband, was not affected by the mortgage, and that appellee did not secure a lien upon it. Conceding this claim of hers to be true, it does not follow that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to her answer. By section 1702, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 4661), it is provided that the exemption of a homestead is only to a bona fide housekeeper with a family, and the homestead shall include the dwelling house. The owner of property is not entitled to a homestead, unless he occupies it, except he be temporarily absent from it. Brown v. Martin, 4 Bush, 47, Carter v. Goodman, 11 Bush, 228, and many other cases to the same effect could be cited, but we deem it unnecessary. As will be observed appellant did not allege in her answer that she was a bona fide housekeeper, or that she kept house at all, or that she and her husband resided upon or occupied the land. It may be, in so far as it appears from the pleading, that she never occupied the land as a homestead. The tenor of her pleading is to the effect that her husband owned the land and cultivated it for the purpose of making their support. The inference is that they lived elsewhere and had never occupied the land since their marriage. If the allegations in her pleading are true, she has an inchoate right of dower in the land, which is not affected by the judgment appealed from.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

WALLACE v. SOUTH COVINGTON & C. ST. RY. CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 5, 1909.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

An employé, who had worked four months in a street car barn, was injured in the daytime while at work by falling into a pit which was necessary to enable workmen to go under the cars to make repairs. He was aware of the existence of the pit and the fact that it was not guarded, but by walking too near the pit and the unexpected swinging of a screen which he and another were moving he was thrown into the pit and injured. Held, that plaintiff assumed the risk of his injury.

ant on a directed verdict, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Horace W. Root and B. F. Graziani, for appellant. L. J. Crawford, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. C. W. Wallace was a carpenter in the service of the South Covington & Cincinnati Street Railway Company, working at its barn, where the street cars are repaired. There were five tracks in the barn. In the center track, to enable the workmen to get under the cars to be repaired, a pit had been constructed four feet deep, about as long as a car, and as wide as the track. Wallace and another man were taking the screen off a car which stood on this track west of the pit. The screen was heavy and made of soft wire, which made it wobble as they carried it; Wallace being at one end and his assistant at the other. He had the east end. As he was passing by the pit, the wobbling of the screen caused him to lose his balance and he fell into it; the pit being unguarded. He brought this action to recover for his injuries, which were very painful. At the conclusion of his testimony the court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant, and his petition having been dismissed, he appeals.

He was the only witness introduced as to how the accident occurred. His testimony is as follows: "Q. Tell the jury what you did in reference to it and how you fell in the pit? A. I caught hold of one end of the screen and walked back. Q. How did you walk back? State how you walked back. A. If you will allow me to describe it in my own way, I took the screen in both hands and walked back this way (indicating) and watched him, and the pit was right here in front of him, and I carried the screen walking backwards, and I wanted to give him a chance to swing his end out, and as I done that he swung clear and I stepped away from the hole, and just then it wobbled and it throwed me back. Q. Did you remember of that pit being there at that time? A. I couldn't think of it for that moment. Q. State, if you will, Mr. Wallace, why, if you had forgotten it, what caused you to forget. A. A man in working that way is very apt to forget anything of that kind. He can't have his mind at two things. Q. State to the jury what distracted your mind. A. The wobbling of the screen and giving him a chance to get out. Q. Who? A. The man who was helping me. Q. Was your mind on that? A. Yes, sir. Q. Will you state what, if any, difficulty there was were stepping backwards, whether or not your mind was on that work, or did you remember of this hole or pit being there? A. I didn't remember of the hole. My attention was watching him, watching the wabbling, at the same time balancing myself. Them screens, if you get them down and twist them, they wabble, and they throw you out of your balance, if you don't watch; that is what they do. That is what throwed me down, and if I fell right square down across the track I would have busted my brains out; but I am naturally quick on my heels, and I turned and swung myself around and fell lengthwise in it."

Wallace had been working in the barn about four months. The pit was put in there a few days after he entered the service of the company. He knew of its existence, as he had worked around it for months. The accident occurred in daytime, and there was no defect of light. His own testimony shows that he was not acting under any emergency, but for his own convenience, with full knowledge of the pit, was walking along close beside it carrying a screen, and wanted to give his assistant a chance to swing his end out so that he could swing clear. His assistant thereupon swung clear, and the plaintiff stepped away from the hole, but just as he did this the screen, coming back like a pendulum, threw him off his balance and he fell in the pit. His own evidence shows clearly that he knew at the time that the pit was there, for as a precaution he stepped away from it, and in endeavoring to give his assistant a chance to swing his end out he fell into the pit himself, because he and his assistant walked nearer to it than they should have done. In Harper v. Illinois Central R. R. Co. (Ky.) 115 S. W. 198, a case not unlike this, where the court sustained a peremptory instruction, it was said: "The master is not an insurer. Every employé in every business must assume some of the risks and dangers that are incident to it, or that may happen even with the utmost care on the part of the employer to prevent or guard against them. Liability ought not to be fastened on the master for every injury that his servants receive. He ought not to be held responsible for accidents that inflict harm, when they are caused by the servant's inattention to his duties or his careless performance of them. If this rule were established, there would be no limit to the employer's liability, and the employé would be absolved from the duty of exercising care to prevent injury to himself." The case is practically "An ash pit is a necessary adjunct of the railroad business in cleaning out engines employed by the company, and it is necessarily used at all hours of the day and night; and persons employed by the railroad company in such yards are bound to take notice of the existence, location, condition, and manner of use of such ash pits, and assume all the risks ordinarily incident to such location." It was necessary to have a pit in the barn, so the workmen could get under the cars. The plaintiff was well aware of its existence, and his falling into it was due to no negligence on the part of the defendant. He knew it was not guarded, and cannot complain that there were no guards to protect him from falling into it. He knew he would fall into it if he walked close to it and lost his balance.

Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 4, 1909.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 198*)—MANAGEMENT OF TRUST ESTATE—PURCHASE BY TRUSTEE.

One occupying a fiduciary relation to an estate cannot purchase at his own sale the property of the cestui que trust, whether the sale is private or under decree of court; and where he does so purchase he holds the property as trustee for the beneficiaries.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Graves County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by T. J. Baker and others against Etta Lane and others. From a judgment granting partial relief, T. J. Baker and others appeal, and defendant G. H. Latham files cross-appeal. Reversed.

Oliver, Shemwell & Reeder, for appellants.
James T. Webb and B. C. Seay, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. T. J. Baker died intestate in 1896, leaving surviving him five children, one of them the wife of G. H. Latham. Two of the children, Etta Baker (now Etta Lane) and Jettie Baker, were 13 and 8 years old, respectively, when their father died. The decedent did not leave any personal property subject to the payment of his debts, but owned 40 acres of land, worth between $600 and $800. G. H. Latham was granted letters of administration on the estate, and also qualified as guardian of the infants, Etta Lane and Jettie Baker, and soon thereafter instituted a suit under section 428 of the Civil Code of Practice to settle the estate of the decedent. In this action the land was sold, and purchased by Latham for $50. In 1907, all of the children were of age, except Jettie Baker, and she, by her then guardian, H. W. Jones, and three of the other children, brought this suit against Latham and the other children, in which they set up the sale to Latham, and asked that it be set aside, that the infant Jettie Baker be adjudged entitled to a homestead, and that the land, which was alleged to be indivisible, be sold, and the proceeds distributed among the heirs.

To this action Latham filed an answer and counterclaim, in which he pleaded the statute of limitations, and also set up that as guardian of Etta Lane he made a final settlement with her when she became 21, and paid to her $76, the amount in his hands as guardian, which sum, together with other amounts paid her during her infancy, was derived from the rents of the land after he purchased it. He further averred that since he purchased the land he had made valuable and lasting improvements on it, of the value of $300, and he asked that, if the sale be set aside, he be adjudged a lien on the land for the value of the improvements, and for $50 that he paid as the purchase price of the land, and for $28 that he expended for burial expenses, and also that the land be sold subject to the homestead right of Jettie Baker. He also averred that while Jettie Baker was an infant of tender years he was compelled to take charge of her, and that her income, which was only one-half of the rents of the 40 acres of land, was not sufficient to maintain and support her, and that he was obliged to and did expend in her nurture and care $275 over one-half of the rents of the land, and for this sum he asserted a lien on her interest in the land.

The record does not disclose any settlements made by Latham as guardian of the infants, Etta Lane and Jettie Baker; but there is a check, dated January 14, 1904, payable to Etta Baker for $76.20, which recites that it "is a settlement as guardian in full of all liability." It appears from the evidence that the reasonable rent of the land from the time Latham bought it was about $50 a year, and that Latham, as guardian, paid out for Jettie Baker some $275 more than her half of the rents of the land would amount to. The court adjudged that T. J. Baker and Babe Baker, now Reid, two of the five children of T. J. Baker, were not entitled to any interest in the land, and the petition as to them was dismissed, and Latham was adjudged to be the owner of their two-fifths interest in the land. Etta Baker, now Lane, was adjudged to be the owner of an undivided one-fifth, Jettie Baker the owner of an undivided one-fifth, and Early and Late Latham, the children of Allie Latham, who was a daughter of T. J. Baker, were awarded the other one-fifth jointly. It was further adjudged that Jettie Baker had abandoned her homestead in the land, and that, as the land was in the possession of Latham, Etta Lane, and the two Latham children, and indivisible, it should be sold.

From so much of this judgment as awarded Latham the interest of T. J. Baker and Babe Baker (Reid), they appeal; and Jettie Baker, by her guardian, appeals from so much of the judgment as refused to allow her the land as a homestead. Latham prosecutes a cross-appeal, insisting that the lower court should have dismissed the petition and adjudged him to be the owner of the land, or allowed him a lien for the several amounts paid out by him as before stated.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

1. When Latham bought the land, he was administrator of the decedent whose land was sold, and also guardian for two of the children, who owned an undivided interest in the land. The general rule is that a person who occupies a fiducial relation to an estate cannot purchase at his own sale, whether it be made privately or under decree of court, the property of the cestui que trust, and, if he does so purchase, he will be treated as holding the land or property as trustee for the beneficiaries. Grider v. Payne, 9 Dana, 188; Faucett v. Faucett, 1 Bush, 511, 89 Am. Dec. 639. If, however, the beneficiaries are of age, and freely and understandingly consent to the purchase by the trustee, their action and conduct might estop them from attempting to avoid the sale. It is not, however, necessary to consider this view of the case. It is true Latham averred in his answer that T. J. Baker and Babe Reid were over 21 years old at the time the sale was made, and were parties to the action and consented to the sale and purchase; but these averments were denied by them, and this placed upon Latham the burden of establishing the facts necessary to work an estoppel. The transcript before us does not exhibit the record or orders of court in the suit in which the land was sold, nor is there any evidence showing that these heirs consented to the sale or purchase. With the record in this condition, we cannot say that T. J. Baker or Babe Reid are estopped from asserting their right to an interest in the land.

2. It appears that the $50 he paid for the land at the judicial sale was expended in the payment of costs and fees; but as Latham in good faith brought an action to have the land sold to settle the estate, and paid out of his own means the purchase price of $50, he should have a lien on the land for this money, with interest thereon from the time it was paid, and also a lien for the $28 paid by him as administrator on account of the funeral expenses of T. J. Baker. But these liens are subject to the homestead right of Jettie Baker.

3. The evidence is not sufficient to warrant us in holding that Latham is entitled to anything on account of the improvements put on the land after his purchase. If any improvements were made, they were paid for out of the rents.

4. We do not find in the record any settlement made by Latham as guardian of Jettie Baker, and therefore cannot say how much, or what estate, came into his hands as guardian; nor, indeed, is it shown how much she received from him as guardian, except by a statement that he paid her one-half the rent. But, without reference to this, he is not entitled to charge her interest in the land with any amount expended by him as guardian for her use and benefit. Ky. St. § 2034 (Russell's St. § 4151); Fidelity Trust Co. v. Butler (Ky.) 91 S. W. 676; Wilson v. Fidelity Trust Co. (Ky.) 97 S. W. 753.

5. As the land is of less value than $1,000, Jettie Baker is entitled to the use and enjoyment of the whole of it as a homestead during her minority, or until she marries. Being an infant, she could not abandon her homestead rights. When the homestead right of Jettie Baker terminates by her death, marriage, or arrival at age, the land should be sold, and out of the proceeds Latham be first paid $78 and interest, and the balance of the proceeds be divided equally between the heirs of T. J. Baker.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed on the original and cross-appeal, and the lower court will enter a judgment in accordance with this opinion.

LEXINGTON RY. CO. v. WOODWARD.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 11, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1097*)—SUBSEQUENT APPEALS—LAW OF CASE.

The decision of the Court of Appeals on a former appeal, directing certain instructions to be given on remand, is binding on the Court of Appeals on a subsequent appeal, if the evidence is the same on the second trial; nor can it be contended on a subsequent appeal that the pleadings, which were the same as on the former trial, did not warrant the instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4358-4368; Dec. Dig. § 1097.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 509*)—PERSONAL INJURY—PHYSICAL EXAMINATION.

In a personal injury action against a street railroad company, a duly qualified expert, who had examined plaintiff, could testify to any physical fact he found to exist, if evidence thereof was admissible under the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2312, 2313; Dec. Dig. § 509.*]

3. DAMAGES (§ 158*)—ISSUES AND PROOF—NATURE OF INJURY.

Though plaintiff sued for injuries to her hip and spine, any symptom or condition of the lower part of her leg which would corroborate the testimony as to the condition of the spine and hip was admissible, so that a physician could testify that plaintiff's left leg below the knee was smaller than her right, which was, in his judgment, caused by a lack of nutrition.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Action by Anna Woodward against the Lexington Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

tiff again for $3,000. The defendant appeals.

The opinion on the former appeal is the law of the case. It was incumbent on the circuit court to give the instructions directed by this court, and this court is as much bound by the opinion on the former appeal as the circuit court. There was no substantial change in the evidence, making it proper for the circuit court to vary the instructions which had been indicated by this court. It is said that the pleadings do not warrant the instructions; but the pleadings were not changed after the former appeal, and that question cannot be made now. There was abundant evidence to warrant an instruction to the jury allowing them to find damages on account of loss of time, and upon the whole case we cannot see how the defendant could have been prejudiced by the wording of the instructions.

The plaintiff introduced on the last trial Dr. Buckmaster, who had made an examination of her person and testified that her injuries were in his judgment permanent. The witness qualified himself to testify as an expert, and the examination which he testified he made was sufficient to enable him to give an opinion on the extent of her injuries. He could testify to any physical fact which he found to exist. He was properly allowed to state that the left leg below the knee was smaller than the right, and that this indicated in his judgment a lack of nutrition. It is true the plaintiff sued for an injury to her spine and hip; but any symptom on the lower part of the leg, which would be confirmatory of the testimony as to the condition of the spine and hip, was properly admitted. It often happens in cases, especially of spinal injury, that the effects of the injury are shown in other parts of the body, and if there were no such evidence in other parts of the body it would be a circumstance indicating that the plaintiff's spine was not so badly affected as she claimed.

On the whole case, we are of opinion that the defendant had a fair trial on the merits, and that none of its substantial rights were prejudiced.

Judgment affirmed.

NICKELL et al. v. NICKELL

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 7, 1909.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 496*)—COMPENSATION—EXCESSIVE ALLOWANCE.

Ky. St. 1909, § 3883 (Russell's St. § 3914), provides that the allowance to executors, administrators, and curators shall not exceed 5 per cent. on all the amounts received and distributed, but authorizes further allowances where there have been extraordinary services. The and $50 for attorney's services, and the administrator should be charged with interest after two years from the date of administration to the dates of settlement on the amount received by him and allowed credit for the sums paid out with like interest from the date of payment, where it was not shown that any extraordinary services were performed or any unusual expenses incurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 496.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 82*)—COMPENSATION.

Where an agent of the heirs of a decedent was in charge of the lands for about 12 years, and received as rents about $2,000 and the lands increased in value from $400 to $600, an allowance to him of $700 for his services as agent and $300 for attorney's fees was excessive, where the services were not extraordinary, and the litigation was not of much moment, and the allowance to him as an agent should be reduced to 20 per cent. of the amount of rents received and $200 attorney's fees, and he should be charged with interest on all rents received by him from the first of the year after the rents were received, and credited with the amounts paid out of the rents, with interest from the date of payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 339*)—TIME OF TAKING.

An appeal from a judgment more than two years after rendition is too late under the Code.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Rowan County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Proceedings for the allowance to F. C. Nickell of compensation as administrator of the estate of Greenup Nickell, deceased, and as agent for decedent's heirs. From a judgment allowing certain compensation, decedent's widow and heirs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Reuben Gudgell & Son, for appellants.
William A. Young, for appellee.

NUNN, J. Greenup Nickell died in Rowan county in July, 1893. Soon thereafter his son, F. C. Nickell, was appointed and qualified as his administrator. The inventory of the estate indicated that there came to his hands about $2,700 in notes and accounts; all the visible personal property having been set apart to the widow under the statutes. All the notes and accounts charged to him in the inventory were reported as doubtful and worthless, and were credited to him in his settlements, except about $400 worth of them. By the judgment appealed from, the lower court allowed him the sum of $300 for his services as administrator and $70.70, his expenses during the administration, and also allowed him $210 for compensation to his attorneys in winding up the estate. Shortly after appellee administered upon the estate, all the children and heirs of the estate, except one, executed a writing by which F. C. Nickell was appointed as their agent to take charge of, care for, and rent out the lands of decedent, consisting of nine small tracts. This duty he performed for about 12 years, and received as rents during this time about $2,000. According to the evidence, he improved the land, or the lands had increased in value from $400 to $600. It is not made clear that this increase in value came solely from the improvements, or whether from a general increase of the value of land in the whole county. In the judgment referred to he was allowed the sum of $700 for his services as such agent and an attorney fee of $300. The proof does not show that there was any litigation of much consequence either in the settlements of the personal estate or with reference to the real estate, which he was managing as agent. The record discloses only two actions. One was an action brought by appellant Catherine Nickell to set aside a deed or writing by which she relinquished her rights as widow in the personal and real estate and agreed to accept a share equal with the children. There were four or five depositions taken in this action on each side. On the trial of the case in the lower court the writing referred to was upheld, and she complains of that ruling on this appeal. It is sufficient to say that the judgment was rendered more than two years before she took the appeal, which, under the Code, bars her from relief from that judgment. The other action referred to was one brought by one Alderson against appellee as administrator on a note for $300. Appellee answered, denying responsibility, and pleading a set-off and counterclaim. It appears that this action never came to trial. It was compromised by paying to Alderson $200.

There was testimony introduced to the effect that the allowances to the administrator, agent, and attorneys were reasonable, the witnesses stating in a general way and from the best information they had without giving their information that the claims were reasonable. It was not shown that any extraordinary services were performed by either appellee or the attorneys, nor were there any unusual expenses incurred. Section 3883, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 3914), provides: "The allowance to executors, administrators and curators shall not exceed five per cent on all the amounts received and distributed"—and continues by providing for further allowances when the fiduciary has been required to perform extraordinary services. It appears in this record that the administrator, appellee, did not receive and distribute funds belonging to the estate amounting to over the sum of $500, and the indebtedness amounted to something over a half that sum. To these sums add the allowances made to appellee as administrator, $300, and the $210 to pay his attorneys, and it consumes largely more than the estate which came to his hands and which he distributed, and the excess is made a charge against the real estate of the heirs. This should not be sanctioned. If upheld, it would have been better for the heirs if the personality belonging to the estate had been destroyed and no administration granted. The same may be said with reference to appellee's services as agent.

In view of these facts, the allowances referred to cannot be upheld, and we have arrived at the conclusion that an allowance to appellee for his services as administrator of the personal estate which came to his hands, including his expenses, should have been fixed at $100, and a fee of $50 should have been allowed his attorney for services in the settlements of the personal estate. Appellee's compensation for his services as agent of the heirs in the management of the real estate should have been fixed at 20 per cent. of the amount of rents received, and a fee to his attorney as such agent of $200. On the return of this case to the lower court the matter should be referred to a commissioner with directions to ascertain the amount received by appellee as administrator, on which he should be charged with interest at 6 per cent. after two years from the date of administration to the dates of settlements, but he should be allowed credit for the sums paid out with like interest from the date of payment. All the rents received by appellee should also be ascertained, and he should be charged with interest from the first of the year after the rents were received, but should be credited with the amounts paid out of the rents with interest from the date of payment. He should also be credited with the allowances to himself as agent and administrator and with those made to the attorneys, as above stated.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

1. DAMAGES (§ 80*) — BREACH OF BUILDING CONTRACTS—FAILURE TO COMPLETE WITHIN SPECIFIED TIME—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—REASONABLENESS.

Three dollars per day was a reasonable sum to be agreed on as liquidated damages to be paid by the contractor to the owner for failure to complete a $13,000 hotel within the time specified in the contract.

within 24 hours after the occurrence thereof.

8. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 100*)—BUILDING CONTRACTS—RELEASE OF SURETY.

Where a building contract provided that changes in the plan should be agreed on before the change was made, and required that the amount, whether an increase or decrease in cost, must be indorsed on the contract, the failure of the parties to sign agreed changes indorsed on the contract did not release the surety on the contractor's bond.

4. CONTRACTS (§ 231*)—BUILDING CONTRACTS.

Where a building contract made the agreed price of changes and extras a part of the cost to be added to the original price, the total so ascertained was controlling under a clause permitting the owner to retain a certain per cent. of the contract price until the completion of the building.

5. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 117*)—BUILDING CONTRACTS—CONTRACTOR'S BOND.

Where a contractor's bond obligated the surety to protect the owner from loss growing out of laborers' or materialmen's liens, the owner was entitled, in good faith, to discharge debts that might have been asserted as liens against the property.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Garrard County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by the Garrard Hotel Company against the Illinois Surety Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. H. Shield and Walter S. Lapp, for appellant. J. E. Robinson, Lewis L. Walker, W. I. Williams, and Greene, Van Winkle & Schoolfield, for appellee.

NUNN, J. On August 6, 1907, appellee made and entered into a written contract with the firm of Lewis & Glanz, contractors, for the furnishing of the material and erecting a hotel in Lancaster, Ky., at the price of $13,000. The plans and specifications prepared by the architect were made a part of the contract. Lewis & Glanz gave a bond for the completion of the building in accordance with the contract, and appellant became their surety.

This action was instituted by appellee against the contractors and their surety, appellant. It was alleged, in substance, in the petition that Lewis & Glanz had failed to erect the building as they had obligated themselves to do; that they had abandoned their work before the completion of the building; that it, appellee, had to expend the architect; that after this materialmen and laborers enforced liens on the building to the extent of more than $5,000, which it was compelled to pay; that the contractors failed to complete the building by December 6, 1907, as per agreement, but kept them out of the use of it for 80 days, for which they were entitled to $3 a day according to the terms of the contract. The total amount sued for was something over $3,500; the amount recovered, $2,979.

Appellant alone made defense, and based the same on three propositions: First, that appellee violated its obligation under the contract, in that it advanced the contractors during the progress of the work more than the contract stipulated; second, that changes were made in the specifications and extras added in direct nonconformity with the provisions of the specifications and contract; third, that, after the default of the contractors, appellee failed to give appellant notice as required by the terms of the bond. We copy the parts of the contract, specifications, and bond with reference to the above three defenses. The clause of the contract is as follows: "Said contract price of $13,000.00 is to be paid as the work progresses and is certified to by the architect, George Hitchins, provided that no time they are to receive more than 75 per cent. of the amount of work finished and completed, and 25 per cent. of said contract price is to be retained until the building is finally accepted by the said hotel company as satisfactory and complete." The clause referred to in the specifications is as follows: "Should any extra work or change of the plan be required, whereby the cost may be increased or diminished, all such changes must be determined and agreed upon before the change is made, and amount, whether an increase or decrease in cost, must be indorsed upon the back of the contract." The paragraph in the bond to which appellant referred is as follows: "That said surety shall be notified in writing of any act, omission, or default on the part of said principal, or his, their, or its agents, or employes, which may involve a claim or loss for which the said surety is or may be responsible hereunder, within twenty-four hours after the occurrence of such act, omission or default shall have come to the knowledge of the owner or his, its, or their agents, officers, or representatives; said notification must be given by a United States post office registered letter mailed to the said surety at its principal office in Chicago, Illinois." There is another provision of the contract which seems to do what is known as a 'turn key job,' within four months from this date, that is, to have same completed by the 6th day of December, 1907. Said contractors are to have $3.00 per day for each day that said building is completed prior to the 6th day of December, 1907, and they are to pay said hotel company $3.00 per day for each day that said building or job remains incomplete after the 6th day of December, 1907, except they shall not be responsible for delays caused by strikes and what is known as acts of God."

We will consider these propositions in the reverse order. The preponderance of the testimony shows that the contractors were delayed in the erection of the building on account of strikes and unavoidable circumstances for at least 17 days, and they were entitled to have the time within which they were to complete the building extended an equal number of days, or to December 23, 1907. Therefore appellee was not entitled to the $3 a day from the 6th of December, but from the 23d to the time the building was ready for occupancy. There is no contention made that the $3 per day was unreasonable. It seems that the parties contemplated that the hotel would be worth at least $3 per day, and this was a reasonable sum to agree upon as liquidated damages. Whitehead & Bro. v. Lodge (Ky.) 62 S. W. 873. It is agreed that notice was given appellant of the default of the contractors on the 23d of December, 1907, in manner provided for in the contract; but the point appellant makes is that this was 17 days after the default actually occurred. It is true that the original contract required the building to be completed by the 6th day of December, but the time was extended 17 days; the contractors having been delayed that length of time on account of strikes in accordance with the terms of the contract. Therefore the contractors did not default on the 6th but on the 23d of December, 1907.

With regard to the second proposition, requiring extra work and changes of the plans in the erection of the building to be determined and agreed upon and indorsed upon the back of the contract, the facts shown in the testimony with reference to same are as follows: On September 9, 1907, the parties in interest met and agreed upon certain changes in the plans, which increased the cost, as set out in the original contract, $72. The agreed changes were reduced to writing, signed by the parties, and attached to the contract. On the 29th day of September they again met and agreed upon certain other changes in the plans which increased the price agreed to be paid the contractors $160. These changes were also reduced to writing agreed changes made on the 9th of September, which were signed by the parties and attached to the bond; but it contends that the changes agreed to upon the 29th, which were also attached to the bond, were of no effect because they were not signed by the parties. It will be observed that the contract does not specifically require that the parties sign the agreed changes, but only provides that such agreement be indorsed on the contract. Evidently it was the purpose of the parties to make the changes in the plans and specifications a part of the contract, and the overwhelming evidence shows that these changes were made and agreed to between the parties, and it did not require any writing to be signed by the parties to make them valid, and the failure of the parties to sign could not have affected appellant to any extent.

As to the first proposition stated, wherein appellant contends that it was released from its obligation as surety for the contractors because appellee advanced to the contractors during the progress of the work more than three-fourths of the value of the work finished, and that it, appellee, failed to retain 25 per cent. of the contract price until the building was finally accepted, it was shown without contradiction that appellee advanced the contractors at different periods the sum of $9,900. These advancements were made upon the certificates of the architect which purported to be strictly in accord with the contract. While the contract states that the architect was the agent of appellee, it does not appear by allegation or proof that the architect in issuing these certificates did not act from his fair and honest judgment as to the amounts due the contractors under the contract as the work progressed; and there was much testimony introduced showing that the amounts advanced were due the contractors as certified to by the architect. Appellant earnestly contends that when appellee paid the last payment of $1,500 November 26, 1907, which made up the $9,900 on the certificate of the architect, it did not retain 25 per cent. of the contract price; that it did not then have in its hands that portion of the contract price which it obligated itself to retain until the building was finally complete and accepted by it. This position would be correct if the original contract price of $13,000 was alone to be considered in construing this clause of the contract. In our opinion this is not the proper construction of it. It, by express terms, made the price of extras or changes a part of the contract price; in other words, it made the agreed price of the changes and extras a part of the cost to be appellee as if it had been so written in the original contract. It is thus seen that appellee then had in its hands more than the portion of the contract price it had agreed to retain until the building was completed.

The trouble in this case is that the contractors undertook the building of the hotel at too low a sum. The actual cost of the building, according to the proof, was near $18,000, and at no time did appellee advance the contractors more than 75 per cent. of the cost of the work actually done. The testimony further shows that the whole of the money advanced on the contract during the erection of the building in the way of paying for material and labor. Under the contract which appellant signed, it obligated itself to protect appellee from loss growing out of liens that materialmen or laborers might assert against the property; and appellee had the right in good faith to discharge the debts that might have been asserted as liens against the property. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Trustees of Baptist Church of Columbus, etc. (Ky.) 102 S. W. 325; Cooke, etc., v. White School District Number 7, etc. (Ky.) 111 S. W. 686.

The testimony in the case fully sustains the judgment of the lower court as to the amount recovered.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

TAYLOR v. SPARKS et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 4, 1909.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—ELECTIONS—NOTICE—REQUISITES.

Ky. St. 1909, § 4481 (Russell's St. § 5672), provides that elections to take the sense of the voters as to whether or not bonds should be issued to provide suitable school buildings in a district shall be ordered by the trustees of the district, who shall give notice of the election. Section 4458 provides that notice of elections to raise taxes for the use of such districts shall be signed by the county school superintendent and by a majority of the district trustees. Held, that the provisions of section 4458 did not relate to, or affect the provisions of, section 4481 so as to require the notice of an election held under the latter statute to be signed by the county superintendent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 226; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—ELECTIONS—PLACE OF HOLDING.

Ky. St. 1909, § 4458 (Russell's St. § 5672), provides that elections in school districts shall be held in the schoolhouse. Section 4481 (section 575S), relating to elections to determine whether bonds shall be issued, does not provide where the election is to be held, but requires the notice to fix the time and place. Held, that an votes actually polled out of a possible 400.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 226; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—ELECTIONS—NOTICE—REQUISITES.

The fact that the notice of an election in a white graded school district to determine whether bonds should be issued did not set forth that only white voters were to participate in the election did not render the election invalid, in the absence of a showing that any other but white voters participated therein; the notice being addressed to the qualified voters of the district, and it being presumed that the officers having charge of the election knew the law, and permitted only legal qualified citizens to vote.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 226; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—ELECTIONS—ORDER—REQUISITES.

That the order for the election did not state that the bonds to be issued were to raise money for the benefit of the white children of the district did not render the election invalid, since it would not be presumed that a tax would be levied on property of the colored citizens of the district in violation of law, or that the fund raised from the sale of the bonds would be used for any other purpose than for the benefit of the district for which they were issued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 226; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

5. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 24*)—PART OF COUNTY OUTSIDE CITY AS SCHOOL DISTRICT.

Where there is a city or town in any county which maintains a separate system of public schools, the balance of the county outside of such city or town, by the express provisions of Ky. St. 1909, § 4426a (Russell's St. § 5610a), becomes a school district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 42; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

6. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 103*)—ELECTIONS—WHO MAY VOTE.

Under the express provisions of Ky. St. 1909, § 4458 (Russell's St. § 5672), widows and spinsters who are taxpayers of common school districts are entitled to vote in elections to raise taxes for the use of such districts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 241; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

7. ELECTIONS (§ 229*)—VALIDITY—EFFECT OF ILLEGAL VOTES.

An election is not invalid because certain persons not qualified were permitted to vote, where the result of the election would not be affected if all of the objectionable votes were deducted from those received by the prevailing side.

8. ELECTIONS (§ 227*)—PRESUMPTIONS AS TO VALIDITY.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Muhlenberg County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by C. W. Taylor against T. J. Sparks and others to restrain defendants as trustees of White Graded School District No. 14 of Muhlenberg county, Ky., from issuing school district bonds. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Taylor & Eaves, for appellant. Willis & Meredith and Belcher & Sparks, for appellees.

BARKER, J. On March 30, 1909, the appellees, being the trustees of white graded school district No. 14 of Muhlenberg county, Ky., made an order calling an election to be held by the qualified voters of the district on April 17, 1909, for the purpose of taking the sense of the voters as to whether or not the trustees should issue bonds in order to provide suitable school buildings and furnish them for the use of the schools in the district. Notice of the election was given, and it was held pursuant to the order on the date for which it was called, and there were 350 votes cast; 316 of that number voting in favor of, and 34 voting against, the issue of the bonds. This vote having been legally canvassed and certified, the trustees were proceeding to issue the bonds so authorized when, on the 24th day of April, 1909, the appellant, a taxpayer of the district, instituted this action in the Muhlenberg circuit court for the purpose of enjoining the issue and sale of the bonds by the trustees. A general demurrer was interposed to the petition and sustained; and, the appellant refusing to plead further, his petition was dismissed, from which judgment he prosecutes this appeal.

It may be stated at the outset that the procedure leading up to the issuance of the bonds, so far as it went, exhibits the most careful effort on the part of the trustees to comply with the law regulating their proposed action, and the petition of the appellant shows the same painstaking care and accuracy in setting forth all the substantial facts upon which he bases his right to the injunction sought, in order that a general demurrer would present the whole question as to the validity of the bond issue. It is not deemed necessary to set forth specifically the allegations of the petition, or to state at large the action taken by the trustees to hold a valid election. It is all-sufficient for the purposes of this opinion to notice the objections of appellant; it being understood that, except where he points out a supposed defect, the procedure on the part of the of the election was signed by the trustees of the school district, and not by the county school superintendent. It must be borne in mind that the school district involved here is a graded common school district. Therefore the election was held under section 4481 of the Kentucky Statutes (Russell's St. § 5758) and not under section 4458 (section 5672), which relates to elections held in common school districts. Section 4481 provides that elections for the purposes involved in this action are to be ordered by the trustees, and notice of the election shall be given by the trustees. No mention is made of the county school superintendent whatever. Section 4458, which relates to common school districts, provides that elections for the purpose of raising taxes for the use of such districts shall be held at the time and place and in the manner prescribed in section 4434 (section 5710), and that notice of such election shall be signed by the county school superintendent of the county in which the district lies, and by a majority of the trustees of the district. It is obvious, from an examination of these two sections, that the provisions of one are not intended to relate to the other. The manner of holding the two elections is set out with the greatest circumstantiality in the respective sections, thus showing a legislative intent that each should be held alone under the provisions of the section regulating it. The notice, therefore, of the election under discussion was only required to be signed by the trustees of the district.

The second objection is that the election was held in the courthouse of Greenville, and not in the schoolhouse of the district. This objection is based upon the same argument as that just disposed of. Section 4458, which relates to common school districts, does provide that the election shall be held at the schoolhouse, but section 4481, which relates to graded school districts, does not provide where the election is to be held. It does provide, however, that the time and place of the election shall be fixed in the notice, and this was done in the case at bar. It may also be stated in this connection that there is no allegation that any citizen entitled to vote was deprived of the privilege so to do by a want of knowledge of the place where the election was to be held. Undoubtedly the courthouse was the best known place in the city in which to hold the election, and the fact that there were 350 votes actually polled out of a possible 400, shows that the citizens generally had ample knowledge of the time and place of the election.

A third objection is that the notice did not set forth that only white voters were to par-

ified voters of the district was ample without adding the word "white." It is not alleged in the petition that any other but white voters participated in the election held, and we must presume, in the absence of a distinct allegation to the contrary, that the officers having charge of the election knew the law, and permitted only legally qualified citizens to vote.

The objection, that the order for the election does not state that the bonds to be issued are to raise money for the benefit of the white children of the district is equally untenable. We will not presume that a tax will be levied on property of the colored citizens of the district in violation of law, or that the fund raised from the sale of the bonds will be used for any other purpose than for the benefit of the district for which they were issued.

Section 4426a, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 5610a) in no wise affects section 4481, so far as the district involved herein is concerned. Greenville, which is the county seat of Muhlenberg county, constitutes white graded common school district No. 14, and it falls within the very language of the exception of section 4426a, which provides that, where there is a city or town in any county which maintains a separate system of public schools, then the balance of said county outside of such city or town district shall constitute a school district. As we understand the record, the city of Greenville maintains a separate system of public schools, and comes, as said before, within the language of the exception of section 4426a.

The objection, that 19 widows and spinsters, who were taxpayers of the district, were allowed to vote at the election is without merit. In the first place, section 4458 especially permits such citizens to vote at school elections. But if we are mistaken in that, if these 19 votes are all assumed to have been in favor of the bond, they may be entirely eliminated without in any wise affecting the result of the election. The district seems to have been almost unanimously in favor of the issuance of the bonds; 316 being in favor of the issue, and only 34 opposed to it.

In conclusion, it is the policy of the law to uphold elections by the people for the purpose of advancing the educational interests of the children of the state, and not to annul them for light and trivial causes. Mere irregularities in the conduct of an election, which do not deprive the citizens of a full and fair opportunity of exercising their right of suffrage in regard thereto, are not, suffi-

v. Justice, 86 Ky. 596, 6 S. W. 457. The election, which was held by the trustees, seems to have been more than usually regular in the steps taken; and, as more than two-thirds of the votes cast were in favor of the issuance of the bonds, the general demurrer was correctly sustained, and the petition dismissed.

Judgment affirmed.

Where two actions for money, though tried together, were based upon separate pleadings and separate verdicts, and separate judgments were rendered, jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals depends on the amount involved in each action, so that that court would not have jurisdiction of an appeal in one of the actions in which only $95 was involved; Civ. Appeal from Circuit Court, Perry County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Actions by John L. Combs against G. G. Brown, and by John Combs and another against G. G. Brown, in which W. O. Sealey intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff in each case against defendant and intervener, the latter appeals. Appeal in first case dismissed, and judgment in second case reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss petition as to intervener.

O. H. Pollard, A. H. Patton, Miller & Ward, and J. J. C. Bach, for appellant. Bailey P. Wootton, Jesse Morgan, and Greene, Van Winkle & Schoolfield, for appellees.

CLAY, C. Appellee John L. Combs instituted an action against G. G. Brown to recover the sum of $95.25 for work and labor done in hauling timber. At about the same time appellees, John Combs and Joe Brewer, instituted an action against G. G. Brown to recover the sum of $243.04, also for work and labor performed in hauling timber. In each case the appellees secured a general order of attachment against the property of Brown, and had it levied upon certain timber. Thereafter, W. O. Sealey intervened in each action, and set up a claim to the property attached, executed bond therefor, and took possession of the property. The two cases were then consolidated and tried together. In the action of John L. Combs against G. G. Brown the defendant Brown filed an answer, confessing judgment for the amount sued for, and denied the grounds for attachment. In the case of John Combs and Joe Brewer against G. G. Brown the latter also filed an answer confessing judgment for the amount sued for, except the sum of $22.50, which he pleaded as a set-off. He also denied the grounds for attachment. Upon the filing of the intervening petitions the plaintiff in each case pleaded, by way of answer and counterclaim, that the intervening petitioner, through his agent, promised and agreed to pay them for the work they had performed in hauling the timber. Sealey's demurrer to the answer and counterclaim in each case was overruled. In the case of John Combs and Joe Brewer against Brown the plaintiffs filed an amended petition, alleging a promise made by Sealey to pay the debt sued for. To this Sealey answered, and pleaded the statute of frauds and no consideration to support the promise. In each case, upon the verdicts of the jury, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs against G. G. Brown and W. O. Sealey, and the latter appeals.

In the case of W. O. Sealey v. John L. Combs appellee has moved to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the amount involved is not sufficient to give this court jurisdiction. The amount involved is only $95.25. While this action was tried with the other action herein considered, they were separate actions, founded upon separate pleadings, and based upon separate verdicts and judgments. Under the circumstances the jurisdiction of this court must depend upon the amount involved in each instance. As the amount involved is less than $200, exclusive of interest and costs, we are without jurisdiction to consider the appeal. Section 734, Civ. Code Prac.; Oswald, etc., v. Morris, 92 Ky. 48, 17 S. W. 167; Fehler v. Gosnell, 99 Ky. 894, 35 S. W. 1125.

In the case of W. O. Sealey v. John Combs and Joe Brewer, the main question is whether or not the oral promise, made by Sealey's agent, to pay Brown's debt was within the statute of frauds. The lower court held (and we think held correctly) that the timber attached belonged, not to Brown, but to Sealey. The latter had a contract with Brown by which Brown agreed, for a certain consideration, to cut and haul the timber to the river. At the time it is claimed that Sealey's agent made the promise to pay Brown's debt, the timber had been cut and hauled to the river. There was nothing further to be done. Combs and Brewer were hired by Brown to do the hauling. Sealey was not known in the matter at all. Under his contract with Sealey Brown agreed to pay for the hauling. It is manifest, therefore, that the debt due Combs and Brewer was Brown's debt—not Sealey's. Appellees contend that the promise on the part of Sealey to pay the debt was not within the statute of frauds, and rely upon the case of Colvin, etc., v. Newell, etc., 8 Ky. Law Rep. 959. It is obvious, however, that the rule laid down in that case has no application to the case at bar. There the purchaser of certain land agreed, as a part consideration, to pay a debt of his vendor. The court held that, under the circumstances, the debt due by the vendor then became the debt due by the purchaser. There is no circumstance in this case showing that Brown's debt became Sealey's debt. If the timber had not been hauled at the time, and Brown had not paid for it, Sealey might have bound himself by promising to pay it. But the timber had been hauled. Appellees' work was completed. A promise, under these circumstances, on the part of Sealey to pay their debt was certainly within the statute, and unenforceable. Brown still remained liable. Section 470, Ky. St. 1909 (Russell's St. § 1775); Fessler v. Dressman, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 239; Jones v. Walker, 13 B. Mon. 356; Lieber, Griffin & Co. v. Levy, 3 Metc. 292.

For the reasons given, the appeal in the case of W. O. Sealey v. John L. Combs is dismissed. The judgment in the case of W. O. Sealey v. John Combs and Joe Brewer is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition and amended petition in so far as they affect appellant Sealey.

4. CONSPIRACY (§ 47*)—EVIDENCE OF DEFENDANT'S CONNECTION WITH CONSPIRACY.

In a prosecution for conspiracy, it must first be shown that defendant was a member of the band by which the intimidation was accomplished, but such evidence need not be direct or positive, and may be made up of isolated or fragmentary facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 105, 106; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

5. CONSPIRACY (§ 41*)—RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTS AND DECLARATIONS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS.

When a defendant's guilty connection with a conspiracy is established, he is chargeable for all the acts and declarations of his co-conspirators made during its existence and in carrying it forward to its unlawful ends.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. § 74; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 427*)—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF CONSPIRATORS.

It cannot be shown that defendant belonged to a band of conspirators by hearsay declarations of the conspirators themselves.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1014; Dec. Dig. § 427.*]

7. CONSPIRACY (§ 43*)—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Where a charge of conspiracy is limited to a single act of the conspirator to intimidate a certain person, the court properly excluded evidence of illegal or wrongful acts done subsequently by a band with whom defendant was not charged to be in concert or collusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 79-107; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

8. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 169*)—LIMITATION OF PROOF TO CHARGE.

The evidence must be limited to establishing the charge made in the indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 535; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 424*)—EVIDENCE—ACTS AND DECLARATIONS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS.

After the consummation of the conspiracy, the acts and declarations of the co-conspirators do not bind each other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1002; Dec. Dig. § 424.*]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 412*)—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF NOTES FOUND ON PRISONER.

Notes found on accused while confined in jail with other prisoners, and which he attempted to pass to a visitor, and which showed the writers were preparing to arrange for alibis at their trial, were competent evidence against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 911; Dec. Dig. § 412.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 665*)—TRIAL—DISCRETION OF COURT—SEPARATION OF WITNESSES.

The exclusion of witnesses from the courtroom is largely a matter of discretion with the trial court, and parties who do not desire to suffer by operation of the rule for the separation of witnesses should exercise some diligence in seeing that their witnesses obey it.

reach a verdict on the trial of Ellis alone, the defendants having demanded a severance, the jury were discharged, and the commonwealth certifies questions to the Court of Appeals, which certifies its answers to the trial court.

Jas. Breathitt, Atty. Gen., and Tom B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth. Speight & Acree, for appellees.

BARKER, J. The grand jury of Calloway county returned an indictment against the appellees, Jake Ellis, Will McClure, and Henry Taylor, charging them with conspiring together for the purpose of intimidating Mose Thornton, which indictment is as follows: "The grand jury of Calloway county, in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Kentucky, accuse Jake Ellis, Will McClure, and Henry Taylor of the crime of willfully confederating and banding together for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, and disturbing another, committed in the manner and form as follows, to wit: That said Ellis, McClure, and Taylor did in the county and state aforesaid, on the — day of —, 1908, and before the finding of this indictment, willfully and feloniously and corruptly confederate, agree, and enter into a conspiracy with each other, and with divers others to the grand jury unknown, for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, and disturbing Mose Thornton, and, in pursuance of said conspiracy theretofore entered into as aforesaid, did then on the — day of March, 1908, willfully and feloniously confederate and band themselves together and with each other, and go forth with said unknown persons for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, and disturbing said Thornton, and they did then and there by arms and threats call him, the said Thornton, out of his house, and order him to raise a crop of tobacco this year, 1908, to his great disturbance, intimidation, and alarm, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Kentucky." To this indictment the defendants pleaded not guilty, and, the case being called for trial, they demanded a severance, whereupon the commonwealth elected to try Jake Ellis; and, a jury being impaneled, the case was tried, with the result that the jury were unable to reach a verdict, and were discharged by the court from further consideration of the case. Thereupon the commonwealth certified to this court the question of the sufficiency of the instructions given by the trial court, and also certain other questions of law concerning the admission and ed the jury as follows:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that a criminal conspiracy, as charged in the indictment herein, means a corrupt combination or agreement between two or more persons to do by concert of action an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means.

"(2) The court further instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence in this case beyond a reasonable doubt that in this county, and before the finding of the indictment herein, the defendant Jake Ellis did unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously conspire and confederate with his codefendants, Will McClure, Henry Taylor, and other persons to the grand jury unknown, or any one of said codefendants, McClure or Taylor, or with some other person, or persons, to the grand jury unknown, for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, or disturbing the witness Mose Thornton, and, in pursuance of said conspiracy and confederation or banding together, the defendant Jake Ellis, with any one or more of the defendants, Will McClure or Henry Taylor, or with any other person or persons to the grand jury unknown, acting with him and he with them, did in pursuance of said agreement or confederation go forth for the purpose of alarming, disturbing, or intimidating said Thornton, they will find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and fix his punishment at confinement in the state penitentiary for not less than one year, nor more than five years, in their discretion.

"(3) The court further says to the jury that, if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that in this county, and before the finding of the indictment herein, the defendant Jake Ellis did unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously conspire and confederate with Will McClure, Henry Taylor, or other persons to the grand jury unknown, or with any one or more of them, or with some other person, or persons, to the grand jury unknown, for the purpose of alarming, intimidating, or disturbing Mose Thornton, and in pursuance and execution of said conspiracy or confederation the codefendants, Will McClure, Henry Taylor, or other person, or persons, to the grand jury unknown, or any one or more of said defendants, or any one or more of said unknown parties with whom defendants did conspire and confederate (if he did so conspire and confederate with any one or more of them), acting in pursuance of said conspiracy or confederation, did unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously go forth for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, and disturbing said Mose Thornton, and shall further believe from the evidence that defendant did not go forth with his code-

if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that he did so unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously confederate and conspire with Will McClure, Henry Taylor, or either of them, or with other person, or persons, to the grand jury unknown, or with any one or more of them for the purpose of alarming, intimidating, or disturbing Mose Thornton, and they will fix his punishment at not less than one year, nor more than five years, in their discretion.

"(4) The court further says to the jury, if they believe from the evidence that the witnesses J. L. Whitlock, Clarence Dyzer, W. B. Stewart, and Will Ingram did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously conspire or confederate with the defendants, Jake Ellis, Will McClure, Henry Taylor, or any one of them, or with other person, or persons, to the grand jury unknown, for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, or disturbing the said Mose Thornton, then they or such one or ones of them as did so unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously conspire or confederate for said purpose of alarming, intimidating, or disturbing the said Thornton, is an accomplice, or accomplices, in the crime charged in the indictment, and the jury cannot convict the defendant upon the testimony alone of such accomplice, or accomplices, unless same be corroborated by other evidence in this case tending to connect the defendant Jake Ellis with the crime charged in the indictment, and such corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows that the offense was committed, and the circumstances thereof. But the court further says to the jury that, if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the witnesses J. L. Whitlock, Clarence Dyzer, W. B. Stewart, and Will Ingram, or any of them, did not willfully or voluntarily conspire or confederate with the defendants, Jake Ellis, Will McClure, or Henry Taylor, or with any other person or persons to the grand jury unknown, but shall further believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that they, or any of them, were present at the time and place of such unlawful, willful, and felonious confederation or conspiracy for the purpose of alarming, intimidating, or disturbing said Thornton, and shall further believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that said witnesses, or any of them, did not willfully and voluntarily go forth for the purpose of alarming, intimidating, or disturbing the said Thornton, with said defendants, or any one or more of them, nor with said unknown person, or persons, or any one or more of them, but were forced and compelled against their will to so conspire and to go forth for the purpose named above, then they or such of them as were so forced or compelled against their will to conspire or confederate with the parties named above, or any of them, would not be accomplices, and their testimony should be received and considered as the testimony of other witnesses.

"(5) The court further says to the jury that the law presumes the defendant to be innocent until he is proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt; and, if upon the whole case the jury entertain a reasonable doubt or a reasonable doubt as to any fact necessary to establish his guilt, then he is entitled to an acquittal, and the jury should find him not guilty."

As an exposition of the law of the case we think the foregoing instructions are above criticism; but, on another trial, we suggest that the learned trial judge add to No. 5 an explanation that the facts which would warrant the conviction of the defendant are those so aptly stated in instructions 2 and 3. Ordinarily this precaution would not be necessary; but, as this prosecution is under a statute not often enforced in this state, and as the offense which is charged in the indictment involves the establishment of a multitude of facts, along with which will come unavoidably a vast deal of immaterial matter, we think, as a matter of precaution, lest the jury should be confused, that the suggestion above made be followed.

In the direct examination of the witness Whitlock, he was asked whether or not the person who came to see him at the time Ellis said he would have a person there told him to turn off the switch that night, to which the witness answered, "Yes, sir; he told me to." The commonwealth in its brief insists that the court ruled out this question and answer, but we do not so understand it. The record shows that, when the defendant objected to it and moved to exclude it, the commonwealth offered to withdraw the question and answer. The motion to exclude the whole of the witness' testimony was properly overruled, and we do not understand that the court excluded the question and answer above stated. It was clearly competent, and we see no reason for the withdrawal of it by the commonwealth. The record, however, leaves us in some doubt as to whether it was withdrawn, although it shows that the commonwealth offered to withdraw it. The court did exclude a part of an answer by this witness as to what some one he called "John" told him. As John was not one of the defendants in the case, and there is no evidence that he belonged to the band known as the "Night Riders," or any explanation as to who he was, or what connection he had with the subject-matter under investigation, the court was clearly right in excluding what he said.

The remaining objections of the commonwealth to the admission and rejection of testimony fall into three classes, and, without alluding to the testimony specifically, we can dispose of the objections by discussing them in a general way in the classes into which they naturally fall.

The commonwealth sought to show by several witnesses that other members of the night riders told them that the defendant Jake Ellis was a night rider. All of these declarations were merely hearsay, and were not admissible to show that the defendant belonged to the band of conspirators mentioned. The rule is elementary that, where a defendant is charged with being a conspirator, evidence must be first shown which, in the absence of contradictory evidence, would establish that he was a member of the band. This evidence may not be direct or positive in its nature, and it may be made up, as it usually is, of isolated or fragmentary facts and circumstances which, when placed together, establish the guilty connection. When this is done, the defendant is chargeable with legal responsibility for all the acts and declarations of his co-conspirators made during the existence of the conspiracy and in carrying it forward to its unlawful ends. But this is not the question here. Here it was sought to be shown that the defendant belonged to the band of conspirators, by hearsay declarations of the conspirators themselves. This evidence, as said before, is clearly incompetent, and the trial judge correctly excluded it.

The second class of the objections made by the commonwealth is that the court excluded all evidence of illegal and wrongful acts done subsequent to the outrage perpetrated upon Mose Thornton. It will be observed that the indictment charges the defendant with being guilty, with others, of a conspiracy to intimidate Mose Thornton. The charge goes no further than this. It is limited to this one act. Now it would be clearly erroneous to permit evidence of acts done by a band of men with whom the defendant is not even charged as being in concert or collusion. So far as the charge in the indictment is concerned, the object of the conspiracy was consummated in the intimidation of Mose Thornton. The evidence must be limited to establishing the charge made in the indictment. It can take no wider range than the indictment warrants. If the commonwealth chose to limit the range of the charge against the defendant to the conspiracy to intimidate Mose Thornton, the defendant had a right to believe, and to rely upon that belief, that he would be required to meet only this charge, and to rebut evidence of the commonwealth against him tending to establish this charge. After the consummation of the conspiracy the acts and declarations of the co-conspirators do not bind each other. It is only while the conspiracy is in progress of consummation that each conspirator is bound by the acts and declarations of all who are in concert with him to perpetrate the unlawful act. Therefore the trial court was clearly right in excluding all testimony of acts done and declarations made subsequent to the outrage charged in the indictment.

The third objection of the commonwealth relates to certain notes found on the defendant Ellis while in jail. A. S. Brooks, who held the position of city marshal of Murray, was introduced by the commonwealth, and testified that he went to the jail with Joe Bell, who ostensibly desired to give Ellis, and certain other prisoners in jail with him, some tobacco; that while standing at the window putting the tobacco through the bars, the prisoners "started to poke some notes through the bars. Mr. Bell went to take them, and saw me looking at them, and he dropped his hand by his side, and wouldn't take them, and they fell on the floor." Afterward L. W. Holland, a policeman, testified that he searched Jake Ellis while in jail and found the notes in his pocket. The witness had the notes in his possession, and the commonwealth offered to introduce them in testimony. Upon objection the court ruled them out. They were, however, filed with the stenographer for the purpose of testing their competency in this court. They are as follows:

No. 1: "Go to Bud Hall and tell him and Elbert Hall and Bruce Holland to say that me and Bob Duncan was at my home Wednesday night, April the first. [Signed] D. E. Thompson.

"And for Bruce to say the same and say my wife was sick on that night."

No. 2: "Joe you go to old Wilce Reeds and tell him to swear that I come to his house the night of the 26 of March to rent some land I was gone about 1 hour and a half and I got Fan Ellis to stay with Ella & the children while I went down hire and I told them that was going down hire rent some land and they will swear that and I want Reed to swear that I was thire on that date & I will come through all right. You press that man clost on that. [Not signed.]"

No. 3: "Dr. Blaylock and Clay Garland and I want you for witness. You know that you was at my house on that date to see my baby on the 23rd of March. [Signed] H. C. L."

No. 4: "Joe you post father and sister to swear that I was at home on the 23 of March. [Signed] damas m."

We think these notes were competent evidence against the defendant Ellis. They tell their own story, and show that the writers were preparing to arrange for the evidence of alibis when their trial came on. We do not comment upon their value as evidence; we simply say that they were competent for whatever they are worth as against the defendant upon whose person they were found by the officers of the law.

It is unnecessary for us to pass upon the action of the trial court in excluding certain evidence which should have been offered in chief, but which was tendered after the defendant's evidence was in. Upon another trial the commonwealth can introduce this evidence in the proper order, and it would serve no good purpose for us to notice the ruling further. The same can be said as to the rulings of the court in excluding the evidence of certain witnesses who had remained in the court room in violation of the rule of the court in ordering a separation of the witnesses. This matter is largely in the discretion of the trial court, and parties who do not desire to suffer by the operation of the rule should exercise some diligence in seeing that their witnesses obey it. All of which is certified, as by law required, to the trial court.

NUNN, J. (dissenting). The only point of difference between myself and Associates grows out of the language of the opinion concerning the letters found in the possession of Ellis. I agree that it was proper to introduce the letters, but am of the opinion that the trial judge should at the time have admonished the jury that they were not to be considered as evidence against him, unless the jury believed that the commonwealth had by evidence connected him in some way with the writing or composition of the letters, and had reference to the charge laid in the indictment.

BUTTON v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE et al.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 11, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 669*)—OBSTRUCTION OF STREETS—RIGHTS OF ABUTTING OWNERS.

An abutting owner may make a reasonable use of the street in improving his property, provided the obstruction is not forbidden by the municipal authorities, and such authorities cannot legalize an obstruction which is unreasonable.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 669*) — OBSTRUCTION OF STREETS—RIGHTS OF ABUTTING OWNERS.

The court, in determining whether the obstruction of a street by an abutting owner improving his property is unreasonable, will give weight to the judgment of the city authorities and to the universal custom in the erection of buildings in cities.

3. RELEASE (§ 29*) — OF ONE OF SEVERAL JOINT TORT-FEASORS—EFFECT.

Where one having a cause of action against three defendants received from one of them as much money as the proof authorized him to recover in any view of the case, the court did not err in instructing the jury to find for the other defendants.

dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. Carroll, for appellant. O'Neal & O'Neal, for appellees.

HOBSON, J. E. N. Button had a grocery store on the north side of Green street, about midway between Fourth and Fifth streets. The Jefferson Realty Company owned a lot on the west corner of Fourth and Jefferson streets and running back to Green street. It erected on this lot what is now known as the Paul Jones Building, after the theater which had stood formerly on the lot was burned. While the building was going up the sidewalk on Green street and a part of the street itself was obstructed so that customers could not get into Button's store from that direction, and by reason of the obstruction of the gutter from building material the water was backed up in front of his house. He brought this suit against the city of Louisville, the Jefferson Realty Company, and the contractor, Herman Probst, to recover damages. The defendants filed an answer denying the allegations of the petition. After the answers were filed, and before the case came on for trial, a settlement was made between the Jefferson Realty Company and the plaintiff, by which it paid him $250 in settlement of his claim against it. At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff on the trial, the circuit court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the other two defendants; and this having been done, and the plaintiff's petition having been dismissed, he appeals.

The citizen has a right to the use of the street or the right to complain if any unreasonable obstruction is placed in it, but this right to the use of the street is subject to the right of the owner of property to a reasonable use of the street in improving his property. How far the property owner may obstruct the street in improving his property depends upon the circumstances. He may not make an obstruction which the municipal authorities forbid, but the consent of the municipal authorities will not legalize an obstruction which the law forbids; that is, it will not authorize an unreasonable obstruction of the street. But the obstruction of sidewalks in front of large buildings which are in process of erection is unavoidable, and considering the size of the building and all the circumstances, the obstruction of the sidewalk, and of a part of the carriageway, as was shown here, next to the sidewalk, was not unreasonable. When the property was used as a theater, the cellar had been extended out under the sidewalk.

It is true that the obstruction continued here for about a year; but the building was a large one, and in the erection of such buildings an obstruction of the sidewalk and a part of the carriageway is, if not unavoidable, so common that it cannot well be said to be unreasonable. The property owner who fronts upon a street takes his rights in it subject to such obstructions as may be reasonably made, and it is hard to see how improvements could be made in cities if obstructions of the street to the extent that they were authorized by the city here were held unlawful. In matters of this sort some weight must be given the judgment of the municipal authorities and to the universal custom in the erection of buildings in cities. We therefore conclude that the plaintiff showed no right to recover against either Probst or the city on account of the obstruction of the street.

There was some evidence showing that the water had been dammed up in front of his house and had run over the pavement and into his cellar; but the damages shown from this did not amount to as much in any view of the proof as he had been paid by the Jefferson Realty Company; and, as he had received from one of the defendants as much as the proof offered by him authorized him to recover in any view of the case, the circuit court did not err in instructing the jury peremptorily for the other defendants. 8. SEDUCTION (§ 39*)—SUBSEQUENT MARRIAGE—ABANDONMENT—PRIMA FACIE CASE.

One charged with seduction under Ky. St. 1909, § 1214 (Russell's St. § 3790), providing that no prosecution shall be instituted where accused shall have married the female seduced unless he shall, without cause constituting a ground for divorce, desert her within a specified time, may show any ground he had for abandoning the female seduced after his marriage to her, but the prosecution shows a prima facie case by evidence that the female after the marriage behaved toward him properly, and that he abandoned her without apparent cause.

5. STATUTES (§ 138*)—AMENDMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—IDENTIFICATION OF AMENDED ACT.

Acts 1906, p. 253, c. 25, entitled "An act to amend section 1214 of the Kentucky Statutes," sets out the words which are added to the section, and then sets out in full the section as amended. A discrepancy occurs between the old section when the words are added to it as set out in the act and the section as amended as set out in the act. Held that, since the act declares that the section shall read as therein written, the amendment is valid within Const. § 51, providing that no law shall be amended by reference to its title only, but so much thereof as is amended shall be re-enacted and published at length.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Criminal Branch.

"To be officially reported."

Laurence E. McNutt was indicted for seduction, and from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the indictment the Commonwealth appeals. Reversed and remanded.

James Breathitt, Atty. Gen., and Tom B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth. Chatterson & Blitz, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. Section 1214, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 3790), is in these words: "Whoever, shall, under promise of marriage, seduce and have carnal knowledge of any female under twenty-one years of age, shall be guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one year nor more than five years. No prosecution shall be instituted where the person charged shall have married the girl seduced, or offer and be willing to marry her, unless he shall willfully and suspended in the party accused marry the girl seduced before final judgment; but the prosecution shall be renewed and proceed as though no marriage had taken place if the accused shall willfully and without such cause as constitutes a statutory ground of divorce to the husband abandon or desert his wife within three years after the marriage. All prosecutions under this section shall be instituted within four years after the commission of the offense." Laurence E. McNutt was indicted under this statute for seducing Mattie Lee Kesler. It was charged in the indictment that he promised to marry her, and under this promise of marriage seduced her in the year 1907; that in August, 1908, he married her, and in the same month without cause as defined in the act abandoned and deserted her. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the indictment on the ground that he had married the girl before the indictment was found. The commonwealth appeals.

Previous to the act of 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 253, c. 25) the provision of the statute on this subject was as follows: "No prosecution shall be instituted where the person charged shall have married the girl seduced." Under this provision it was held by the court that if the defendant offered in good faith and was willing to marry the girl, and she refused to marry him, there could be no prosecution, and so by the act of 1906 these words were added, "or offer and be willing to marry her." But another mischief had come up. Men in this character of cases would marry the girls seduced as a matter of form and immediately abandon them, thus defeating the obvious intent of the Legislature; and so by the act of 1906 these words were added, "unless he shall willfully and without such cause as constitutes a statute ground of divorce to the husband, abandon or desert her within three years after the date of the marriage." The purpose of the Legislature was manifestly to provide that a mere form of marriage should not defeat the prosecution, and it is entirely immaterial whether the marriage takes place before the indictment is found or afterwards. The statute provides, in substance, that no prosecution shall be instituted where the defendant has married the girl, unless within three years after the date of the marriage he abandons her without cause for divorce. If the defendant has committed the offense, and he does not bring himself within the exception, he may be indicted and punished, as a prosecution will lie in every case covered by the statute, which is not

guage of the statute, and it has been held in a number of cases of this sort that such indictments are sufficient. The defendant may show any ground that he had for abandoning or deserting his wife. But the prosecution will make out a prima facie case when it shows that his wife behaved toward him properly after the marriage, and that he abandoned her without apparent cause. To set out in the indictment all the statutory grounds of divorce to the husband and negative their existence would lead to too great prolixity. This would enlighten the defendant in no respect as to the nature of the accusation against him, and would be of no help to him in making his defense. If any of these grounds exist, this is a matter presumably within his knowledge, and so the general negative allegation following the language of the statute is sufficient. Higgins v. Commonwealth, 94 Ky. 54, 21 S. W. 231. The indictment contains "a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended; and with such degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment, on conviction, according to the right of the case," as required by section 122 of the Criminal Code of Practice. Section 136 also provides: "The words used in a statute to define an offense need not be strictly pursued in an indictment, but other words conveying the same meaning may be used." The act of 1906 (see Acts 1906, p. 253) is not unconstitutional. It has been held in a number of cases that a statute may be amended by its title, and that a section of the Kentucky Statutes may be so amended. City of Paducah, Ex parte, 125 Ky. 510, 101 S. W. 898, and cases cited. It is true that in the first part of the act words are set out as added to the statute which are changed in the latter part of the statute, where the statute as amended is set out in full. The reason of this evidently was that the words, "without just cause," were too indefinite, and the act was amended so as to substitute for them "without such cause as constitutes a statute ground for divorce." The amended words were substituted in the latter part of the act where the statute as amended is set out in full, but by oversight the act as it was originally written is left unchanged in the opening clause where the words to be added are set out. When the whole act is read, it is manifest what the Legislature meant. Section 51 of the Constitution provides: "No law shall be revised, amended, or the provisions thereof extended in full in the act. The preceding part of the act was merely intended to show how the result was reached. The fact that there is a discrepancy between the old section when the words were added to it which are proposed in the first part of the act and the section as amended which is set out in the latter part of the act is immaterial. The act declares that the section shall be read as therein written, and this is the law.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

CLOS' ADM'R et al. v. CLOS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 5, 1909.)
WILLS (§ 601*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE BEQUEATHED—FEE—LIMITATION OVER—VALIDITY.

Testator declared that all his property, real and personal, should be transferred to his wife to do with as she chose, and, "should she die before she has arranged matters, then the above mentioned is transferred to the children." Heid, that the wife took a fee, and not a life estate, so that the clause quoted construed as a limitation over in case the wife died without having consumed or disposed of the property was void, as an attempt to impose a limitation on a fee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1340-1350; Dec. Dig. § 601.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Campbell County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Jacob Clos' administrator and others against Grace Clos to construe the will. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jas. C. Wright, for appellants. Horace W. Root and B. F. Graziani, for appellee.

O'REAR, J. The will of Jacob Clos is as follows:

"Highland Campbell county Kentucky. January 26, 1899.

"Be it known that I, Jacob Clos, hereby declare that all my personal and real property which I possess, in case I should die, shall be transferred to my wife Louise Clos (née Krummel) so that she without giving bond and without the intervention of any court may do with the bequeathed property realty, monies or valuables as she may choose or deem fit.

"Should she die, before she has arranged matters, then the above mentioned is transferred to the children.

"I further make known and public that those children who have borrowed from me for which I hold their notes, shall be chargeable in the division as stated by said notes, so that the children who have not borrowed shall be equal with the others.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

"In case any of my children should have died, leaving children his or their share shall go to his or their children.

"Being of sound mind and memory I declare this to be my last will and testament. "Jacob Cloa."

The question presented for decision is whether the widow of the testator took a fee simple in the estate devised, or whether it was a life estate, with the power of appointment, failing which the children and descendants of the testator took in remainder. We think the widow took a fee-simple title. The unconditional power of disposition annexed to the devise to her creates the highest estate known to the law. Just what the testator had in mind by the expression "should she die before she has arranged matters" cannot be known. What matters he had reference to, or what arrangement he contemplated, cannot be gathered with any certainty from the writing. A number of conjectures arise, but which of them would be correct we have no way of determining. If he contemplated that his widow should die without having consumed or disposed of the property, then the attempt to dispose of it by the will is not allowed; for a limitation cannot be imposed upon a fee-simple title. Had he created a life estate in his widow, with power of appointment, it would have been competent for the testator to have anticipated the failure of the life tenant to exercise the power, and to have provided against that contingency. But we cannot say that such was his purpose; for he did not create a life estate in the widow. While it is the law of wills that the testator's intention, as gathered from the whole instrument, construed in the light of his surroundings, is to prevail, it is subject to the condition that the intention shall be consistent with the law of the land. It is not within the power of a testator who gives one the fee-simple title to then impose a limitation upon that fee. If such was the intention of the testator (and that is the utmost we can construe it to have been), it was ineffectual as being in contravention of the law. Becker v. Roth (decided January 29, 1909, Ky.) 115 S. W. 761.

Such was the judgment of the circuit court, and it is affirmed.

ROY v. ALLEN'S ADM'R.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 6, 1909.)

1. INFANTS (§ 80*)—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM—PREREQUISITES.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 38, providing that no appointment of a guardian ad litem shall be made until the defendant has been summoned or some person summoned for him as allowed by section 52, the appointment of a guardian ad litem for an infant defendant who is not summoned, and for whom no person is summoned, is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 214; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

2. INFANTS (§ 80*)—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM—EFFECT OF INVALID APPOINTMENT.

A judgment ordering the sale of lands of a decedent's estate to pay a debt, rendered in a suit in which decedent's children were represented by a guardian ad litem whose appointment is void because of failure to summon the infants, or some one for them, is invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 214; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 349*)—SALE OF DECEDENT'S PROPERTY—INVALIDITY OF PROCEEDINGS—PARTIES ENTITLED TO ASSERT.

Where a judgment ordering the sale of lands of a decedent's estate to pay a mortgage debt is void because of failure to summon the infant defendants, the invalidity of the judgment can be asserted by the mortgagee, who was also a defendant, where the sale under the judgment destroyed his lien and realized less than the debt, interest, and costs, and where it was not shown that the failure to serve the infant defendants was due to any fault of his.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1446; Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 348*)—SALE OF DECEDENT'S PROPERTY—INVALIDITY OF PROCEEDINGS—MODE OF RAISING OBJECTIONS.

The proper course for a mortgagee to pursue on sale of property to pay the mortgage debt under a void judgment in proceedings in which the mortgagee was a party defendant, which sale brought less than the mortgage debt, interest, and costs, and destroyed the mortgage lien, is to move to set aside the invalid judgment, and, on the overruling of the motion, to appeal therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1448; Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by A. E. Allen's administrator for the settlement of the estate of decedent. From a judgment overruling a motion to set aside an order authorizing the sale of decedent's realty to pay a mortgage debt, the mortgagee appeals. Reversed and remanded.

James Denton, for appellant. Sharp, Bethurum & Cooper, for appellee.

CLAY, C. A. E. Allen, husband of Lela V. Allen, died, intestate, in Pulaski county, Ky. At the time of his death he owned a small tract of land which he had previously mortgaged to appellant, W. M. Roy. Upon the death of A. E. Allen, J. H. Allen, his brother, qualified as his administrator, and thereafter instituted this action for a settlement of the estate of the deceased. Appellant, W. M. Roy, was made a party defendant, as were also the widow and infant children of the deceased. The infant children were all under 14 years of age. Summons was properly issued for defendants Lela V. Allen and W. M.

Roy, but no summons was issued for the infant defendants. Both the adult defendants answered before judgment was entered, and R. L. Brown, a practicing attorney of the Pulaski circuit court, was appointed guardian ad litem to defend for the infant defendants. After his appointment he filed his report, stating that he had examined the record in the case, and investigated the facts, and was unable to make a defense for the infant defendants. He further stated that in his opinion the sale of the real estate, or a sufficiency thereof to pay Roy's mortgage debt, would be of benefit to the infants. After this report judgment was entered directing a sale of the property and requiring the commissioner to report said sale at the next term of court. The commissioner advertised the sale for the 16th day of March, and on March 19th, which was during the same term, he filed his report of sale. On the same day the following order was entered: "It appearing that the commissioner of this court has made his report of land sold herein, and the same having laid over for exceptions, and none having been filed, it is ordered by the court that said report be now ratified and confirmed." The land was purchased by Lela V. Allen, the widow of decedent, for the price of $700. Appellant's debt, at the time of the sale, was about $770. Before the next term of court, notice was served on the purchaser and the plaintiff that appellant, Roy, would, on the third day of the next term, move the court to set aside the order confirming the commissioner's report, and also to treat as void all other orders and judgments of the court entered in the action. This motion was made at the time, but the court did not finally dispose of the same until the October term, 1908, when the motion was overruled. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It is insisted by appellant that the judgment ordering the sale of the property in question is void. The reason assigned is this: No summons whatever was ever issued against the infant defendants, nor was section 52 of the Civil Code of Practice complied with; that being the case, the court had no power to appoint a guardian ad litem, as section 38 of the Code provides that no appointment of a guardian ad litem shall be made until the defendant is summoned, or until a person is summoned for him, as is authorized by section 52. Undoubtedly appellant's contention is correct. The infant defendants had no statutory guardian. Therefore it was necessary to have a guardian ad litem appointed. No guardian ad litem could be appointed until service was had, in accordance with section 52. Not only was service not had, as therein provided, but no summons was issued at all against the infant defendants. They were not therefore parties to the suit. Our conclusion, then, is that the judgment of sale is absolutely void.

The next question is: Can appellant, Roy, complain of the void judgment? It appears that the sale brought less than appellant's debt, interest, and cost. As the infant defendants were not before the court, it is manifest that the only interest in the tract of land actually sold was the interest belonging to the widow of the decedent. Appellant's lien, by the judgment of the court, is extinguished and destroyed. He cannot subject the interest of the infant defendants in another action. Being a party to the action, and being interested in having the whole title to the property involved sold, we are of opinion that he has a right to complain of a judgment that is void as to the principal owners of a tract of land embraced in his mortgage and which is sought to be sold in the action. Furthermore, the record does not disclose the fact that the failure to serve process on the infant defendants was due to any fault on his part.

The next question is: Did appellant pursue the proper course? We are of opinion that he did. The judgment being void, it was proper, under section 763 of the Civil Code of Practice, to move to set it aside before taking an appeal to this court.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. MOTTLEY et ux.

1. STATUTES (§ 263*)—CONSTRUCTION—PROSPECTIVE CONSTRUCTION.

Statutes will not be given a retrospective construction, unless the language precludes a reasonable doubt that the Legislature intended a prospective construction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 844; Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 23*)—REGULATIONS—CONSTRUCTION—RETROSPECTIVE OPERATION.

Act Cong. June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 1, 34 Stat. 584 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 892), prohibits any common carrier from directly or indirectly giving any interstate free transportation for passengers. Section 2 prohibits carriers from charging any different compensation for carrying passengers between points named in its tariff, as filed, than the fare specified therein, or from refunding any part of the fares, or from extending to any person any privileges except as specified in such tariff. Held, that the statute applied to the contract under which any pass, etc., was issued, and not simply to its issuance, and was not retrospective, so that it would not apply to a contract made in 1871, by which a carrier agreed to issue an annual pass to one injured, in settlement of his claim for damages, though annual passes were issued under the contract after the statute was enacted.

4. CARRIERS (§ 35*)—STATUTORY REGULATION—FEDERAL ANTI-PASS LAW—"FREE PASSES."

Annual passes, issued pursuant to a contract by which a carrier agreed to issue an annual pass for life to one injured by it in settlement of his claim for damages, are not "free passes" within Act Cong. June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 1, 34 Stat. 584 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 892), prohibiting any common carrier from directly or indirectly giving any interstate free pass or ticket for passengers except to employes, nor did the contract violate section 2, prohibiting carriers from charging any different compensation between points named in its tariff than the fare specified therein, or from extending to any person any privileges except as specified in its tariff; it not appearing that the contract discriminated in favor of the person injured.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Warren County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Erasmus L. Mottley and wife against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to compel specific performance of a contract of carriage. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 150 Fed. 406; 211 U. S. 149, 29 Sup. Ct. 42, 53 L. Ed. —.

Henry L. Stone and Sims, Du Bose & Rodes, for appellant. Clarence U. McElroy, Wright & McElroy, and G. Duncan Milliken, for appellees.

BARKER, J. In 1871 the appellees, Erasmus L. Mottley and Annie E. Mottley, his wife, were seriously injured in an accident occurring to one of appellant's passenger trains while they were being transported as passengers from their home, in Bowling Green, to Louisville, Ky. In full settlement of all claims for damages on the part of the appellees, the appellant agreed, in writing, to furnish them free transportation over its line for the remainder of their lives. The contract is as follows: "Louisville, Ky., Oct. 2, 1871. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, in consideration that E. L. Mottley and wife, Annie E. Mottley, have this day released said company from all damages or claims for damages for injuries received by them on the 7th of September, 1871, in consequence of a collision of trains on the road of said company at Randolph's Station, Jefferson county, Ky., hereby agrees to issue free passes on said railroad and branches, now existing or to exist, to said E. L. Mottley and wife, Annie E. Mottley, for the remainder of the present year and thereafter to renew said passes annually during the lives of said Mottley and wife, or either of them. Thos. J. Martin, Vice President Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Willis Raney, Secretary. [Seal.]" This contract was faithfully carried out by the appellant until after the enactment by the Congress of the United States, on June 29, 1906, of "An act to amend an act, entitled an act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887" (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 584 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 892]), When, becoming apprehensive lest the further issuance of passes to appellees under the contract was within the prohibition of the act of Congress, it declined to carry out its agreement any further, whereupon the appellees first instituted an action for the specific enforcement of the contract in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky, where a judgment was rendered as prayed for in the petition. Mottley v. L. & N. R. Co. (C. C.) 150 Fed. 406. But upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States this judgment was reversed upon the ground of want of jurisdiction in the federal court to entertain the cause of action. See L. & N. R. Co. v. Mottley, 211 U. S. 149, 29 Sup. Ct. 42, 53 L. Ed. —. Whereupon the appellees instituted this action in the Warren circuit court, with the result that a judgment was rendered requiring the appellant to perform the contract. To review this judgment this appeal has been prosecuted.

The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company is a common carrier engaged in the business of interstate and intrastate commerce, and the specific performance of the contract in question involves both interstate and intrastate commerce. Therefore one of the questions arising upon this record is whether or not the contract is specifically enforceable under the provisions of the act of Congress before referred to, and which is fully pleaded and relied upon by the appellant as a bar to appellees' cause of action. So much of the federal statute pleaded by the appellant as is deemed necessary to be herein set forth is as follows:

"Section 1. * * * No common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, after January 1, 1907, directly or indirectly, issue or give any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation for passengers, except to its employes.

"Sec. 2. * * * No carrier, unless otherwise provided by this act, shall engage or participate in the transportation of passengers, or property, as defined in this act, unless the rates, fares and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of the act; nor shall any carrier charge, or demand, or collect, or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or property, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in such tariffs, than the rates, fares and charges which are specified in the tariff filed and in effect at the time; nor shall any carrier refund or remit in any manner, or by any device, any portion of the fares, rates and charges so specified, nor extend to any shipper or person any privileges or facilities in the transportation of passengers or property, except such as are specified in such tariffs. * * *

The violation of these sections of the statute is punishable by heavy fine.

No question of the good faith of the parties in making the contract is raised, and the length of time it has existed prior to the enactment of the federal statute precludes the possibility of any intent to evade its provisions. The first question, then, arising upon the record is whether or not the Congress, in the enactment of the statute, intended to abrogate existing contracts such as the one in question—in other words, whether the statute was intended to be retroactive in its effect on pre-existing contracts, or whether it was intended to be prospective in its effect—and, second, whether or not the contract in question is within the purview of the federal statute at all.

The rule is well settled that statutes will always be construed to be prospective, and not retrospective in their effect, unless the language so plainly expresses a retrospective intent as to preclude a reasonable doubt that the Legislature meant it to be prospective. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, in speaking of this rule of construction (page 529), says: "Nevertheless, legislation of this character is exceedingly liable to abuse; and it is a sound rule of construction that a statute should have a prospective operation only, unless its terms show clearly a legislative intention that it should operate retrospectively." And Endlich, in his work on the Interpretation of Statutes (section 271), uses this language: "Upon the presumption that the Legislature does not intend what is unjust rests the leaning against giving certain statutes a retrospective operation. * * * They are construed as operating only on cases or facts which come into existence after the statutes were passed, unless a retrospective effect be clearly intended." There is nothing in the language of the enactment by Congress, under discussion, which purports to give a retrospective effect to its operation; on the contrary, the intent that the statute should have a prospective effect only appears from a most cursory reading of the language used, unless it is applied to the actual issuance of the passes and not to the contract under which they are issued. We do not think it admissible to so construe the language of the statute as to hold that it applies simply to the issuance of a pass or ticket for transportation, rather than the contract under which the pass is issued. It is true that, in the execution of the contract made in 1871, it has been the custom of the railroad company to issue passes to the appellees annually, and therefore, if we fix our attention exclusively upon this annual issuance of tickets for transportation, it might seem that these fall within the letter of the statute because they are actually issued since the enactment; but this narrow view of the matter is inadmissible. The passes or tickets actually issued are in execution of the contract made in 1871, and, unless this contract is invalidated by the statute, its language cannot be applied to the mere issuance of the tickets. If the contract remains legally in force, the means by which it is executed cannot be invalid or illegal.

Passing now to the second question, we are of opinion that the contract between the appellant and the appellees does not fall at all within the meaning of the language used in the statute. The statute inhibits the issuance by common carriers doing interstate commerce of free tickets or passes for transportation, except to employes. The tickets or passes issued to the appellees in execution of the contract cannot in any real sense be called free. They are paid for in money, just as certainly as if the actual cash was handed over to the agent of the railroad by the appellees in payment for a trip ticket. The appellees had received serious bodily injuries caused by the negligence of the railroad, and the latter was liable to them for damages, which, unless the matter was settled amicably, would have to be liquidated by the verdict of a jury and the judgment of a court. It was entirely competent for the parties thus standing towards each other to settle this unliquidated claim or demand for money and agree upon its value. They did so, and it was stipulated that the amount of damages suffered by appellees was equal in value to such transportation as they should afterwards choose to make over its line during their natural lives. At the time this agreement was made, it was entirely legal and valid, and, as said before, it was made in absolute good faith by the parties. Now, suppose, instead of carrying out the contract in the manner adopted, the railroad had agreed that it was liable to appellees for the sum of $10,000, and had paid over to them that sum, and then appellees had chosen, as they might have done, to hand back the amount received, and thus purchased from the railroad with actual cash transportation for life—would tickets issued under this agreement be called "free tickets," or "free passes"? We think not, and yet it would be difficult to find a difference in principle between the contract actually made and that supposed. It does not require more than a slight investigation to reach the conclusion that the contract made by the parties was very much to the advantage of the railroad as against the payment by it of such sum as the jury might assess in actual cash if the matter had progressed to a judgment for damages.

It may be admitted, for the purposes of this case, that Congress could have framed the statute so as to abrogate the contract under discussion. There is no constitutional inhibition upon Congress passing laws to impair the obligation of contracts as there is against the states passing such laws; but the same moral obligation against such unjust laws rests upon the general government as upon the state government, and we must presume that the general government never intends to impair the obligation of existing contracts, unless an imperative necessity exists for so doing, and a clear intent to do so is expressed. It would be a great hardship upon appellees to invalidate the contract between them and appellant. The time has long since passed under the operation of the statute of limitations, when they could institute or maintain an action against the railroad for the injuries received by them in 1871, so that if the contract is invalidated now, they would lose absolutely what remaining value it has. This property right will be taken from them without any consideration, and we would be justified in reaching the conclusion that Congress intended to invalidate the contract and thus take from appellees their property rights without remuneration only because the language used precludes any other construction.

In the case of United States v. Kirby, 74 U. S. 486, 487, 19 L. Ed. 278, the Supreme Court said: "All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice, oppression, or an absurd consequence. It will also therefore be presumed that the Legislature intended exceptions to its language, which would avoid results of that character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over the letter." In the case of Carlisle v. United States, 16 Wall. 153, 21 L. Ed. 428, the rule is thus stated: "All general terms in the statutes should be limited in their application, so as not to lead to injustice, oppression, or unconstitutional operation, if that be possible. It will be presumed that the exceptions were intended which would avoid results of that character." And in Market Co. v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 116, 25 L. Ed. 782, it was said: "In Brewer's Lessee v. Blougher, 14 Pet. 178, 10 L. Ed. 108, it was said to be the undoubted duty of the court to ascertain the meaning of the Legislature, from the words used in the statute and the subject-matter to which it related, and to restrain its operation within narrower limits than its words import, if the court is satisfied that the literal meaning of the language would extend to cases which the Legislature never designed to include in it." See, also, Chew Heong v. United States, 112 U. S. 555, 5 Sup. Ct. 255, 28 L. Ed. 770; Holy Trinity Church v. United States, 143 U. S. 457, 12 Sup. Ct. 511, 36 L. Ed. 226; Bate Refrigerator Co. v. Sulzberger, 157 U. S. 37, 15 Sup. Ct. 508, 39 L. Ed. 601.

As we have said before, the very case we have here was decided in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky in favor of the appellees. Mottley v. L. & N. R. R. Co., supra. It is true, the judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States because of want of jurisdiction in the federal court to entertain the cause of action set up by appellees; but we think the painstaking and thorough opinion rendered by the learned federal judge upon the merits of the case is very instructive, and we rely upon it with confidence. Nor are we unmindful of the opinions in Southern Wire Co. v. St. Louis Bridge & Tunnel R. Co., 38 Mo. App. 191, and Fitzgerald v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 63 Vt. 169, 22 Atl. 76, 77, 13 L. R. A. 70, which hold that existing traffic contracts discriminating as to rates between shippers were repealed by the interstate commerce act of 1887 (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 8154]). The opinions in these cases rest, in part, at least, upon the fact that the discriminating contracts by common carriers between their patrons were illegal at the common law, and could not be upheld in any event; but, without examining this phase of the case too minutely, it is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, they can be distinguished from that at bar. Those contracts were wholly executory, and fell within the precise reason for the enactment of the act of Congress prohibiting discrimination in interstate commerce. In the case at bar the appellees' part of the contract was entirely executed. They had paid over to the railroad company the whole consideration moving from them for the contract. To annul this contract now would be to confiscate the consideration paid by them. Nor was that contract in any wise illegal or questionable at the time it was made. On the contrary, as we understand it, it was entirely legal and valid. There is nothing in this record to show that the contract in any wise discriminates in favor of appellees. On the contrary, we think it highly probable that they pay for their railroad transportation under its terms a very much larger sum in money than the ordinary passengers do. In other words, judging from ordinary experience in such cases, where neither the liability nor the extent of which they actually receive in the contract. Of course, this is somewhat problematical; but, as the railroad thought it was to its interest to make the contract, we cannot believe that our supposition is overstrained.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the contract under discussion does not fall within the terms of the federal statute, and that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

DEThERAGE v. HAWN.

HAWN v. LUNSFORD et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 6, 1909.)

1. SALES (§ 366*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—PLEADING—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a petition in an action for the price of an engine alleged that under the original contract of sale between the seller and the buyer the engine was to be paid for in lumber, but that after sawing the lumber that the seller was to receive the buyer and his partners appropriated it to their own use and then promised to pay the price in money, plaintiff was entitled only to a money judgment, as he abandoned his right to recover the lumber and rested his case upon the ground that the first contract under which he was to receive lumber was merged in the contract under which he was to be paid in money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 1078; Dec. Dig. § 366.*]

2. SALES (§ 348*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—RIGHT TO COUNTERCLAIM.

Where an original contract for sale of an engine, which provided that it should be paid for in lumber, was modified, and it was agreed that it should be paid for in money, and that out of the money due the seller the buyer and his partners would satisfy a mortgage on the engine, paying the seller the balance, in an action for the price of the engine the buyer and his partners could not counterclaim for damages from the seller's failure to take the lumber or from decay of the lumber caused by delay in removing it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 973; Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

3. SALES (§ 348*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—COUNTERCLAIM.

Where a buyer, when purchasing an engine, knew of a defect therein, and that the engine was mortgaged, and he and his partners promised to satisfy the mortgage, they could not counterclaim, in an action for the purchase price, because of the defect or mortgage, and where, instead of paying the mortgage before sale of the engine thereunder and obtaining credit on the purchase price for the sum so paid as permitted by the contract of sale, they allowed the engine to be sold, the seller purchasing it, they could counterclaim only the amount it sold for.

Action by M. W. Hawn against W. H. Detherage and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff against the mentioned defendant, and a judgment of dismissal as to the other defendants, and plaintiff and the mentioned defendant appeal, respectively, from the judgments against them. Judgment for plaintiff affirmed. Judgment of dismissal reversed, with directions.

Jas. M. Gilbert and James D. Black, for plaintiff. J. M. Robison, for defendants.

CARROLL, J. These two appeals, involving the same question of law and fact, are heard together. To present clearly the issues, we will take from the pleadings the substantial points of difference between the parties.

In April, 1905, Hawn sold to Detherage a sawmill engine for $775, which sum he alleged Detherage agreed to pay in lumber at the price of $9 per 1,000 feet for buckeye and $9.50 per 1,000 feet for other kinds, the lumber to be manufactured at the mill out of logs then at the mill or near by; and, if the lumber so manufactured amounted to more than the price of the engine, Hawn was to have the surplus at the price mentioned. He averred that soon after Detherage purchased the engine, he sold a one-third interest therein to Lunsford, another one-third interest to Lawson, retaining a third himself, and that all of them agreed to carry out the contract made by Detherage, but that in violation of the contract they manufactured the logs into lumber and refused to let him have any of it, but sold the same, promising to pay him in money the price of the engine in place of the lumber. He asked judgment against all three of them for the amount of his debt and interest. Detherage filed a separate answer and counterclaim, in which he admitted the purchase of the engine and the agreement upon his part to pay for the same in lumber at the price stated by Hawn, but denied that he or Lunsford or Lawson ever agreed with Hawn to pay him money in lieu of lumber, and set up that the lumber necessary to pay for the engine was sawed and tendered to Hawn, but he refused to accept the same and permitted it to remain in the lumber yards until it was damaged to the extent of $400, for which amount he sought judgment on his counterclaim against Hawn. He further set up that one Mason had a mortgage on the engine at the time it was sold to him by

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Hawn, of which mortgage lien he had no notice, and furthermore that there was a defect in the engine that greatly impaired its working capacity, and upon this account he also asked damages upon his counterclaim. Lunsford and Lawson also filed answers in which they admitted having bought from Detherage an interest in the engine, but averred that, when they discovered there was a mortgage on it, they rescinded the contract. They further denied any agreement to pay the purchase price or any part of it in money. The Masons came into the case by appropriate pleadings and set up their mortgage lien, and asked for personal judgment against Hawn, and that their lien upon the engine be enforced and the property sold for the purpose of satisfying the same. Other pleadings completed the issues, which are, in substance, as before stated, and in March, 1907, an order was entered directing a sale of the engine to satisfy the lien of Mason, which amounted to some $600. In May, 1907, the engine was sold under this order, and purchased by Hawn for $305. A large amount of evidence was taken in support of the respective contentions of the parties, and, the case coming on for hearing, a judgment was rendered in favor of Hawn against Detherage for the amount of the purchase price of the engine with interest, credited by $305, May 25, 1907, but his petition as to Lunsford and Lawson was dismissed.

It is the contention of Detherage upon this appeal that the judgment should be reversed because: (1) Under the contract the purchase price of the engine was to be paid in lumber and in no other way, and hence it was erroneous to render a judgment for money; (2) that Hawn violated his contract in refusing to accept the lumber, which was tendered to him in payment of the engine; (3) because of a want of consideration growing out of the fact that the engine at the time of the sale was incumbered by a lien and afterwards sold to satisfy it; (4) because the court erred in refusing to award him damages upon his counterclaim growing out of the failure of Hawn to take the lumber when tendered, and his misrepresentations as to the condition of the engine.

Hawn in his petition does state that under the original contract between himself and Detherage he was to be paid in lumber for the engine, but he also states that, after sawing the lumber that he should have received, Detherage and his partners appropriated the lumber to their own use and then promised to pay him in money the price of the engine. A direct issue was made upon this point by the pleadings, and in our opinion Hawn under the pleadings was only entitled to a money judgment, as he abandoned his right to recover the lumber and rested his case upon the ground that the first contract under which he was to receive lumber was merged in the contract under which he was to be paid in money.

And this brings us to the second point, which involves a question of fact, namely, whether or not the contract was modified as claimed by Hawn. If the contract under which Hawn was to receive lumber in payment of the mill was never modified, and if the purchaser tendered to Hawn the lumber agreed upon in payment of the mill, it would follow as a matter of course that Hawn was not entitled to a money judgment, or indeed to any relief. The evidence upon this issue is very conflicting, but there is sufficient to justify us in sustaining Hawn's theory of the transaction. Three facts stand out prominently in this record. One is that Detherage bought the mill from Hawn for $775; the other is that neither he, Lunsford, nor Lawson ever paid him a cent; and yet another is that Hawn did not receive any lumber.

In reference to the third point, it is conceded that, at the time the engine was sold, it was incumbered by a mortgage executed by Hawn to Mason; but the evidence tends to show that Hawn notified Detherage of this fact when he sold him the engine, and it is clearly established that the mortgage debt did not amount to as much as Detherage agreed to pay for the engine. So that, even if it should be conceded that Detherage did not know of the mortgage lien when he purchased the engine, yet his rights were not prejudiced by the existence of the mortgage, because he knew of it long before any action was taken by the mortgagee and could at any time have satisfied the mortgage debt out of the amount due Hawn for the property.

In reference to the charge that Hawn practiced a fraud upon Detherage when he sold him the engine by concealing from him the fact that there was a defect in the engine and the further fact that it was incumbered by a mortgage, the weight of the evidence tends to show that Detherage when he bought the engine knew that Mason had a mortgage on it, and the amount of it, and also that there was a defect in it.

Concerning the claim asserted by Detherage for damages growing chiefly out of the fact that Hawn refused to take the lumber, and it was thereby permitted to decay at the mill, we may repeat that in our opinion the evidence conduces to show that the trade by which Hawn was to take the lumber in payment of the engine was so modified as that he should be paid in money, and hence it follows as a matter of course that Detherage cannot assert any claim for damages against Hawn on account of his failure to take the lumber. It is further shown by the evidence, and without contradiction, that Detherage, Lunsford, and Lawson, or one of them, sold nearly all of the lumber.

To sum up our conclusion on the appeal of Detherage v. Hawn, we are of the opinion, from a careful reading of the record: (1) That, when Detherage sold an interest in the engine to Lunsford and Lawson, the original contract was modified, and it was agreed that Hawn should be paid in money, and that out of the money due Hawn these parties would satisfy the mortgage lien and pay to Hawn the balance due on the engine, and hence they have no cause of action against Hawn on account of his failure to take the lumber or because it was damaged by delay in removing it from the mill. (2) That Detherage and his partners are not entitled to any reduction in the purchase price because of the defect in the engine or growing out of the fact that there was a lien on it at the time of the purchase. The weight of the evidence is to the effect that, when Detherage purchased the mill, he knew of the defect in the engine, and also that there was a mortgage, and both he and his partners promised to satisfy the mortgage debt, and by paying it at any time before the sale of the engine under the order of court they could have prevented the sale, retained the engine, and have credit on the amount due Hawn by the sum paid to extinguish the mortgage; but they did not see proper to pursue this course, and, if they were deprived of the engine, it was their own fault, and so the only relief they are entitled to on this score is to have credit by the amount the engine sold for at the decretal sale, and this the lower court allowed in rendering judgment against Detherage. (3) We are further of the opinion that the weight of the evidence favors the view that, when Lunsford and Lawson purchased an interest in the engine, they assumed in connection with, and as partners of, Detherage to pay Hawn for the engine in money, and therefore they are jointly and severally liable with Detherage for the amount due on the engine.

Wherefore the judgment on the appeal of Detherage v. Hawn is affirmed; and the judgment on the appeal of Hawn v. Lunsford and Lawson is reversed, with directions to enter a judgment in favor of Hawn against Lunsford and Lawson for $775, with interest from April 8, 1906, subject to a credit of $305, May 25, 1907.

TRAVIS v. TAYLOR.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 6, 1909.)

1. DEEDS (§ 70*) — VALIDITY — FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS.

Fraudulent representations of a third person will not permit the purchaser to rescind the deed and cancel a note, and to recover the purchase money paid, in the absence of a showing that they were authorized, or that the vendor knew or approved thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 172; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 400*)—VARYING WRITINGS BY PAROL—CONTRACT OF SALE.

A contract of sale of a farm, which shows on its face the number of acres sold, cannot be controlled or altered by any oral statements, made before its consummation, as to the number of acres the farm contained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1781; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 168*)—LIABILITY FOR CONSIDERATION—FACT OF MISSING DEED.

A purchaser, who agreed to take an indefeasible title as it was, with the understanding that if missing deeds were discovered, they were to be placed on record by the vendor, cannot, after taking possession under her deed and holding the land as her own, be heard to say that she will not pay the balance of the consideration because of a missing deed.

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 176*)—ABATEMENT OF PRICE—SHORTAGE IN LAND CONVEYED.

Where a sale of land is in gross, and not by the acre, the price will not be abated because of a shortage, unless so great as to impress the mind that the parties could not have contemplated such a difference between the acres actually conveyed and that mentioned in the deed.

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 176*)—ABATEMENT OF PRICE—SHORTAGE IN LAND CONVEYED.

Where a sale of two tracts of land was in gross, the price will not be abated because of a shortage of 12 acres in the 149 acres which the deed purported to convey.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Simpson County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Bertie B. Taylor against Bettie H. Travis on a promissory note, and to enforce a vendor's lien. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. W. Whitesides and C. W. Milliken, for appellant. Roark & Finn and C. B. Moore, for appellee.

BARKER, J. On the 19th day of September, 1907, the appellee, Bertie B. Taylor, conveyed to the appellant, Bettie H. Travis, by deed with general warranty, two tracts of land, which are set out by metes and bounds in the petition, containing, in the aggregate, 149 acres. In consideration of this conveyance the appellant paid to appellee at the time $1,500 in cash, and executed and delivered to her a promissory note for $1,000 due January 1, 1908. The appellant took possession of the farm under this deed, and still holds it. The note having fallen due and remaining unpaid, appellee instituted this action to recover judgment for her debt and interest, and to enforce her lien upon the land which she had sold, as above set forth. The appellant, by her answer, seeks to vacate and have rescinded the deed of appellee to her, and the cancellation and surrender up of her note to appellee, and the recovery of the $1,500 cash paid, because she alleges she was defrauded in the contract by certain false and fraudulent statements made by W. J. Taylor, the father of appellee, concerning the land which appellant was proposing to buy. She states that W. J. Taylor falsely and fraudulently represented to her that the farm contained 160 acres, and it was well fenced with a wire fence, and that it had two springs upon it, all of which was false and fraudulent. There is no allegation, however, in the answer that W. J. Taylor was the agent of his daughter, the appellee, or had any authority to act or speak for her. In an amended answer, however, she states that the representation that the farm contained 160 acres was made by W. J. Taylor in the presence of his daughter, who acquiesced in, or approved of, the statement. The representations in regard to the springs and fencing may be now laid entirely on one side, and left out of view, because of the absence of an allegation that they were made by any one authorized so to do, or that appellee knew of or approved of them. We think the representation that the farm contained 160 acres may be disposed of by saying that it was made before the contract was reduced to writing, and, as the conveyance itself shows on its face that appellee was proposing to sell appellant only 149 acres, this contract cannot be controlled or altered by any oral statements made before its consummation.

As a further ground for rescission the appellant alleges that before she accepted the deed, it had been discovered, by an examination of the title, that appellee did not have a complete record title to the land she was proposing to sell. In other words, there were two deeds, constituting a part of appellee's chain of title, which had not been recorded, but that appellee assured appellant that these deeds were in her possession, and would be turned over at once to be recorded, that, relying upon this promise, she accepted the deed, and paid over the cash payment, and delivered the note for the balance of the consideration, but that, in violation of her agreement so to do, appellee had failed to furnish the lost or missing deeds, and that appellant found herself in possession of an unmerchantable title to the farm in question. This defect in the title of appellee arose in the following manner: Her father, who conveyed the land to her, purchased it from two different persons, and it was the deeds from W. J. Taylor's vendors which were supposed to be missing. It seems that the courthouse of Simpson county, several years before this contract arose, was burned, and all of the records of the county destroyed. Among these were the conveyances to W. J. Taylor from his vendors of the two tracts which make up the farm in question. It may be well to say here that it has since been discovered that the deed to one of the tracts purchased by W. J. Taylor was found to have been re-recorded since the fire, and, so far as this tract is concerned, there is no further trouble. In regard, however, to the other tract of 83 acres, no deed has ever been found. The truth of these allegations of appellant concerning the missing deed was traversed by appellee, and her evidence tends to show that, when the deeds were found to be missing, appellee's father thought he had them at his home, but appellee said to appellant that she did not believe this was correct; that she had never seen them at her father's house, and did not believe they were there; that thereupon a consultation took place, and it was represented to appellant that W. J. Taylor, the father of appellee, had been living on and occupying the farm in question as his home for more than 40 years before the contract was made between appellant and appellee; that therefore she had a perfect title by reason of so long, continued, open, and notorious possession on the part of herself and her vendor; and that thereupon appellant agreed to take the deed for the land, with the understanding that, if the missing deeds were discovered, they would be placed upon record. The evidence upon this point is very conflicting, and, as the chancellor gave judgment in favor of appellee, we do not feel authorized to disturb his finding upon this question of fact. The record shows, however, beyond contradiction, that appellee and her vendors had been in the actual, open, and notorious possession of the farm in question, using and claiming it as their own, for more than 40 years next before the conveyance. Appellant does not dispute that her vendor had a good title to the land under the statute of limitations. Her complaint is that her title is less merchantable by reason of the fact that the deed to one of the tracts which make up the farm is missing; but, if she agreed to take the title as it was (and this the chancellor found), she cannot, after taking possession under the deed of appellee and holding the land as her own, be heard now to say that she will not pay the balance of the consideration because of the missing deed. Her title, as shown by the evidence, is indefeasible; and, as said before, if appellee's evidence on the subject of the missing deed is true, appellant has no ground upon which to ask a rescission.

It turned out, upon an actual survey, that there were only 137 acres of the land, and, as appellant has alleged this fact, and prayed for an abatement of the price because of the difference between the number of

by the acre; the sale was in gross. The contract for the sale was discussed only from the point of view of the sale of the whole farm for so much money. Appellee wanted $3,000 for her farm. This appellant was unwilling to give, but offered $2,500. The two tracts of land are described in the deed as "containing sixty-six acres, more or less," and "eighty-three acres, more or less." The rule is well settled that, where a sale of land is in gross, and not by the acre, the court will not abate the price because of a shortage, unless the shortage be so great as to impress the mind that the parties could not have contemplated the contingency of so great a difference between the acres actually conveyed and that mentioned in the deed. In the case of Anthony v. Hudson (Ky.) 114 S. W. 782, we had occasion to examine the question now under discussion at considerable length, and to review the authorities bearing upon the subject of abatement in price for deficit in the acreage conveyed. It was there held that, where a sale was in gross, no abatement in the price would be made, unless the deficit was so great as to raise a presumption of fraud. In that case there were 560 acres named in the deed, which were sold for the sum of $58,800, being at the rate of $105 per acre. The deficit was 9.71 acres, which, at the named price of $105 per acre, amounted to $1,019.55, about four times the amount in value as in the case at bar, although the number of acres in the deficit were slightly less. We there held after reviewing the cases on the subject in this state, that, the sale being in gross, no abatement could take place in the purchase price for the deficit in the acreage. The principle laid down in the case cited is conclusive of the question now under discussion, and it is only necessary to cite the opinion without further elaboration here.

It seems that, some time prior to the contract with appellant, appellee had given a lease for the mineral privileges of her farm; it probably being supposed that there was oil or gas beneath the surface. Appellant alleged this outstanding lease as an additional ground for rescission of the contract, but appellee replied by filing a cancellation of the lease by the lessee. This, of course, eliminated the question from further consideration.

In conclusion, we are of opinion, upon the whole case, that the chancellor's judgment is correct, and meets the equities of the case.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Henry County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by N. P. Scott against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals affirmed.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

HOBSON, J. On March 3, 1907, N. P. Scott delivered to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company at Campbellsburg, Ky., a car load of horses and mules to be shipped to Waycross, Ga., and there delivered to him in good order. It was stipulated in the bill of lading that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company agreed to transport the stock to the place where it was received by the next connecting carrier for transportation, and that its liability should cease at its terminus, when the stock was delivered to the carrier who was to take the stock on from that point. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company carried the stock to Montgomery, Ala., and there delivered it to the Atlantic Coast Line in good condition. The Atlantic Coast Line carried the stock from Montgomery, Ala., to Waycross, Ga., and there delivered it to the plaintiff; but when delivered seven of the horses and mules were in a bad condition and damaged to the extent of $275. Scott brought this suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to recover the loss, and, a judgment having been entered in his favor in the circuit court, the railroad company appeals.

The case turns on what is known as the "Carmack amendment to the interstate commerce act, which is in these words: "That any common carrier, railroad or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one state to a point in another state shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad or transportation company to which such property may be delivered, or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed; provided, that nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law. That the common carrier, railroad or transportation company issuing such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover from the common carrier, railroad or transportation company on whose line the loss, damage or injury shall have been sustained the amount of such loss, damage or injury as it may be required to pay to the owners of such property, as may be evidenced by any receipt, judgment or transcript thereof." Act Cong. June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 7, 34 Stat. 595, pt. 1 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 909).

It will be observed that by this act the initial carrier which issues the bill of laderty may pass, and that no contract shall exempt the initial carrier from the liability imposed. As this was a shipment from a point in this state to a point in another state, the act applies to it, and the defendant is liable for the loss if the act is valid. But it is insisted for it that the plaintiff did not in his pleadings show that he relied upon the Carmack amendment, and that therefore he cannot recover by reason of it. Section 119 of the Civil Code of Practice provides as follows: "Neither the evidence relied on by a party, nor presumptions of law, nor facts of which judicial notice is taken, excepting private statutes, shall be stated in a pleading." The statute referred to is a public law of the United States, and state courts no less than courts of the United States must take notice of the acts of Congress. In 1 Wharton on Evidence, § 287, the rule is thus stated: "An ordinance or statute of the United States is not 'foreign,' so far as concerns the particular states. Hence it has been held that a state court will take judicial notice of the federal Constitution and its amendments, and of federal public statutes. And it has been held that a state court will recognize without proof state statutes incorporated in acts of Congress. The state courts under this rule take cognizance of federal statutes and the federal courts take cognizance of state statutes." To the same effect, see Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) § 6b. In Clafin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 136, 23 L. Ed. 833, the United States Supreme Court said: "The laws of the United States are laws in the several states and just as much binding on the citizens and courts thereof as the state laws are. The United States is not a foreign sovereignty as regards the several states, but is a concurrent, and within its jurisdiction, paramount sovereignty. Every citizen of a state is a subject of two distinct sovereignties, having concurrent jurisdiction in the state—concurrent as to place and persons, though distinct as to subject-matter. Legal or equitable rights acquired under either system of laws may be enforced in any court of either sovereignty competent to hear and determine such kind of rights, and not restrained by its Constitution in the exercise of such jurisdiction." The acts of Congress within the sphere of its jurisdiction are the law of the land no less than the acts of the state Legislature within the sphere of its jurisdiction, and as the court must take judicial notice of these laws, and as facts, of which it must take judicial notice, by the Code, need not be stated in the pleadings, it was unnecessary for the plaintiff to refer to the United States statute in his petition. Accordingly, we have uniformly given judg states the facts in his pleadings entitling him to recover under the law of which the court must take judicial notice, he has stated a cause of action. The plaintiff here sues for an injury to his property. The defendant relies on the special contract to shield it from liability. The court must take notice that under the act of Congress the special contract is ineffectual to that end and therefore must disregard it in giving judgment.

It is also insisted that the state court is without jurisdiction to render a judgment by reason of the provisions of the act, because it designates the remedies which the aggrieved party may have. We have examined the act with care and do not think it is properly capable of this construction. This is an action by the shipper against the carrier to recover for an injury to his property. There is nothing in the act to deprive the state courts of their jurisdiction in cases of this sort. This is not an action based on a violation of a statute. The action is based on the injury to the property. The defendant relies on the special contract which the statute declares invalid. The rule that, where a statute provides a remedy for its violation, that remedy is exclusive, has no application. To leave no room for doubt on this subject, the following words are inserted in the statute: "Provided, that nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law."

The Interstate Commerce Commission is not a court. It cannot try controversies like this between shipper and carrier, and give judgment against the carrier for the damages sustained. It was not contemplated by the act that the time of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be consumed by such controversies. The commission is given jurisdiction to hear complaints in regard to rates, rebates, and the like, and the language of the statute in reference to complaints to the commission must be construed as relating to those subjects which are within the jurisdiction of the commission. The Circuit Courts of the United States are without jurisdiction in an action where the matter in controversy is less than $2,000, and so this action could not have been brought in the United States Circuit Court, as the amount in controversy is only $275. It was not the purpose of the interstate commerce act to give the United States courts jurisdiction of cases of this sort where the amount in controversy is less than $2,000. If therefore the state court is without jurisdiction to hear the matter, the plaintiff is not run within the carrier's liability, and that if it does the act is invalid. The defendant received the property for transportation from a point in this state to a point in Georgia and issued a through bill of lading therefor. This is precisely the case which the amendment was designed to cover. Congress has power to regulate interstate commerce, and if, as has recently been held, it may regulate the relation of master and servant where the master is engaged in interstate commerce, manifestly it may regulate the effect of the contract which the carrier makes with the shipper and provide that certain provisions of the contract shall be ineffectual. We have in our Constitution a provision that a common carrier shall not make any contract limiting its common-law liability. Similar provisions have been made in other states by statute or by the Constitution, and we are not aware that in any case such a provision has been held invalid. The act of Congress is simply a regulation as to the effect to be given such contracts. It is not, in this case at least, a taking of private property for public purposes; for the defendant voluntarily received the property for transportation by it and its connecting lines. What its liability would be if it had refused so to receive the property is a question not presented. The act applies to carriers "receiving property for transportation from a point in one state to a point in another state." A carrier who voluntarily enters into the relation of connecting carrier with another and receives property for through transportation is bound by the act; and whether or not he may, if he so elects, stay out of such relations and only receives property for transportation over his own line is not necessary to be determined here. There is no reason why Congress within its jurisdiction may not establish any such regulations as a state Legislature might establish within its jurisdiction in matters of this sort.

Judgment affirmed.

RYAN et al. v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE et al.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 6, 1909.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 183*)—WATERWORKS—TRANSFER TO CITY—VALIDITY.

The capital stock of a water company was owned by a city, and its council adopted an ordinance directing the commissioners of its sinking fund, custodians of the stock, to vote the whole of it for the transfer of the property to the city, to be, when transferred, under the control of the board of waterworks. The commissioners voted the stock at a regular meeting for the purpose indicated, and thereafter the president and secretary of the corporation, by resolu-

2. TAXATION (§ 217*)—EXEMPTION—CITY WATERWORKS PROPERTY.

The waterworks system, owned and operated by a city for the benefit of its inhabitants, is used for public or governmental purposes, and is exempt from taxation, under Const. § 170, exempting from taxation public property used for public purposes.

3. TAXATION (§ 453*)—ASSESSMENT—RELIEF FROM IMPROPER ASSESSMENT.

Where the assessed valuation of property is excessive, or there is an attempted assessment of omitted property, the remedy is by an application to the board of supervisors, and to appeal from their action, except on the question of valuation, and injunction does not lie; but it is otherwise where the property is not liable to taxation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 809; Dec. Dig. § 453.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 251*)—EXEMPTION—RELIEF FROM IMPROPER ASSESSMENT.

Where the assessment for taxation of waterworks property of a city will create an apparent lien thereon, and a cloud on the title should the city wish to contract for an improvement of the property, or sell it, before litigation by the ordinary statutory methods to determine whether the property is exempt, equity will interfere, by injunction, to prevent the threatened cloud, because the property is exempt from taxation.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the City of Louisville and others against Thomas Ryan and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Joe Selligman, Chealey H. Searcy, and Jas. Breathitt, Atty. Gen., for appellants. Carroll & Middleton, for appellees.

SETTLE, C. J. This appeal presents for review a judgment of the Jefferson circuit court, chancery branch, second division, by which the appellant Thomas Ryan, assessor of Jefferson county, was perpetually enjoined from assessing, for state or county taxation for the year 1908, the property of the appellee city of Louisville known as the "Louisville Waterworks"; the action for the injunction having been instituted against the assessor by the appellee city of Louisville.

In the case of Bell, Sheriff, v. Louisville Water Company, 106 S. W. 862, this court held that the same property was subject to taxation because the title was at that time vested in a corporation known as the Louisville Water Company, although the whole of the capital stock of that company was owned by the city of Louisville. Immediately following the decision in that case, the water company paid all taxes then due or claimed, together with the interest and penalties resulting from their previous nonpayment. Since that time, however, and prior to September 1, 1908, the entire waterworks plant, its franchise, and effects were transferred and conveyed by the Louisville Water Company to the appellee city of Louisville, and the title thereto, at the time it would have been assessed by appellant but for the injunction preventing its assessment, was vested in the city of Louisville. No doubt can exist as to the validity of this transfer. It was effected in the following manner: The general council of the city, by ordinance duly enacted, directed the commissioners of its sinking fund, custodians of its stock in the Louisville Water Company, to vote the whole of it for the transfer to the municipality of the entire waterworks property, to be, when transferred, under the control of its board of waterworks. The board of sinking fund commissioners, as directed by the ordinance, at a regular meeting voted all the stock of the city in the Louisville Water Company for the purpose indicated. Thereafter the president and secretary of the Louisville Water Company, by resolution of its board of directors, adopted at a regular meeting, executed and delivered a deed conveying the waterworks plant, and property of every kind, of the Louisville Water Company to the city of Louisville, thereby legally consummating the transfer and vesting the title thereto in the municipality.

Conceding the transfer of the property to the city to be valid, does that relieve it from the burden of taxation? The question must be given an affirmative answer, unless this court should conclude to overrule numerous recent cases, in which it was held that such property cannot be taxed, because relieved of that burden by section 170 of the Constitution, which declares: "There shall be exempt from taxation public property used for public purposes." As the city of Louisville is but a political subdivision of the state, and may under its charter own and maintain, for the health, safety, and comfort of its inhabitants, the system of waterworks to which it has legally acquired title, such use of the property, being a use for public or governmental purposes exclusively, exempts it from taxation. This conclusion is so well supported by the subjoined list of authorities that further discussion of the matter would be a work of supererogation. Commonwealth v. City of Covington (Ky.) 107 S. W. 231, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1214; City of Frankfort v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 94 S. W. 648; City of Owensboro v. Commonwealth, 105 Ky. 344, 49 S. W. 320, 44 L. R. A. 202; City of Covington ton v. District of Highlands (Ky.) 110 S. W. 338.

It is, however, insisted for appellant that the city of Louisville cannot enjoin the assessor from assessing its property for taxation, although the property may be exempt from taxation. We think this contention untenable. It is true that a mere informality or irregularity in the assessment of property or collection of a tax will not authorize an injunction. The same is true where the assessed value is too high, or there is an attempted assessment of omitted property, for the statute affords a remedy in such cases. Application for relief may be made to the board of supervisors, and from their action, except on the question of valuation, an appeal may be taken to the quarterly court; but we do not understand that the property owner or taxpayer is confined to the statutory remedies, where there is an illegal assessment, or attempted assessment, of property or the collection of a tax, and the property is exempt from taxation. In such case the property owner or taxpayer may, in a court of equity, enjoin the illegal assessment or collection. Time and again the State Board of Valuation and Assessment has been enjoined from placing its valuation upon the franchise of a railroad or other corporation. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 94 S. W. 655; Hager v. American Surety Company, 121 Ky. 791, 90 S. W. 550. No reason is perceived for not also resorting to this remedy to prevent the assessor from assessing property which is not subject to taxation. It is alleged in the petition that the assessment for taxation of appellee's waterworks plant and property will create an apparent lien upon it, and cloud upon its title, should it wish to contract for its improvement, or to sell it, before litigation, by the ordinary statutory methods, to determine whether it is liable to taxation would end. This being true, a court of equity will interfere, by injunction, to prevent such threatened cloud upon the title to its property.

The only authority cited by appellant in support of his contention is the case of Baldwin v. Shine, 84 Ky. 502, 2 S. W. 164, but a close examination of the opinion in that case will show that it does not furnish the support claimed. It was therein decided that the county judge could be enjoined from fixing a final valuation upon the property sought to be assessed, after reaching which conclusion the court further said: "Of course this rule does not apply to an ordinary assessment, not final in its character, where the party may apply to the board of supervisors or the county judge for relief." Manifestly, the last statement was mere dicta, for the relief sought in the case did not result from an act of the assessor, but of the county judge. The case of Baldwin v. Shine was based on a statute which is not now in force, viz., the act of 1873 (Gen. St. 1873, c. 92, art. 7, § 2), which provides that: "A person improperly charged with any tax or county levy, before he has paid the same, may make proof thereof to the county court in which the assessment was made and the court may correct the same." Under the present statute it has been decided by this court that, where the assessment of the property is void, the property owner is not required to appeal to the board of supervisors or quarterly court for relief, but may by injunction obtain it. Mt. Sterling Oil & Gas Company v. Ratliff (Ky.) 104 S. W. 903.

The injunction in the instant case was properly granted. Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Campbell County.

Personal injury action by Joseph England against the Town of Bellevue. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Caldwell, for appellant. F. B. Bassmann, for appellee.

O'REAR, J. An addition to Bellevue, known as "Bonnie Leslie," was annexed to the city some years ago. Its principal street was not in very good condition at the time of annexation, perhaps. At any rate, it grew worse, because of lack of repairs, so that deep gullies were washed in the street. The sidewalk, a board affair, was allowed to fall in such disrepair that it had to be abandoned by pedestrians. Appellee, who lived in Bonnie Leslie, was traveling on December 26, 1906, along this street, when he slipped on the ice which had formed in one of the gullies, and fell, breaking his kneecap. He sued the city to recover damages. In addition to the bad condition of the street surface, he alleged: That a water main in the street had sprung a leak some months previous, and that the escaping water found its way down the street into these gullies; that the city authorities had been notified a number of times, and for several months before his injury, of the condition of the water main, but negligently failed to cause it to be repaired. The condition of the street was such that it was necessary in traveling upon it to walk through these gullies. The court told the jury that, if the defendant negligently failed to keep its street in reasonably safe condition for those traveling upon it, and negligently allowed the water from the broken main to escape into the street, forming ice, when the city had notice of the condition long enough to have repaired it, it was liable. The jury were also told that the plaintiff must exercise due care for his own safety, and that such care was that which an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised for his own safety under the same or similar circumstances. We think these instructions fairly submitted the question of liability and duty in the premises.

It is argued that, as the plaintiff in the daytime walked upon the dangerous place, he cannot recover, as he had not the right to voluntarily go into the danger. Pedestrians have the right to use a city street to walk upon it. If the city has not made it reasonably safe, pedestrians may nevertheless walk upon it, but are required to exer-he travels, he will be held to be negligent if he, with knowledge of the conditions, voluntarily assumes the more hazardous; but the proof by the plaintiff was that this was the only way of travel, and that he had no option of a safer way.

In the measure of damages submitted to the jury, the court erroneously included an element which ought not to have been submitted. In addition to the plaintiff's mental and physical suffering, loss of time, expenses incurred, and impairment of his capacity to earn money, the court told the jury that they might compensate the plaintiff for any diminution of his power to pursue the course of life he might otherwise have done. If that meant a diminution of his power to earn money (and we think it did), it was already covered by the instructions. If it meant anything else, then it was an element which the law does not authorize. Its form is calculated to lead into a field of speculation too indefinite to afford the basis of legal compensation. However, the verdict of the jury was for only $575. The injury was very painful and incapacitated the plaintiff from labor for 13 weeks. He was an engineer receiving $15 a week. His physician's bill was $50. His leg is left weak, and he cannot walk without a cane or crutch. It interferes seriously with his ability to get about and perform labor at his calling. The jury could not have wandered very far afield in their verdict, when, after compensating the plaintiff for his time lost and his doctor's bill, they allowed him only $330 for his suffering and the impairment for the future of his earning capacity. We cannot regard the error as prejudicial in view of the size of the verdict. When the record shows affirmatively, as this one does, that the error was harmless, the judgment will not be reversed for it.

The jury found the fact to be that the negligence of the city in suffering the street to be out of repair and escaping water from a hydrant to run into the places in freezing weather, where pedestrians had to walk, was the direct and proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. There is enough evidence, if believed, to support this verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Casey County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Mary C. White against Lillie Holder and others. From part of the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

McQuown & Beckham and Godbey & Moore, for appellant. N. H. W. Aaron, for appellees.

LASSING, J. Thomas White, a resident of Casey county, died intestate in September, 1904, leaving surviving him, as his only heirs at law, his wife, Elizabeth White, and two daughters, Mary C. White and Lillie Holder. At the time of his death he owned a small farm worth less than $1,000, upon which he resided. After his death his widow, Elizabeth White, continued to reside thereon, using and occupying the entire farm, and receiving the profits therefrom, as a homestead. On September 10, 1907, or about three years after the death of her husband, she married one J. T. Allen. After her marriage to Allen, she left the home of her former husband, and went to live with her present husband, and has since continued to reside with him upon his farm. About a month after she had so married and left the farm, her daughter, Mary C. White, brought suit in the Casey circuit court against her sister, Lillie Holder, and her husband, in which she sought to have the farm divided between herself and her sister. On the 2d day of December following, her mother, Elizabeth Allen, filed her petition to be made a party to this suit, and asked that her petition be taken as her answer. In it she alleged that, as the widow of her deceased husband, Thomas White, she was entitled to a dower interest in his land, and she asked that same be allotted to her. The plaintiff filed a reply to the answer of Elizabeth Allen, in which she denied the material allegations thereof, and pleaded affirmatively, in the second paragraph of her reply, that her mother had elected to take a homestead in the premises described in the pleadings, and had done so, and after having used and enjoyed same for a time, to wit, up to the date of her second marriage, she abandoned it, and thereby forfeited all of her rights therein. Thereafter the defendants Lillie Holder and her husband, as next friend for their three children, filed a petition to be made parties, and made same an answer to the petition of plaintiff, and to the petition of Elizabeth Allen to be made a party, in which they alleged that they were the owners of the dower interest of Elizabeth Allen in said land, and filed as an exhibit a deed from Elizabeth Allen, conveying to them her dower interest in said land. To this petition Elizabeth Allen filed a reply, in which she traversed the material allegations thereof and pleaded affirmatively that the said deed had never been delivered by her to them, and that they had paid her no part of the purchase money stipulated therein, and had obtained possession of the deed without her knowledge or consent. She prayed that the deed be canceled and held for naught. Plaintiff filed a reply to the answer of Lillie Holder, in which she traversed the affirmative allegations therein. The allegations in the second paragraph of the reply of plaintiff to the answer of Elizabeth Allen were not traversed or denied by Elizabeth Allen, nor were the allegations in the reply of Elizabeth Allen traversed or denied by her codefendant, Lillie Holder. The only evidence in the case is the deposition of Elizabeth Allen. Upon the pleadings and this deposition, the case was submitted for judgment, and the court found and adjudged that the deed filed by Lillie Holder, etc., was inoperative, null, and void, and adjudged that the defendant Elizabeth Allen was entitled to dower in said land, and appointed commissioners to lay off and allot same to her and divide the remainder equally between the plaintiff, Mary C. White, and the defendant Lillie Holder. From so much of the judgment as awards dower to Elizabeth Allen, and denies to plaintiff, Mary C. White, a right to a half interest in the land owned by her father at his death, the plaintiff, Mary C. White, prosecutes this appeal.

It is well settled that a widow is entitled to either dower or homestead in the lands of her deceased husband, at her election, and it is equally well settled that she has a reasonable time after the death of her husband to make said election; but she can exercise this right but once, and, having elected to take either homestead or dower, she may not thereafter change her mind and take the other. As said by this court in the case of Phillips v. Williams, 118 S. W. 908: "When a widow elects to take a homestead in lieu of dower, and abandons the homestead by a sale or otherwise, this ends her right to a homestead in the land. That she cannot repossess herself of a homestead, or take dower therein instead of the homestead. * * * If she elects to take homestead, she takes no tion shows conclusively that the widow, after the death of her husband, consulted with her daughters, her son-in-law, and her neighbors as to her rights in the premises, and, having done so, she elected to take a homestead in the land, as is evidenced by the following questions and answers taken from her deposition: "Q. Was there ever any agreement or arrangement between you and the children of Thomas White as to whether you were to have dower or homestead in said lands? A. They agreed that the land was mine, that there was no more than a homestead." And again: "Q. You were advised after the death of your husband that you could hold the whole of this farm as a homestead, were you not? A. Yes, sir; I was advised by my neighbors that joined the land and by my son-in-law that came to town and saw about it. Q. After you had been advised, you decided to use and occupy the whole of this land, did you not? A. Yes, sir; I also proposed to Mary C. White that she could come and live with me, and that she could have a support out of the lands. And I also proposed to Lillie and her husband that they could come and live with me, and that we would do the best we could out of the land. I had no one to live with me." As said in the case of Phillips v. Williams, supra, the mere fact that the widow remains a few years after the death of her husband, upon the premises, and occupies the house, is not alone, or of itself, conclusive evidence that she elected to take a homestead in the land. While such conduct would raise a presumption that she had so elected, still, as said in that opinion, it is not conclusive; but where she has conferred with the other heirs at law of her husband, and claims the entire property as a homestead, and occupies it during her widowhood, and until she has married again, and gone off to the home of her new husband, she will not be heard to say that she had not made an election; nor can she surrender the homestead right so taken and acquired by her, and take a dower interest in lieu thereof.

During the years of her widowhood, appellee, by every word and act, indicated that she had made an election to take a homestead rather than a dower interest in said land, and, so far as the evidence shows, she made no pretense to be holding it otherwise until about the time she was to marry again and leave the place. Then, it seems, she proposed selling her interest in the land to the wife and children of Billie Holder, her son-in-law, for $75. The record shows that they paid her no money, and she held the deed and refused to deliver it, but that afterwards paid nothing for it, and the trial court properly held that no interest passed to them thereunder. But, even had the deed been valid, they would have acquired no interest thereunder, for the reason that Elizabeth Allen, having elected to take homestead in said land, forfeited all right to same by her abandonment thereof, and, under the authority of Phillips v. Williams, supra, a purchaser from her would get nothing by the conveyance.

The land in question belongs to the appellant, Mary C. White, and the appellee Lillie Holder jointly, and appellee Elizabeth Allen has no interest whatever therein.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Action by C. O. Barnes and another against N. L. Barnett, county judge. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

T. Z. Morrow and Simpson Phelps, for appellants. O. H. Waddle & Son, for appellee.

LASSING, J. C. O. Barnes was arrested on a warrant issued by appellee, N. L. Barnett, county judge of Pulaski county, charged with violating the stock law by suffering and permitting his cattle to run at large within magisterial district No. 1 of Pulaski county. He was tried, found guilty, and his punishment fixed at a fine of $5. He replevied the fine and costs, and, when the replevin bond became due, an execution was had thereon, and placed in the hands of the sheriff, who returned it unsatisfied. On the day that this execution was returned unsatisfied, the appellant Barnes and his surety, J. W. Simpson, brought suit in the Pulaski circuit court against appellee, as county judge, in which they sought to enjoin him from issuing another execution, on the ground that the judgment imposing the fine of the voters asking for the election was not filed in the county court; that both the fiscal and county courts for said county could not meet on the same day; and that either the order filing the petition or the order of the fiscal court authorizing the election was void; and, also, that the fiscal court did not decide whether the vote should be taken in the entire county or in a magisterial district or voting precinct.

Upon the filing of this suit a temporary restraining order was granted by the clerk of the circuit court. A general demurrer was filed to the petition, and a motion was made to quash the restraining order issued by the clerk. Pending the ruling of the court upon the demurrer the appellee filed his answer in which he set up fully the manner in which the stock law had been attempted to be put in force in magisterial district No. 1, and filed with his answer the orders of the fiscal and county courts made with reference thereto, and, upon the issues as joined, the case was submitted for judgment. Whereupon an order was entered dismissing the petition and discharging the injunction, and from that order this appeal is prosecuted.

Several questions are raised upon this appeal, but from the conclusion which we have reached it is necessary to consider but one, to wit, that the court was without jurisdiction to grant the injunction, and upon this ground, no doubt, sustained the demurrer to the petition. Section 284 of the Civil Code of Practice provides: "No injunction shall be granted to stay proceedings upon a judgment of a justice of the peace, or of a county court, if the value of the matter in dispute do not exceed twenty-five dollars." This provision was adopted by the Legislature for the express purpose of preventing vexatious litigation over inconsequential matters. The ruling of the trial court might be upheld upon other grounds, but for the reason indicated it is unnecessary to consider them.

Judgment affirmed.

Armstrong & Duvall, for appellant. H. R. Dysard, for appellees.

SETTLE, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the Carter circuit court sustaining a demurrer to appellant's petition and dismissing the action. The action was instituted by appellant against appellees to recover of them $2,000 damages for the alleged breach of a contract which he claimed to have made with appellees in West Virginia, and by the terms of which, as averred in the petition, he undertook to work for them as foreman of their rock crusher for a term of four years from March 15, 1907, for which they agreed to bear the expense of his removal from West Virginia and to pay him $3.25 per day for each working day, during the four years, whether their rock crusher was operated or not. It was further alleged in the petition that appellees also agreed to furnish appellant, free of cost, during the four years, what coal he would need, a good, roomy dwelling house, fertile garden, thrifty bearing orchard, and five acres of productive, tillable land, for the use of himself and family, and to furnish him during the four years all necessary supplies for family use at a profit to appellees of 10 per cent. upon the cost price of such supplies. The petition contains the further averment that appellees also agreed to reduce the contract they made with appellant to writing and give him a copy thereof after it was signed by the parties, but that they failed to do so. It was further alleged in the petition that appellant removed to Carter, Carter county, Ky., and began work for appellees March 15, 1907, as he

he remained in their service, but that they wrongfully discharged him, failed to furnish him a house, orchard, and five acres of land as agreed, and also that they failed to furnish him coal and other supplies as stipulated.

The demurrer filed by appellees to the petition was sustained in the court below, for the very obvious reason that the petition admitted the contract was not in writing, and also that it was not to be performed within one year. Therefore it was within the statute of frauds and not enforceable, and, not being an enforceable contract, appellant could not recover of appellees damages for its breach. The statute (subsection 7, § 470, Ky. St. [subsection 7, § 1775, Russell's St.]) applies to oral or verbal contracts that are not to be performed by either party within a year. So, in all cases where the contract is such that it cannot be performed by either party within a year, then it is necessary that the agreement should be in writing and signed by each party, to make it binding on both. Klein v. Liverpool Ins. Co., 57 S. W. 250; Smith v. Theobald, 86 Ky. 141, 5 S. W. 394; Holloway v. Hampton, 4 B. Mon. 415. There is nothing in a verbal contract for hire, not to be performed within a year, that differentiates it from other contracts. Therefore it is within the statute of frauds. 20 Cyc. 207.

It is likewise true that a contract for the sale of real estate, or any lease thereof for a longer term than one year, must be in writing, and it has been held by this court that a lease of land for the term of one year from a future date is not enforceable, unless the contract is in writing. Greenwood v. Strother, 91 Ky. 482, 16 S. W. 138. So in the instant case appellant was in no better attitude to recover damages for the alleged failure of appellees to furnish him the house, orchard, and five acres of land, than he was to recover for any other alleged breach by appellees of their contract with him.

The fact, alleged in the amended petition, that the contract was made in West Virginia, cannot prevent the application of the statute of frauds, as it is admitted in the petition that it was to be performed in Kentucky. Besides, if it were not true that the laws of this state would govern the rights of the parties under the contract, it is not sufficiently alleged in the petition that it is not within the statute of frauds in West Virginia.

The averments of the petition as to the alleged promise of appellees to reduce the contract to writing, and their failure to do so, cannot change the rights of the parties. As this is not a suit in equity to enforce performance of this alleged agreement, we need it and also recovery of them damages for its alleged breach, such a proceeding would destroy the usefulness of the statute of frauds. The courts cannot make a contract to suit one of the parties, but must take the contract as they find it, and determine the rights of the parties from it as the parties themselves make or leave it.

As appellant's petition did not state a cause of action, the demurrer was properly sustained.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

STANDARD LUMBER CO. v. COLDWELL.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 12, 1909.)
JUDGMENT (§ 570*)—RES JUDICATA—DISMISSAL OF PETITION.

A judgment dismissing a petition because not stating a cause of action is no bar to a new action on a good petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1039; Dec. Dig. § 570.*]

"Not to be officially reported."

On motion for rehearing. Portion of main opinion withdrawn, and motion denied.

For former opinion, see 117 S. W. 286.

CARROLL, J. The record does not show what disposition, if any, was made of the action as to any of the defendants except the Ohio Valley Tie Company. It appears that the demurrer filed by the Ohio Valley Tie Company to the petition as amended was sustained, and, declining to plead further, the petition as amended was dismissed. As stated in the opinion, the only parties to this appeal are the Standard Lumber Company appellant, and the Ohio Valley Tie Company appellee. Therefore the opinion did not in any manner whatever adjudicate or determine the rights of the Standard Lumber Company against any of the defendants other than the Ohio Valley Tie Company. As to the Ohio Valley Tie Company the general demurrer was sustained upon the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

In our opinion the demurrer of the Ohio Valley Tie Company was properly sustained. In view of the indorsement on the margin of the record, and the further fact that the record did not show any assignment of the notes by Patton, the petition should have affirmatively stated facts sufficient to avoid the release purporting to have been made by Patton, and showed by appropriate averments that Howard was not authorized to sign Patton's name, and that Campbell was not authorized to attest the release. As the petition did not state a cause of action, the dismissal of it does not prevent the Standard Lumber Company from instituting a new action at law against the Ohio Valley Tie Company, a solvent corporation, to recover from it the value of the timber alleged to have been wrongfully converted by it. Potter v. Bengé (Ky.) 87 S. W. 1005. If a new suit is instituted against the Ohio Valley Tie Company, the question as to the sufficiency of the release of the mortgage, and the effect, if any, of the failure by Patton to transfer the notes on the record, as well as the declarations, if any, made by Patton to the Ohio Valley Tie Company that the lien was satisfied, can be raised by the pleadings and evidence and determined by the court.

So much of the opinion as considers the validity or sufficiency of the release is withdrawn, and the petition for rehearing is overruled.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 12, 1906.)

1. MERCANTILE AGENCIES (§ 1*)—OCCUPATION —“INQUIRING INTO AND REPORTING ON CREDIT.”

A corporation whose business is to guarantee, indorse, secure payment of debts and obligations, insure fidelity of persons and concerns holding positions of trust, and through guaranteed attorneys furnish direct to subscribers of a quarterly publication, and not through the company, the commercial standing of merchants and other persons is engaged in the business of inquiring into and reporting on the credit and standing of persons engaged in business within Ky. St. 1900, § 4224 (Russell's St. § 6157), requiring persons or concerns so engaged to secure a license.

2. LICENSES (§ 42*)—OCCUPATION—FAILURE TO OBTAIN LICENSE—PROSECUTION—DEFENSES.

In the prosecution of a corporation for engaging in a specified business without an occupation license, it is no defense that in engaging in such business defendant exceeded its corporate powers.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fleming County. “To be officially reported.”

Proceedings by the Commonwealth against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company for failure to obtain an occupation license. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Power and Allen D. Cole, for appellant. M. J. Hennessey, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. One of the subsections of section 4224 of the Kentucky Statutes of the 1900 edition (Russell's St. § 6157) provides that “each and every person, partnership or corporation having representatives in this state, who engage in the business of inquiring into and reporting upon the credit and standing of persons engaged in business in this state, shall pay a license tax of one hundred dollars. Any person having such license shall print in his letter head a statement of the fact. The payment of the tax shall be made direct to the Auditor, and his receipt therefor shall exempt the company or party carrying on said business from the payment of such tax in any county, and payment of such tax shall not be required of any subagent or correspondent of the party for the company carrying on said business in this state; and any such person acting as correspondent or subagent of such agent or company, and who shall transact any business, make report to such company, whether within or without this state, without the party or company having first paid the tax herein provided, shall be liable to all penalties for carrying on the business without paying the tax.” The appellant was proceeded against by penal action for violating this section by failing to procure the license therein mentioned, and upon a trial on an agreed state of facts was found guilty and fined $100. Insisting that it was not engaged in the business described in the statute, it asks that the judgment against it be reversed.

It appears from the agreed statement of facts that the company is a Maryland corporation, with power to guarantee, indorse, secure payment, and punctual performance and collection of notes, debts, bills of exchange, contracts, bonds, accounts, and other evidences of debt. It is further authorized to insure the fidelity of any person, partnership, association, corporation, or company holding any place or position of trust or responsibility, or owing any duty, contractual, or otherwise, to any person or persons. It further appears that the company issues a publication styled “Guaranteed Attorneys Quarterly,” and that, in consideration of the fee paid to it by attorneys throughout the country, it inserts their names in these quarterlies, and guarantees merchants and other persons sending to these attorneys claims that they will promptly and faithfully pay over all money collected. It also furnishes to merchants and other persons for a consideration its list of guaranteed attorneys, and provides both the attorneys and the subscribers with blank forms upon which information respecting the financial standing of persons whom the subscribing merchants desire to deal with may be furnished by the attorneys. J. H. Power and T. L. Gibbons, attorneys at law in Fleming county, were among the guaranteed attorneys of this company, and these attorneys from time to time, and when requested, answered such inquiries concerning the business and commercial standing of persons as subscribing members to the list of guaranteed attorneys desired. These doing the business described in the section of the statute supra? It had as representatives in Fleming county Powers and Gibbons, and guaranteed to all of its subscribers that they would diligently and faithfully transact business committed to their care. As a part of the consideration for being thus listed and bonded by this company, these attorneys agreed that they would furnish reports of the financial credit and standing of persons to any subscribers for the book published by the company containing a list of its bonded attorneys. Under this arrangement, the company received a fee from the attorneys whose integrity and fidelity it guaranteed, and also a fee from the merchants and others to whom it sold its book containing the names of these attorneys. It is true that these attorneys did not make reports of the financial standing of individuals directly to the company, but it did make such reports to all persons who were authorized by the company to request them. In our opinion the company within the meaning of the statute was engaged through its attorneys in the business of inquiring into and reporting upon the credit and standing of persons engaged in business in this state. The fact that the attorneys were not exclusively engaged in the business of furnishing information concerning the financial standing of merchants and others, or the fact that the company guaranteed their fidelity generally, did not alter the fact that they did as the agents and representatives of the company make these reports. We are not able to perceive any difference, so far as the result desired to be accomplished is concerned, between sending the report direct to the company to be furnished by it to the merchant and sending it immediately to the merchant. In each instance the company through its agents gathered the information and distributed it to the persons entitled to receive it. There are several concerns distinctly known as commercial agencies, such as Dunn and Bradstreet, that are engaged exclusively in this business. These agencies obtain through their representatives or attorneys information as to the financial standing of persons and furnish this information to their subscribers; but in the end the only difference between their methods and those employed by the appellant company is in the means by which the desired end is attained and the volume of business done. The contract entered into between the appellant company and its attorneys required them to furnish the information free to all subscribers for torney because he is a bonded representative of the company, and the attorney gives the subscriber the information desired because his contract with the company obliges him to do so. So that, in every detail of the transaction, the attorney is acting as a representative of the company. The statute should be construed liberally to carry out its intent, and its purpose is clearly expressed in the sentence declaring that "each and every person, partnership, or corporation, having representatives in this state, who engage in the business of inquiring into and reporting upon the credit and standing of persons engaged in business in this state, shall pay a license tax of one hundred dollars." We do not deem it necessary to inquire into the power of the company under its charter to do the character of business for which it was prosecuted. It assumed the right under its charter to engage in this business, and will not be heard to say, when prosecuted for failing to obtain the necessary license, that in doing so it exceeded its charter powers.

Wherefore the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Laurel County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Death action by James Bruton's administrator against the Eddington-Griffiths Construction Company and another. There was a directed verdict for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for a new trial as to the mentioned defendant, and affirmed as to the other.

W. E. Evans and C. C. Williams, for appellant. J. W. Alcorn, for appellees.

HOBSON, J. The Eddington-Griffiths Construction Company entered into a contract with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to make a tunnel for it in Laurel county. James Bruton was a colored laborer in its service, and while at work in the tunnel was killed by a stone which fell from the roof of the tunnel upon him, mashing him so that he died almost immediately. This action was brought by his administrator against both the railroad company and the construction company to recover for his death. At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendants. A verdict and judgment having been rendered for the defendants, the plaintiff appeals.

The peremptory instruction as to the railroad company was proper, as the deceased was not in its service, and there was nothing in the evidence to make it responsible for his death. As to the construction company, a different question is presented. The relation of master and servant existed between the deceased and it. It was incumbent on it to use ordinary care to furnish the deceased a reasonably safe place to work. The rock which fell was a large piece of slate, and is called by one of the witnesses a "horseback." It was 2 or 3 feet wide, 2 feet broad, and a foot or more thick. It fell about 20 feet from the mouth of the tunnel. The tunnel had been cut for about 50 feet. For about 35 feet it was completed, and for about 15 feet the bench had not been taken out. The deceased was working on the floor of the tunnel cleaning it up. He belonged to what was called the "night shift," and had only been at work a few minutes when the rock fell upon him. The roof of the tunnel, so far as it had been completed, was not braced or protected in any way to prevent the stone above from falling down, although preparation had around that were streaks and muddy seams where the water had seeped through, and where it looked like plugs would drop out at any time on any little jar. He also proved by J. W. Hodges: That about two days before the deceased was killed he was at the tunnel and looked at the roof; that he saw some rocks fall while he was working there; there were seams in the rock, and the rock looked loose up in there, and looked like they might fall out at any time; at places it looked like the rock was seamy; that this condition existed at the point where the deceased was killed, and at all points along about there; the seams looked like dirt seams; it was bad rock in there. Timbers had been hauled there for the purpose of bracing up the tunnel, but had been used for another purpose. The witness had worked in coal mines and had eight years of experience in such mines. Some of the cracks were two inches wide. The plaintiff also introduced Thomas Potter and proved by him the location of the deceased about 20 feet from the mouth of the tunnel at the time he was killed. On cross-examination the defendant showed by Potter: That he was foreman in charge of the gang; that on that afternoon before Potter went to work he had taken a sounding bar and scaled the roof, knocking on the roof of the tunnel to ascertain if anything was loose, and get it down; that the roof was of solid slate at that time; that he discovered nothing wrong, did not see any cracks there; and that the place that fell was a horseback which would give no notice of its liability to fall until it came down. The plaintiff also showed that the tunnel was dark, was only lit by some gasoline torches which would throw light upon the floor, but would not throw light on the roof overhead so that the deceased could see the condition of the roof.

When the plaintiff introduced Potter, the defendant was at liberty on cross-examination to go into new matter and to prove by the witness any facts which he could testify to; but, if his testimony was inconsistent with the testimony of other witnesses given on the trial, it would be a question for the jury which witness they would believe. If the testimony of the witnesses Nickolson and Hodges was true, the condition of the roof of this tunnel was very different from that which the witness Potter testified to on cross-examination, and, if their testimony was true, it was a question for the jury whether the master had used ordinary care to furnish his servant a reasonably safe place to work; for if the rock of the

The rule is that, if there is any evidence warranting a finding for the plaintiff, the question is for the jury, and the rule is not different although one of the witnesses introduced on behalf of the plaintiff may contradict the other witnesses introduced by him. The plaintiff read on the trial also the deposition of Eb Nelson, which tends to confirm the testimony of Nickolson and Hodges.

The judgment as to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company is affirmed; but as to the Eddington-Griffiths Construction Company the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 419*)—CONTRACT RELATING TO LAND—PAROL EVIDENCE.

Under Ky. St. § 470 (Russell's St. § 1775), declaring void oral contracts for the conveyance of land, and providing that the consideration need not be expressed in writing, but may be proved or disproved by parol or other evidence, the vendor of land under a contract cannot show by parol evidence that the amount recited in the contract to have been paid was not paid, but in lieu thereof there was an oral promise to convey certain other land on demand.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 103*)—TRANSFER OF LAND.

The execution of a deed to land and a tender thereof to the grantee as a compromise of a dispute between the parties which the grantee refused, is not a sufficient written acknowledgment of an oral contract to convey the land to take it from the operation of the statute of frauds so as to entitle such grantee to a specific performance.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Estill County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Curtis Richardson against Robert Isaacs and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. White and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg, for appellant. Riddell & Friend, for appellees.

"Article of agreement between C. Richardson of the first part and C. M. Isaacs of the second part. The party of the first part has sold to the party of the second part a certain tract of land known as the lower farm of Barker Gum, deceased, for seven hundred dollars, two hundred dollars in hand paid the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, which may be paid as follows: One tract of land in Jackson county known as the Sucky Isaacs, decd., farm supposed to be 150 acres more or less at two dollars and fifty cents per acre to go as a credit on the remainder of the five hundred dollars when said land is surveyed. Of general warranty on said land. This 22d day of February, 1894. Curtis Richardson. C. M. Isaacs." The petition alleges that the sum of $200, recited to have been paid by Isaacs to Richardson as part of the consideration for the conveyance from Richardson to Isaacs, was not, in fact, paid nor intended to be paid, but that, instead of paying the $200, C. M. Isaacs verbally agreed that he would, upon demand, convey to Curtis Richardson by deed of general warranty 150 acres of land in Jackson county, Ky., and give him a quitclaim deed to Isaacs' interest in another tract in Jackson county supposed to contain 550 acres. The appellees, who are the children of C. M. Isaacs, deceased, answered, denying all of the material allegations of the petition and pleading that Richardson had assigned the benefit of the written contract sued on to Capt. John Wilson. By reply Richardson, while admitting the assignment of the contract to Wilson, as set out in the answer, alleged that, by the assignment, it was only intended to transfer to Wilson the Sucky Isaacs farm mentioned in the contract, but that it was not intended to transfer to him any other interest in the contract. There were several amendments filed by the respective parties, and the pleadings are somewhat prolix and confused, but we think the material issues were substantially made by the pleadings mentioned. The chancellor, upon the trial of the case, dismissed the petition, and to review that judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

The verbal contract to convey the two tracts of land, as before stated, is clearly within the provisions of the statute of frauds. Section 470, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 1775), provides that: "No action shall be brought to charge any person * * * upon any contract for the sale of real estate, or any lease thereof for a longer term than one year; * * * unless the contract or some memorandum or note there, be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his authorized agent; but the considcould not in fact paid as alleged; but he could not, under the statute, inject into this written contract a verbal agreement to convey two tracts of land in lieu of the $200 which he says was not the real consideration for the contract. This would produce the very evil which the statute was intended to prevent.

But it is insisted for appellant: That, even assuming that the verbal contract set up in the petition is unenforceable under the statute, the evidence of plaintiff shows that Isaacs in his lifetime prepared a deed for 150 acres of land in Jackson county, Ky., which he and his wife signed and acknowledged, and that he afterwards tendered it to Richardson in full settlement of the claim of the latter under the contract sued on, but that Richardson refused to accept the deed as full settlement, and therefore it was not delivered; that this deed, signed by Isaacs, is a sufficient compliance with the statute of frauds; and that there should be a specific performance decreed for the 150 acres described in the deed. The answer to this proposition is that the evidence indubitably shows that the deed was prepared and tendered as a compromise on the part of Isaacs with Richardson, and that the latter refused to make the compromise or accept the deed as tendered. Isaacs did not admit that there was due from him, under the contract, the duty of conveying 150 acres of land to Richardson. On the contrary, the witness Winn, who prepared the deed and tendered it for him to Richardson, testified that Isaacs was thereby trying to buy his peace, and this deed cannot therefore, in any fair sense, be said to have been an acknowledgment in writing of the verbal contract set up in the petition.

There was no evidence, except the testimony of Richardson himself, which tended to show that the $200, recited in the written contract to have been paid, was not in fact paid by Isaacs, and his testimony on this point was clearly incompetent as against the dead man; nor was it made competent by the subsequent testimony by the heirs at law of Isaacs, as they did not testify on this point.

Upon the written contract between Richardson and Isaacs, hereinbefore set out, there was this indorsement: "March 1, '95. I assign the benefit of the within bond to Capt. John Wilson. C. Richardson." This assignment is admitted in the reply of the appellant. There is no evidence in the record, except the testimony of Curtis Richardson himself, which tends to limit the full scope of the assignment. Richardson's testi-

PHILADELPHIA CASUALTY CO. v. CAN- NON & BYERS MILLINERY CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 12, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 432*)—CREDIT INSURANCE— CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY—"EXPERIENCE."

A policy of credit insurance made the "experience" of the insured in dealing with its customers the basis of credit, and then provided that the highest previous indebtedness should be taken as an "experience" which would justify the indemnified in again extending credit to an old customer. Held, that the term "experience" meant a business transaction which was closed, since until the goods for which the credit was extended were paid for, and the transaction closed, the creditor would not be justified in extending further credit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 432.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 432*)—CREDIT INSURANCE— CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY—ADDITIONAL CREDIT—EFFECT OF RETURN OF GOODS PRE- VIOUSLY SOLD.

Where goods shipped C. O. D. were returned because the customer was unable to pay for them, this would be such an experience as would not warrant the extension of further credit to him, within the provision of a policy of credit insurance providing that the highest previous indebtedness should be taken as an experience, which would justify the indemnified in again extending credit to an old customer, but, if the goods were returned because not of the character bought or contracted for, the transaction should be entirely ignored, and credit might be extended to such customer as though the transaction had never taken place.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 432.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 432*)—CREDIT INSURANCE— CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY—PREVIOUS EX- PERIENCE—EXECUTION OF NOTE—"EXPERI- ENCE."

The execution of a note in payment for goods sold on credit did not, until payment of the note, close the transaction, so as to render it an "experience" which would justify the creditor in again extending credit to an old customer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 432.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 511*)—CREDIT INSURANCE— CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY.

A policy of credit insurance provided that, before being entitled to payment under the policy, the insured must first sustain an "initial loss," which was fixed at three-quarters of 1 per cent. of the gross business done by the insured, based upon his experience the previous year, and provided also that, if his total gross business should exceed the sum used as a basis, then the initial loss should be correspondingly increased. By a "rider" the policy was made to relate back to cover all outstanding accounts which had been created during the regular course of business in the six months preceding the date of the policy. Held, that the effect of the rider was simply to antedate the policy six months, and hence accounts made during such time must be treated as a part of

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

5. INSURANCE (§ 511*)—CREDIT INSURANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY—"FIRST BILL."

A policy of credit insurance insured a dealer against loss which he might sustain on account of nonpayment of the first bill for goods sold to new customers, which was not to be in excess of $400. Held, that "first bill" meant the particular articles contracted for at one time, without regard to the time within which the bill therefor should be paid, and did not include all goods, not exceeding $400, which were sold and delivered between the first sale and the maturity of the bill therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 511.*]

6. INSURANCE (§ 511*)—CREDIT INSURANCE—SALVAGE—APPLICATION OF.

Where a policy of credit insurance makes no provision as to the application of salvage, the insured is entitled to make such application of the salvage recovered by him as is beneficial to his interests, and hence may apply it to the discharge of those debts for which he holds no security and for the loss of which he is not indemnified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 511.*]

7. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—ACTION ON POLICY—EVIDENCE.

Where a policy of credit insurance provided that the insured should be indemnified against loss on account of sales of goods of the kind usually dealt in by the insured, and the accounts taken from the books of the insured showed the character of goods to be such as the insured dealt in, the items themselves furnished the best evidence as to the character of the goods sold, and hence no additional proof as to their character was required.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 665.*]

8. INSURANCE (§ 168*)—CREDIT INSURANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY.

A policy of credit insurance should not be so narrowly construed as to place upon the insured any unreasonable or unnecessary labor or expense in the presentation of his claim, nor should it be so liberally construed as to place upon the insurance company a liability which, by the fair construction of the terms of the policy, it had not contracted to assume.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 325; Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

9. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—CREDIT INSURANCE—ACTION ON POLICY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where, in an action on a policy of credit insurance, insured showed by evidence of its bookkeeper, speaking from the books of account before him, that he had sold and delivered to its various customers, whose accounts were involved in the action, the particular bills of goods set forth in the items of account filed with his deposition, and that these goods were not paid for, and accompanied his statements with such evidence of debt or insolvency in each particular case as the insured had received after investigation made, it established a prima facie case entitling it to judgment, in the absence of any claim or showing to the contrary.

peals, and plaintiff takes a cross-appeal. Reversed on the original appeal, and affirmed on the cross-appeal, and remanded, with instructions.

Gifford & Steinfeld, for appellant. R. C. Kinkead, for appellee.

LASSING, J. The Philadelphia Casualty Company issued to the Cannon & Byers Millinery Company a "credit bond," or policy of insurance, whereby it insured said millinery company against loss not exceeding $3,000, which it might sustain by reason of credit extended to its customers between July 1, 1908, and July 1, 1904. At the end of the period covered by the policy, the millinery company claimed that it had sustained a loss in excess of $3,000, and demanded payment of the full amount of the indemnity provided for in the policy. The insurance company denied liability, and the millinery company brought suit on the bond. Issue was joined on the question of liability under the terms of the policy, and because of the conflicting nature of the matters of account involved the case was, on motion of defendant, transferred to equity and referred to the commissioner to hear proof. This was done, and the result of the commissioner's finding reported to court. On exceptions to this report, the case was tried by the chancellor, and judgment was returned in favor of plaintiff for $1,140.87. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted by the casualty company, and the millinery company has prosecuted a cross-appeal.

As the ultimate liability of the insurance company is made to depend upon the construction that is placed upon the many provisions and conditions with which the policy is hedged about, when read in connection with the various "riders" thereto subsequently attached, it becomes necessary to analyze, consider, and determine the meaning of each of said provisions, conditions, and "riders" when taken in connection with the others. For, in this way only, can the rights of the parties to this litigation be determined.

The introduction of credit insurance in commercial life is of practically recent date, not only in Kentucky, but in the United States as well, and this court has not heretofore been called upon to construe any contract of this character; nor are we familiar with the decision of any court construing a contract of insurance similar to that presented in this case. Most all insurance of this character is based upon credit ratings as given by recognized commercial agencies, such as Dunn or Bradstreet; but this contract is based upon "experience," and the "experience" of the insured, in dealing with its customers, is made the basis of credit. Some confusion has arisen in the practical application of this term. Appellee contends that it means "business transactions," while appellant's interpretation of it is "a business transaction which is closed"; that is, the sale of a bill of goods for which the purchaser has paid. This latter is evidently the meaning that should be given the term as used in the policy, for, in fixing the basis of credit, the policy further provides that the highest previous indebtedness shall be taken as an "experience" which will justify the indemnified in again extending credit to an old customer. Now an indebtedness which has not been paid could not be called a "previous" indebtedness, for it would be a present indebtedness. An experience which would justify a creditor in again extending credit to a debtor must be a satisfactory experience, and no experience could be said to be satisfactory unless the goods sold were paid for.

Two questions of difference have arisen in the construction of this clause of the contract: First, where goods have been sold, and later returned; and, second, where the evidence of the indebtedness for the goods sold has been changed by the execution of a note for the account. In each of these instances it is the contention of appellee that it was entitled to extend to such creditor further credit; whereas, appellant takes the contrary view. In regard to goods returned, it seems that the reason for their being returned would have to be taken into consideration in determining whether or not further credit might be extended to such customer. If the goods had been shipped C. O. D., and were returned because the customer was unable to pay for and receive them, this would be such an experience as would not warrant further credit. On the other hand, if they were returned because not of the character bought or contracted for, then this transaction should be entirely ignored, and credit might be extended to such customer as though the transaction in which the return of the goods was involved had not taken place. The execution of a note for an account in no wise lessened the creditor's liability. It merely changed the form of the evidence of debt, and could not be accepted as satisfying the indebtedness. While, by the execution of a note, the indebtedness might be said to be placed in a more satisfactory form, still it could only be satisfied by payment, and the execution of a note for an account does not constitute such an experience as would justify further extension of credit.

The policy does not insure against all losses, but only such as may be incurred under certain stipulations. It appears that the insured must first sustain what is termed the "initial loss," and this is, by the policy, fixed at three-fourths of 1 per cent. of the gross business done by the insured, based upon his experience the previous year, when his total business was $200,000. The initial loss which the insured must stand was, on this basis, fixed at $1,500; but the policy provided that, if his total gross business should exceed $200,000, then the initial loss would be correspondingly increased. No difficulty arose over this clause of the policy; but, by an agreement entered into after the date of the policy, and evidenced by what is termed a "rider," the policy was made to relate back, so as to cover all outstanding accounts which had been created during the regular course of business in the six months next before the date of the policy. Appellee contends that these accounts are covered by the policy, no matter how created, while appellant insists that they are to be treated as though they were created after the issue of the policy, and are subject to the restrictions and limitations thrown around such accounts. As the supplemental agreement, or "rider," provides that these accounts shall be "covered upon the same conditions, and shall be included in the same manner as if the goods had been shipped since July 1, 1903," there is left little room for doubt upon this point, for the effect of this clause in the "rider" is simply to antedate the policy six months, and hence all accounts created in that period are governed and controlled by the policy just as though they had been created after its issue. As these accounts are covered on the same conditions as accounts created after the date of the policy, they must be treated as constituting a part of the gross business done by the insured during the life of the policy, and hence must be taken into account in determining the initial loss. The effect of the supplemental agreement covering the accounts for goods sold during the six months next before the date of the policy was simply to increase the gross business done by the company during the life of the policy to the amount of such accounts, and, as the initial loss is to be determined by taking three-fourths of 1 per cent. of the gross business, the chancellor erred in not taking these accounts into consideration as constituting a part of the gross business.

Another item of dispute is as to the meaning of the term "first bill," as used in the policy. Appellee contends that there should be included in this term all goods, not exceeding $400 in value, that are sold and delivered between the date of the first sale and the maturity of the bill therefor; whereas, appellant urges that only such goods as were actually sold at one time should be treated as a "first bill." This latter is the only reasonable construction that can be placed upon the term. Any other construction would enable the insured to hold the company liable for all goods, up to $400 in value, that it might sell during the period covered by the policy, if the time of payment of the bill of goods first ordered should be extended to the particular articles contracted for at one time, without regard to the time within which the bill therefor should be paid.

Two classes of customers are dealt with in the policy; those with whom the insured had previously dealt being termed "old customers," and all others "new customers." The insured, under the terms of the policy, is indemnified against loss on account of goods sold to old customers where the sale does not exceed the highest previous indebtedness of said old customer to the insured within 12 months next before the issue of the policy, and he is indemnified to the extent of 50 per cent. of any loss he may sustain on account of goods sold to new customers; provided, however, that no sale to any new customer shall exceed $400. All customers, new and old alike, under the terms of the policy, are permitted to make additional purchases during the life of the policy, and such new purchases may, at any time, equal the full amount of the previous indebtedness, and 50 per cent. thereof in addition. Such addition is treated as a sale to a new customer, and is only covered to the extent of 50 per cent. Thus, if an old customer had, during the year, purchased and paid for a bill of $800, he would be permitted, under the terms of the policy, to purchase a bill of goods of the value of $1,200, being the value of the amount of the highest previous indebtedness, plus 50 per cent. thereof; but the insured would only be indemnified, on account of this credit, to the extent of $800, plus one-half of the increase, which is $200, making his total indemnity $1,000. And, it is further provided that the insurance company shall, in no event, be liable for more than $1,000 on any single account.

Another difference of opinion has arisen as to the proper application of salvage. The policy makes no provision as to the application thereof. Appellant urges that the credit for salvage should be applied, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, to the discharge of that debt upon which, or for which, it was bound; whereas, appellee contends that any salvage recovered should be applied to the discharge of those debts for which it held no security, and for the loss of which it was not indemnified. We are of the opinion that as the policy of insurance, which is the contract between the parties, is silent upon this question, appellee had a right to make such application of the salvage as was most beneficial to its interests. In this particular the insured is certainly to be placed at no greater disadvantage than any other creditor, and the rule is well settled in this state and elsewhere that, where a creditor and, applying this rule to the case at bar, appellant is in no condition to complain because appellee allowed credit for salvage received, upon accounts for which appellant was not liable.

The policy provides that the insured shall be indemnified against loss on account of sales of goods of the kind usually dealt in and owned by the insured, and appellant insists that the evidence in this case fails to show that appellee was the sole owner of the goods sold to the various customers whose accounts are involved in this litigation, or that such goods as it did sell were of the kind usually dealt in by appellee. This contention is highly technical. The accounts taken from the books of the insured, in each instance, show the character of goods to be such as appellee dealt in. The items themselves furnish the best evidence as to the kind or character of goods sold and delivered in each instance. This being true, and these various items being the character of goods in which appellee dealt, no further evidence upon this point should or could reasonably be required. Additional proof should not be required to supplement the evidence furnished by the account itself, unless the items of goods as shown in the account fail to disclose the fact that they were of the character usually carried and dealt in by the insured. With the books of the insured open for the inspection of appellant, it could have easily discovered that the respective bills, or any of them, were not of the kind or character dealt in by appellee if such had been the case, and the fact that appellant cites no case where the goods so sold and delivered were not of the character usually dealt in by appellee, after it has had an opportunity to inspect the books while the proof was being taken before the commissioner, is the best evidence that there is no merit in this contention.

The policy should not be so narrowly construed as to place upon the insured any unreasonable or unnecessary labor or expense in the presentation of its claim. On the other hand, it should not be so liberally construed as to place upon the insurance company a liability which, by a fair construction of the terms of the policy, it had not contracted to assume. When the appellee showed, by the evidence of its bookkeeper, speaking from the records before him, that it had sold and delivered to its various customers, whose accounts were involved in this litigation, the particular bills of goods set forth in the items of account filed with his deposition, and that these goods were not paid for, and accompanied his statement with such evidence of debt or insolvency in each particular case as the insured had received after investigation made, it established a prima facie case—one upon which the chancellor was warranted in entering judgment in the absence of any claim or showing to the contrary. It is true that, in most instances, appellee might have made its claim stronger by introducing other evidence to show the failure of the different creditors whose accounts were involved; but this would have entailed, necessarily, much additional, and perhaps unnecessary, expense, which, in the end, if any liability attaches, would have to be borne by the appellant. When appellee had furnished to appellant such evidences showing insolvency in each particular case as it had at hand, appellant could have shown, had the facts warranted it, that these various creditors, for whose accounts appellee was seeking to be indemnified, were not in fact insolvent. Its failure to do so, or to make any effort to do so by introducing evidence of any character, while not conclusive, is persuasive that it was unable to do so.

Thirty-nine different accounts are involved in this litigation. There is a wide difference between the finding of the commissioner and the judgment by the court as to the extent of the insurance company's liability. This difference grows out of the different construction which the commissioner and the chancellor placed upon the various conditions and "riders" contained in and attached to the policy. The construction placed by the chancellor upon the provisions of the policy, and the "riders" thereto attached, were, with two exceptions, in accordance with the view herein expressed. His interpretation of what constituted a "first bill" was more favorable to the insured than it should have been, inasmuch as he included in this item all goods furnished to a new creditor by the insured, up to the value of $400, before the maturity of the claim for the first items of such account; whereas, he should have construed the term "first bill" as hereinbefore indicated. Likewise, his interpretation of the initial loss clause was more favorable to the insured than it should have been, in that he excluded from his consideration in fixing the initial loss the accounts for bills of goods sold during the six months next before the date of the policy. These should have been taken into account by him in determining the initial loss, as they clearly constituted a part of the gross business done by the company within the meaning of the provisions of the policy.

For these reasons, the judgment is reversed on the original appeal, and affirmed on the cross-appeal, and the case is remanded, with instructions to the chancellor to enter judgment in favor of the insured in accordance with the interpretation of the various provisions of the contract of insurance as above set out.

Where appellant failed to comply with Supreme Court Rule 9, requiring instructions given and refused to be set out in the abstract, the judgment will be affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Garland County; W. H. Evans, Judge.

Action by Fybush Bros. against J. Karatofsky. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. W. Leslie, for appellant. Greaves & Martin, for appellees.

HART, J. Appellees, Fybush Bros., brought suit against appellant, J. Karatofsky, in the Garland circuit court, to recover the sum of $1,000.30 alleged to be due upon account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold appellant by appellees. There was a trial before a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of appellees for the sum of $917.17. The case is here on appeal.

The only assignment of error is based upon the action of the trial court in refusing to give a certain instruction asked by appellant. This instruction is set out in appellant's abstract, but it appears that other instructions were given by the court, and that they are not set out in appellant's abstract. Rule 9 of this court requires that the instructions given, as well as those refused, by the court should be set out. The rule was adopted for the purpose of facilitating the work of the court, and is a very salutary one. Appellees have moved to affirm the judgment for noncompliance with this rule, and the motion will be granted. For cases in point, where the rule has been enforced, we refer to the cases of Mine La Motte L. & S. Co. v. Coal Co., 85 Ark. 123, 107 S. W. 174, and Files v. Law (Ark.) 115 S. W. 373, in which earlier cases applying the rule are cited.

PRICE v. GREER.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 26, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1140*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—REMISSION OF PART OF RECOVERY.

In trespass for cutting timber from several tracts, where the evidence did not show that plaintiff had more than color of title to one of the tracts, and a special verdict was rendered in his favor as to all the tracts, finding separately the amount of damage for cutting timber from each of them, the error could be cured by reacts done by a person who has acquired title to land by occupancy and payment of taxes for seven years under color of title, in recognition of the claim of the original owner, would only be important as a circumstance tending to show the character of the possession, whether adverse or not.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 216*)—PRESERVATION IN LOWER COURT OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a party made no request for submission of a question to the jury, he cannot complain that the court failed to instruct on the point.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 216;* Trial, Cent. Dig. § 627.]

On rehearing. Former opinion modified.

For former opinion, see 116 S. W. 676.

McCULLOCH, C. J. We said in the former opinion: "The evidence does not show the amount and value of timber cut from each tract, and the verdict of the jury fixes the gross value of timber cut from all the land." We erred in this, and our attention is now called to it. The court, at defendant's request, instructed the jury to state in the verdict the amount of timber cut from each tract, and the jury returned a special verdict finding separately the amount of damage for cutting timber from each of seven tracts. The amounts aggregated $721, for which the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and only one of the tracts was embraced in the suit of Andrews against Greer to quiet title. The amount of damages for cutting timber on this tract was fixed by the verdict at $160, and it is contended that a remittitur of this sum will cure the error which we found in the proceedings.

The other six tracts were embraced in the deed from Andrews to Greer executed pursuant to the contract of September 24, 1902, which was after the statute bar had attached in favor of Greer. With respect to that we said in the former opinion that: "The fact of Greer having accepted a conveyance from Andrews of lands not embraced in the suit to quiet title would not necessarily have been a recognition of Andrews' title and ownership so as to remove the statute bar in Greer's favor which had already attached." In the case of Hudson v. Stillwell, 80 Ark. 575, 98 S. W. 356, we announced the law on this subject as follows: "Any act done after seven years' occupancy in recognition of the claim of the original owner would only be important when done by the same person who held for the statutory period, as a circumstance tending to show the deed from Andrews at that time estopped him to claim title adverse to Andrews and his former grantee, Price. He cannot therefore complain that the court failed to instruct on this point.

We are of the opinion that a remittitur of $160, which the plaintiff offers to enter, and which reduces the judgment to $561, will eliminate the error in the proceedings.

Rehearing is therefore granted, and judgment will be entered accordingly.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 26, 1909.)

1. DRAINS (§ 36*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR ESTABLISHMENT—ALLOWANCE OF ATTORNEY'S FEES—RIGHT TO APPEAL THEREFROM.

Const. art. 7, § 33, provides that appeals from all judgments of county courts may be taken to the circuit court, under restrictions prescribed by law, and section 14 provides that circuit courts shall exercise appellate jurisdiction over county courts and other designated courts. Held, that there was a right of appeal from an order of the county court allowing fees to attorneys for a drainage district, though the right was not conferred by Kirby's Dig. § 1428, relating to appeals in proceedings under such act, and it could be exercised under the general act; Kirby's Dig. §§ 1487-1493, governing appeals from the county court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 44; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

2. DRAINS (§ 36*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR ESTABLISHMENT—ALLOWANCE OF ATTORNEY'S FEES—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

Const. art. 13, § 16, provides that any citizen of any county may sue in behalf of himself or of others interested to protect the inhabitants thereof against the enforcement of illegal exactions. Held, that a citizen of a county owning land in a drainage district was an interested party and not a mere interloper, and, if an order of the county court allowing fees to attorneys for the district was improperly made, it amounted to an illegal exaction, and he was individually interested in the order and could appeal therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 44; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; Frank Smith, Judge.

Application by Huddleston & Taylor and others for an allowance of fees as attorneys for Eight-Mile Drainage District No. 2. From the allowance thereof, M.-R. Coffman appealed to the circuit court, and, from the judgment fixing the fees in such court, the applicants appeal. Affirmed.

Huddleston & Taylor and Johnson & Burr, for appellants. J. D. Block, Jeff Bratton, S. R. Simpson, and Murphy, Coleman & Lewis, for appellee.

tofore duly appointed attorneys of record for Eight-Mile drainage district No. 2, and move the court to make to them an allowance for reasonable attorney's fees as attorneys for said district aforesaid, and in the fixing of said fee they ask that the court hear oral evidence as to what would be a reasonable attorney's fee in said cause, and for all other proper and needful relief." Upon hearing the application the county court made the following order: "On this the 13th day of April, 1908, the same being an adjourned day of the regular April, 1908, term of this court, this matter came on to be heard further upon the petition of Huddleston & Taylor and Johnson & Burr, attorneys heretofore appointed by the court to represent the said district as such, for the allowance of a reasonable attorney's fee herein, and upon the evidence of the following witnesses, to wit, W. S. Luna, J. T. Craig, and Basil Baker, each members of the bar. And the court after considering the same, and being duly advised in the premises, doth grant said petition and allow to said attorneys a fee of $4,000, which sum the court doth adjudge a reasonable fee herein." M. R. Coffman, an owner of real estate in said drainage district, duly prosecuted an appeal to the circuit court. On a trial anew in the circuit court, the presiding judge fixed the fee at $3,000, and judgment was rendered against said drainage district for that sum. Appellants in turn have duly prosecuted an appeal to this court.

Section 1424 of Kirby's Digest, among other things in regard to the construction of drains and ditches, provides that: "The county court shall also allow a reasonable attorney's fee in case an attorney has been appointed by the court to assist in the work provided for by this act." Section 1428 of the same act provides for an appeal from the county court to the circuit court in certain cases, and also specifies the time and manner of taking the appeal. The matters concerning which an appeal may be taken from the orders and judgments of the county court in relation thereto are expressly enumerated in the section. The matter of attorney's fees is not one of the subjects enumerated. The appeal in the present case was not taken under section 1428 of Kirby's Digest, relating to the drainage act, but under sections 1487-1493 of Kirby's Digest, being the general act regulating appeals from the county court. The provisions of section 1428 in regard to the time and manner of taking appeals from the county court must govern in regard to the particular cases mentioned in that section. Mills v. Sanderson, 68 Ark.

130, 56 S. W. 779. The allowance of attorney's fees not having been enumerated as a question from the decision of which an appeal is provided for under the drainage laws, can an appeal be taken from such order under the general law regulating appeals from the county court?

Section 33, art. 7, of our Constitution provides that: "Appeals from all judgments of county courts or courts of common pleas, when established, may be taken to the circuit court under such restrictions as may be prescribed by law." Section 14, art. 7, of the Constitution provides that circuit courts shall exercise appellate jurisdiction over county courts and other designated courts. It follows, then, that the right of appeal from the order of the county court in question existed; and, that right not having been conferred in the matter of allowing attorney's fees by the drainage act, it could be exercised under the general acts governing appeals from county courts. Phillips County v. Lee County, 34 Ark. 240. Coffman was a citizen of Greene county and owned land in the drainage district. He was therefore an interested party, and not a mere interloper. Section 13, art. 16, of the Constitution provides that: "Any citizen of any county, city or town may institute suit in behalf of himself and all others interested, to protect the inhabitants thereof against the enforcement of any illegal exactions whatever." The order of the county court, if improperly made, amounted to an illegal exaction, and Coffman, being individually interested in the order, had the right of appeal. This seems to us to be the plain and natural construction of these clauses of the Constitution. To hold otherwise would be to place the interested parties at the mercy of the county court, and might have the effect of imposing a grievous burden upon them without any right whatever of appeal.

This rule of construction was applied in the case of Lee County v. Robertson, 66 Ark. 82, 48 S. W. 901, in which the court held: "Where a citizen and taxpayer of a county appeared in the levying court, and asked to be made party to an order misappropriating county funds, and made objections thereto, and was treated as an adversary party in that court, though not formally made a party, he will be entitled to appeal to the circuit court from the order making such appropriation." See, also, Phillips County v. Lee County, supra. This being manifestly the construction intended by the framers of the Constitution and recognized by this court in adjudicated cases, it is unnecessary for us to discuss or review in this opinion the decisions of the courts of other states cited by the counsel for appellants.

Appellants do not contend that the reduction of the fee by the circuit court was error, and that question is not before us.

We are of the opinion that an appeal lay from the judgment of allowance of the county court in the matter of the attorney's fees, and, no appeal having been provided for in the act under which drainage districts are created, such appeal could be taken under the general acts governing appeals from the county courts, and that Coffman, being a citizen and landowner of the drainage district, had the right to appeal.

Therefore the judgment will be affirmed.

PLUMMER & DAVIS et al. v. SCHOOL DIST. NO. 1 OF MARIANNA et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 26, 1909.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 86*)—CREDITORS OF BUILDING CONTRACTOR—REMEDIES.

Creditors of a contractor of a school district for labor and materials furnished in the erection of a building are without remedy at law to have the funds in the hands of the directors applied to the payment of their debts against the contractor, and they are without any remedy in equity which will involve the diversion of funds from the channel to which they have been turned by public authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 203-205; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 13*)—CREDITORS OF BUILDING CONTRACTOR—REMEDIES.

Since public policy forbids liens on public buildings for labor and materials, claimants for labor and materials furnished a contractor constructing a building for a school district cannot have liens declared under Kirby's Dig. § 4979, and they can only reach the fund which the district owes the contractor by resorting to the remedies common to creditors for the collection of their debts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

3. CREDITORS' SUIT (§ 36*)—LIEN—PRIORITIES.

The lien obtained on the equitable assets of a debtor by a creditors' suit attaches thereto from the time of service of process, or on the filing of the bill and suing out of process.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Creditors' Suit, Cent. Dig. § 146; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

4. CREDITORS' SUIT (§ 36*)—LIEN—PRIORITIES.

Since claimants for labor and materials furnished to a contractor for a school district building are simple contract creditors and have no lien on the fund which the district owes the contractor, suits by them against the district and contractor to apply the funds to the payment of their debts are governed by the law governing the priority of claims of simple contract creditors, and claimants who first file their suits and obtain service are entitled to a preference over claimants subsequently filing suits and obtaining service.

Appeal from Lee Chancery Court; Edward D. Robertson, Chancellor.

Consolidated suits by Plummer & Davis and others, and by H. W. Paslay and others, appeal. Reversed and remanded.

The appellants, Plummer & Davis, O. C. Sutton, M. Lesser, Twen Cen Granite Company, and Hays & Sturdivant, filed their suits in the Lee chancery court alleging: That the defendants O. A. Alstead and G. B. Thomason were indebted to them in various sums on account of material furnished to the defendants as contractors engaged in the erection of a school building for the defendant Special School District No. 1 of Marianna; that the said school district was indebted to the said Alstead & Thomason in a sum greater than the amounts sued for; that the said defendants Alstead & Thomason were insolvent; that the plaintiffs had no remedy at law by which they could obtain satisfaction of their debt, and praying for judgment against the defendants in various sums set out in their complaints, and further praying that the said school district be required to answer as to what sum of money it was indebted to Alstead & Thomason; that the said sum of money be impounded and garnished, and that a lien be declared and established against the same in favor of the plaintiffs, and that the said school district be required to pay such judgment as might be recovered against the defendants Alstead & Thomason. On the 30th day of April, 1906, the appellants H. W. Paslay, J. T. Johnson, and ——— Brewer also filed their complaint, setting up substantially the same facts, and asking the same remedy against the defendants Alstead & Thomason and the school district. On the 22d day of May, 1906, G. H. Vineyard filed a similar suit for $71.25. On May 27, 1906, L'Anguille Lumber Company filed their suit for $709.40, alleging substantially the same facts, and on the 22d of May, 1907, the Coffeyville Brick Company brought suit for $952.81, alleging substantially the same facts as set forth in other complaints. The school district answered and denied that it was indebted to Alstead & Thomason in any amount, but alleging that the said school district had complied in every way with the contract, that the same provided for liquidated damages of $25 per day for all the days that the said school building remained incomplete after the time mentioned in the contract, and that the said Alstead & Thomason were indebted to the school district in the sum of $669, and that the said school district was not indebted to the said Alstead & Thomason in any sum whatever.

The causes were consolidated and heard upon the pleadings and depositions in the various cases. On the 27th of May, 1907, a decree was rendered finding that the said school district was indebted to the contract-for $94.70; to Twen Cen Granite Company, $197.99; to Hays & Sturdivant, $94.20; to Paslay & Johnson et al., $325; to ——— Brewer, $126; to G. H. Vineyard, $71.25; to L'Anguille Lumber Company, $709.40; and Coffeyville Brick Company, $952.81. On the 20th day of May, 1908, the plaintiffs Plummer & Davis, O. C. Sutton & Co., Twen Cen Granite Company, and Hays & Sturdivant filed their motion and petition in said court asking that they be declared entitled to priority in the distribution of said fund, alleging and showing that their actions were filed prior to the actions of any other of the plaintiffs and were for the purpose of impounding, garnishing, and attaching the funds in the hands of the school district of Marianna. The plaintiffs Paslay & Johnson and Brewer also asked to be made parties to the motion and asked that they have priority in the distribution of the fund. The court found: That the plaintiffs, Plummer & Davis, O. C. Sutton & Co., Twen Cen Granite Company, and Hays & Sturdivant had filed their suit on the 10th day of May, 1906; that the other plaintiffs had filed their suits subsequent to said dates; that all of the debts sued for by all of the plaintiffs amounted to the sum of $3,632.01; and that the pro rata amount, if distributed among all the creditors, would amount to the said .476 per cent. The decree directed that the funds in the hands of the clerk be distributed accordingly among all the creditors. Thereupon Plummer & Davis, O. C. Sutton & Co., Twen Cen Granite Company, Hays & Sturdivant, Paslay & Johnson, and ——— Brewer excepted and appealed.

H. F. Raleson, for appellants. P. D. McCulloch, for appellees.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). In Boone County v. Keck, 31 Ark. 337, this court held that public municipal corporations are not subject to the process of garnishment. The court said: "Public policy, indeed public necessity, requires that the means of public corporations, which are created for public purposes with powers to be exercised for the public good, which can contract alone for the public, and whose only means of payment of the debts contracted is drawn from the corporators by a special levy for that purpose, should not be diverted from the purposes for which it was collected, to satisfy the demands of others than the parties contracted with." This was said in a case where the interests of a county were involved, but the rule and the reason for it are the same in the case of a school district, so that the appellants were remediless at law to have the funds in the hands of the

and for the same reason, if the question were one of diverting the public funds from the channel to which they have been turned by public authority; but as the school building has been completed, and the purpose consummated for which the fund was raised, the public interest cannot be injuriously affected by further withholding the fund from distribution to those who are justly entitled to it. No reason is assigned here on behalf of the school district why the creditors of the contractors should not come into equity to have the funds in the hands of the district subjected to the payment of their debt. But for the public policy which forbids liens to be declared on public buildings, all those who had claims for labor done, materials furnished, etc., on the school building, could have their liens declared on same and be on an "equal footing" under section 4979, Kirby's Dig.; but this doctrine of public policy forbids such procedure. Then, how are they to reach the fund which the district owes the contractor and which the contractor owes them?

In the absence of a statute giving them a lien upon the fund superior to that of the contractor, and making them to share pro rata in its distribution when impounded, their relation to the contractor is simply that of creditor, and they can only resort to the remedies common to creditors for the collection of their debts. Riggin v. Hillard, 56 Ark. 476, 20 S. W. 402, 35 Am. St. Rep. 113. In the absence of legislation or contract affecting the status of the parties otherwise, their relation is simply this: The school district owes the contractors a certain amount which it has in its possession, and the contractors owe the various claimants who brought these suits the respective amounts that the court found due them. Says Judge Cockrill in the above case of Riggin v. Hillard: "Every equitable proceeding wherein a remedy is devised to apply the debt of a third person to the extinguishment of the plaintiff's demand against his debtor is an equitable garnishment." The complaints in this case, as in that, alleged insolvency of the contractors, and that no relief could be had at law, and other facts, which laid the proper foundation for a creditor's suit to subject the funds in the hands of the directors. Therefore, as the plaintiffs in these various suits are nothing more nor less than simple contract creditors, the law governing the question of the priority of their respective claims is well established. "The lien obtained on the equitable assets of a debtor by a creditor's suit attaches thereto from the time of the service of process, or, as stated in some of the cases, on commencement of their respective suits either in law or equity which they could enforce; but the commencement of their suits to subject the fund in controversy created the lien by equitable garnishment of the assets in the hands of the directors, and these garnishments are subject to privities. Watkins v. Field, 6 Ark. 391; Martin v. Foreman, 18 Ark. 249; Adams v. Penzell Gro. Co., 40 Ark. 531. See Jones, McDowell & Co. et al. v. Ark. Mech. & Agl. Co., 38 Ark. 17; Little Rock T. & E. Co. v. Wilson, 66 Ark. 585, 53 S. W. 43; Green v. T. Robertson, 80 Ark. 1, 96 S. W. 138.

Equity follows the law as to priority in garnishment proceedings. It follows that appellants Plummer & Davis, O. C. Sutton, M. Lesser, Twen Cen Granite Co., and Hays & Sturdivant, who filed their suits on the same day and obtained service at the same time, for aught that appears to the contrary, are entitled to preference in the satisfaction of their claims, and that Paslay & Johnson and Brewer, who made their complaint a general creditors' bill, and the subsequent claimants, are entitled to share in the residue pro rata.

The decree is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to enter a decree in accordance with the opinion.

AMES SHOVEL & TOOL CO. v. ANDERSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 19, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

One in constructing a railroad having no right to injure the lands of an upper proprietor by flooding them with surface water which had naturally passed over the right of way, when by reasonable care it might, consistently with the enjoyment of the right of way, leave a free passage for the water, the use of the words "sufficient openings or culverts," in an instruction that it was the duty of defendant in building its road to use ordinary care to provide proper and sufficient openings or culverts for the escape of all water crossing its roadbed by natural drains and depressions so as not to obstruct and cause the water to overflow the lands of upper proprietors, which by exercise of such care could have been foreseen and guarded against, was not prejudicial, as a free passage of water could not be otherwise provided.

crops injured, defendant was negligent, and verdict should be for plaintiff—considered as a whole, shows an intent to charge that, if defendant failed to use ordinary care to provide sufficient openings for escape of the water, and by reason of such failure plaintiff's lands were overflowed and his crop injured, he could recover, so that specific objection, pointing out the failure to do so by proper words, was necessary.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Little River County; Jas. S. Steel, Judge.

Actions by James S. Anderson and John Anderson against the Ames Shovel & Tool Co. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. O. Livesay, J. S. Lake, and Glass, Estes & King, for appellant. J. T. Cowling and J. D. Head, for appellees.

BATTLE, J. Two actions were brought against the Ames Shovel & Tool Company of Texas to recover damages to crops in 1906 and 1907, caused by the unskillful and careless construction of a railroad. One of these actions was brought by James S. Anderson, and the other by the said James S. and John Anderson. They involved practically the same facts and questions of law, and were consolidated and tried as one action. A verdict in the former was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $954, and in the latter in favor of the plaintiffs for $391.50. Defendant appealed.

In the first action the plaintiff alleged: That he was the owner of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 30, township 13 S., range 31 W., and the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 25, township 13, range 32 W., in Little River county, in this state; that he had a farm on the lands, in cultivation, during the year 1906; that some time in May, 1906, the defendant, in the course of its business, and for the purpose of transporting timber to one of its mills, constructed and maintained a railroad running a short distance north of the farm and across a natural depression, which sloped from the plaintiff's farm to the north and east and carried off from the farm water that fell upon the same and upon the surrounding territory; "that there was another slough or lake or depression which extended through the northwestern part of section 25 and across into section 24, which carried off waters that fell in the territory adjacent to same, across which the defendant unlawfully, negligently, and carelessly constructed its railroad; that in constructing same the defendant carelessly and negligently built it in such a manner as to obstruct the passage of water along the said natural drains, by building an embankment out of earth and logs to the height of about one foot, and by negligently and carelessly failing to leave any spaces or openings in the said embankment through which the water, ordinarily and customarily flowing from the farms and lands in that vicinity, could pass. Further, that the appellant carelessly and negligently constructed its road-bed across a slough in section 24, by filling the same with logs, earth, and brush, so that the waters flowing through the said slough could not escape through that channel, and, further, negligently and carelessly obstructed the said slough on the south of the track, by throwing brush and logs therein. Further, that the defendant negligently piled, or caused to be piled, just south of its roadbed, great quantities of logs, brush, and trash which had the effect to stop the flow of water; that during 1906 appellee cultivated all of section 30 except 20 acres, on which cultivated land he had cotton, with the promise of a large yield; that about the last of July the obstructions on the track caused the water to be dammed up and accumulate, over the appellee's farm, and upon the cotton, and damaged it one-half, for which \$1,200 is asked."

"The second cause of action was alleged in that in the year of 1907 another crop of cotton was planted, and was destroyed in the same way, with the result that he lost 40 acres of cotton, of the value of $800.

"In the second action there was the same plaintiff as in the first, with the addition of John Anderson. The same allegations of negligence were made; about the only difference being in the land that was injured.

"In the second action it was claimed that in 1906 20 acres of cotton were cultivated jointly by the plaintiffs in the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 30, which was destroyed during the month of July, 1906."

The defendant specifically denied all the material allegations in the complaint.

The testimony in this case is voluminous. It would require too much time and space to set it out, substantially, in this opinion, and it would serve no useful purpose to do so. It is sufficient to say that, the instructions of the court being correct, there was enough to sustain the verdict of the jury.

The court, over the objections of the defendant, gave the following instruction to the jury:

"The court instructs the jury it was the duty of the defendant company in building its road to use ordinary care to provide proper and sufficient openings or culverts for the escape of all water crossing its road-bed by means of natural drains and depressions in the earth so as not to obstruct and cause the water to overflow the lands of upper proprietors, whether at times of ordinary stages of such drains or depressions, or from excessive rains which, by the exercise of such care, could have been foreseen

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Ann. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes the plaintiff were overflowed, and his crops injured as alleged in the complaint, then you are instructed that defendant was guilty of negligence, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

In Little Rock & Ft. Smith Railway Co. v. Chapman, 39 Ark. 463, 43 Am. Rep. 280, this court held: "A railroad company has no right, in the use of its right of way, to injure the lands of upper proprietors by flooding them with surface water which had been used to pass over the right of way, when, by reasonable care and expense, it might, consistently with the enjoyment of the right of way, leave a free passage for the water."

Baker v. Allen, 66 Ark. 271, 50 S. W. 511, 74 Am. St. Rep. 93, was "an action to recover damages for the obstruction of the natural flow of surface water, caused by the construction of a levee across a swale or depression which extended across the lands of both plaintiff and defendant, and along which the surface water passed in times of rain and melting snow." In that case this court held: "It is only where a landowner obstructs the natural flow of surface water unnecessarily, when by reasonable care and expense he might have avoided such injury, that he becomes liable to an upper proprietor for the damages thus occasioned."

This rule is applicable to this case. Appellant objects to the instruction given over its objection, because of the use of the words "sufficient openings or culverts," and because the court unqualifiedly instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff if they found that the defendant failed to provide sufficient openings for the escape of all water, without regard to the use of ordinary care.

As to the first objection, we cannot see how the use of the words objected to could be prejudicial, for how could a free passage of water be otherwise provided?

The second objection is based on an incorrect construction of the instruction. It should be considered as a whole. It is only in this way the intention of the court can be ascertained. When read in this way, it is evident that the court intended to tell the jury that, if they found from the evidence that the defendant failed to use ordinary care to provide such openings, and that by reason of such failure the lands of the plaintiff were overflowed and his crops injured, their verdict should be for the plaintiff. The court certainly did not intend to contradict itself. It is true that the instruction is defective, but it is obvious that the court was endeavoring to follow the ruling of the court

A general objection was insufficient. Judgments in both actions affirmed.

BARRINGER et al. v. BRATCHER.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 26, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 907*)—PRESUMPTIONS.

The record in a chancery case showing it was heard on oral evidence, and this not being brought into the record, and there being nothing on the face of the record showing error, the decree will be presumed to be correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3873; Dec. Dig. § 907.*]

Appeal from Polk Chancery Court; Jas. D. Shaver, Chancellor.

Suit by J. H. Bratcher against T. O. Barringer and others. Decree for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This suit was begun in the circuit court; the appellee alleging in his complaint that he was the owner of the lot in controversy by virtue of a deed from the commissioner of state lands, executed June 22, 1907, and that the lands were forfeited for the nonpayment of the taxes for the year 1904. He alleges that appellants were in the unlawful possession of the lot, prays that he may have possession, etc., and exhibits his deed with the complaint.

The appellants answered, denying appellee's title, alleging that the lands were wrongfully and through the fraudulent connivance of appellee returned as delinquent, setting up title through a deed from one W. H. Tobin, and possession thereunder. The answer was made a cross-complaint, and alleged for matters of cross-complaint the following: "That on the ——— day of May, 1905, and within the time in which said taxes upon said property could be paid for the year of 1904, the defendant Edna E. Barringer went to the office of the collector for Polk county, Ark., and there in said office exhibited to said collector a description of said property and tendered and offered to pay the taxes thereon, but that she was informed that said taxes had been paid. * * * (4) That in the year of 1906, the defendants were residing at Heavener, Ind. T., and that prior to the 1st day of June, of said year, the defendant T. O. Barringer mailed from said point to the collector of taxes at Mena, Polk county, Ark., an express money order for the sum of $4.50 to pay the taxes for 1905 on said lot. That said letter was not returned to him, nor was any credit given him for said amount by said collector. (5) That on the 6th day of June, 1907, he paid to the collector the sum of $4.12, on which a penalty of 30 cents was charged and collected of him, as will appear by the receipt hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit B,' and by the payment of said taxes and penalty defendants believed that said lot was clear and that nothing further as taxes were required. (6) Defendants are informed and believe that the plaintiff was acting with and for the collector of taxes for Polk county, Ark., at the time the defendant Edna E. Barringer offered to pay the taxes for the year of 1904 as above set forth, and charges the truth to be that he either himself fraudulently concealed the truth, or was instrumental in having a misrepresentation of the condition of said lot as to the payment of the taxes thereon made to her. (7) That at the date said lands were bid in for the state, and prior thereto, the said plaintiff was a deputy collector for said county, and well knew of the efforts that said defendants had made to pay said taxes for the year of 1904, and two years next thereafter. (8) Defendants aver that said lands were advertised in the name of W. H. Tobin, and without a proper or sufficient description thereof, as will appear by a copy of said advertisement hereto attached marked as 'Exhibit C.' The defendants bring into court and offer to pay all taxes, penalty, and costs due or taxed against said lot, together with the lawful interest thereon. Wherefore defendants pray that for the reasons herein set forth they be allowed to redeem said lot, that the deed to the plaintiff from the land commissioner be canceled as a cloud upon their title, and for other and further relief."

Appellants made their deed from Tobin an exhibit to their cross-complaint. They also exhibited a tax receipt for the year 1902 showing that T. O. Barringer had paid the taxes on the lot in controversy for that year. The appellee answered the cross-complaint as follows: "That he does not know whether it is true, as alleged by defendant T. O. Barringer, that he sent $4.50 to the collector of Polk county to pay the taxes for the year of 1905 on the lot in question, neither does he know whether said lot was returned to the said Barringer; but this plaintiff says that, since allegations were made by the defendant, he has inspected the matter to some extent, and is informed that the $4.50 actually covered the personal taxes of the defendant, and, if sent by them as alleged, was applied to the payment of same. (2) This plaintiff denies that he was acting with and for the collector of Polk county in either 1904, 1905, or at any other time, and denies that he was deputy collector, or that he had anything to do whatever with the collection of taxes for the years of 1904 or 1905, and denies the fact that he concealed the fact that said lot has been sold for taxes, from the defendant, or that any person in the capacity of tax collector concealed the same from said defendants, but alleges that the sale was open, notorious, and matter of record. (3) Plaintiff denies, as alleged by defendants, that the advertisement for the sale of said lot as delinquent at said tax sale was insufficient in the description of said lot, or that the sale or any of the proceedings relating thereto were in any manner improperly conducted. Wherefore he prays that his reply hereto be accepted and for judgment."

The cause on motion of appellants was by consent transferred to the chancery court. The decree recites, among other things, the following: "That the cause was set for trial on this the 29th day of November, 1907, to be heard upon oral evidence, and, both parties appearing and announcing ready for trial, the said defendants filed their substituted answer and cross-bill, to which the plaintiff filed his reply, and, the issues being made up, the court proceeded to try and determine said cause, and it appearing to the court from the evidence introduced on the part of the plaintiff that he claims to be the owner of the above-described lands because of a deed held by him from the state land commissioner dated June 22, 1907, and that the said lot was forfeited as shown by said deed to the state of Arkansas for the nonpayment of taxes for the year 1904, and it appearing to the court that the said deed is in all respects regular, and that the expiration of the right of redemption had expired at the time the said state land commissioner executed said deed to the plaintiff June 22, 1907, it further appearing to the court that the defendants, Edna E. Barringer and T. O. Barringer, claim said land under a deed executed to them, on March 14, 1903, for which said land or lot was forfeited to the state for the nonpayment of taxes, and it further appearing that, since the date of the deed from Tobin to the defendants, they paid the taxes in the year of 1907, for the year of 1906, and it further appearing from the oral evidence introduced in this cause and from the records presented in evidence that the said forfeiture of said lot to the state for the nonpayment of taxes in 1905, for the year 1904, was in all things regular so far as the court has been able to determine from the pleadings and the evidence introduced herein, and it therefore appears that the plaintiff has a paramount and superior title to that of the defendants and is entitled to recover said lot against defendants: It is therefore the judgment and decree of this court that the plaintiff have and recover possession of the E. 1/2 of lot 2 in block 5, Eureka addition to the city of Mena, Polk county, Ark., from the defendants Edna E. and T. O. Barringer, and all the costs of this suit."

The defendants except to the judgment and decree of the court herein and pray an appeal to the Supreme Court of this state, which is granted, and 60 days is given the defendants in which to prepare and file their bill of exceptions.

Pale McPhetriges, for appellants.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). The recitals of the decree show that the cause was heard upon oral evidence, and that "60 days were given the defendants in which to prepare and file their bill of exceptions."

We find no bill of exceptions in the record, and nothing in the record proper to show that the decree of the court was erroneous. Where the record shows that the cause in chancery was heard upon oral evidence, and such evidence is not brought into the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise, and there is nothing on the face of the record itself to show that the court erred, it will be presumed that the decree is correct. Murphy v. Citizens' Bank of Junction City, 84 Ark. 100, 104 S. W. 187, 934.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 787*)—DISMISSAL—DELAY IN PROSECUTION.

Kirby's Dig. § 1193, provides that unless the appeal is granted by the inferior court, or the appellee enters his appearance in the Supreme Court, he shall be summoned to answer the appeal. Held, that the notice or summons calls the appellee's attention to the fact of removal, and the appeal is complete, and the Supreme Court can dismiss it if appellant neglects to cause the notice to answer it to be given in a reasonable time or fails to prosecute it in any other way.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 787*)—DISMISSAL—DELAY IN PROSECUTION.

A decree was rendered August 27, 1907, and an appeal was granted August 12, 1908. Summons was issued on that day, but was never served on appellees, one of whom had removed from the county; the other being a resident of another county. Nothing further was done until after motion of appellees to dismiss the appeal March 23, 1909, when appellant had process served on them. Held, that appellant did not exercise due diligence, and the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lawrence County; W. E. Beloate, Judge.

Action between John L. Birmingham and William Rice and others. From the decree, Birmingham appeals. On motion to dismiss. Granted.

C. T. Burns, for appellant. McCaleb & Reeder and H. L. Ponder, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. The decree appealed from was rendered by the chancery court of Lawrence county on August 27, 1907, and the appeal was granted by the clerk of this court on August 12, 1908. Summons was issued on that day to the sheriff of Lawrence county and sent to one of the attorneys for appellant, who delivered it to the sheriff with instructions to serve same, and also paid the sheriff his fee for the service. At that time one of the appellees had removed from the county, and the other one was a resident of Independence county. The summons is not accounted for further than by a sworn statement, made here by the deputy sheriff into whose hands it was placed, which says that the writ was lost and was not served on the appellees. Nothing further was done towards bringing appellees into court until after their motion was filed here on March 23, 1909, to dismiss the appeal. They entered their appearance for the sole purpose of moving to dismiss the appeal. Since then appellant has sued out process and had it served on them during the pendency of this motion.

The statutes of this state provide that: "Unless the appeal is granted by the inferior court, or the appellee enters his appearance in the Supreme Court, he shall be summoned, actually or constructively as provided by law for the service of a summons, to appear and answer the appeal or writ of error." Kirby's Dig. § 1193. In Robinson v. Ark. Loan & Trust Co., 72 Ark. 475, 81 S. W. 609, the court, speaking on this subject, said: "The notice or summons does not aid in the removal, but calls the attention of the appellee to the fact that it has been removed. The appeal is complete, and the appellate court can dismiss it if the appellant neglects to cause the notice to answer it to be given in a reasonable time, or fails to prosecute it in any other way."

It will be seen from this that the only question presented to us on this motion is whether or not appellant has, within a reasonable time after the granting of the appeal, caused summons to be issued and served on appellees; in other words, whether he has proceeded with due diligence to bring his adversaries into court, for, unless he has done so, his appeal should be dismissed. In the present case neither the appellant nor his attorneys have done anything at all in that direction, except to cause a summons to be issued on August 12, 1908, which was just two weeks before the expiration of the time allowed for taking the appeal. They placed this summons in the hands of the sheriff in whose county appellees had ceased to reside and where they could not be found. They took no further steps to ascertain whether service was had upon appellees or not. It can scarcely be urged with any show of plausibility that this was the exercise of due diligence, or that the appellees have been summoned within a reasonable time. More than seven months elapsed from the filing of the transcript in this court before the appellees were brought in by service of process, and this was done after they had moved to dismiss the appeal, and within a week before the case was set for hearing in this court.

We are of the opinion that no diligence on

O. A. Miller and C. G. Bond, for appellants. J. A. Foster, Isaac Orme, and Ben Childers, for appellee.

McALISTER, J. Complainant filed this bill, alleging his ownership in fee of a tract of land in Hardeman county comprising 300 acres, and that the defendants Wm. H. Coleman and J. M. and F. L. Marshall had entered upon said land and were committing waste by cutting and removing timber. Defendants answered the bill, averring that on March 7, 1904, and prior to complainant's purchase of said land, its then owner, J. S. Neely, sold and conveyed to one W. E. Small all of the white oak timber on said land, and that on July 12, 1906, the said W. E. Small, for value received, assigned all of his rights and title to said timber contract to the William H. Coleman Company without recourse.

It is averred in the answer that under the original contract the said W. E. Small was allowed three years from the date of said contract to cut and remove said timber, and that thereafter J. S. Neely, the vendor, extended the time for the removal of said timber for a period of two years from July 12, 1906. Hence it is seen that the defense interposed on behalf of defendants is that the William H. Coleman Company had acquired title to the white oak timber on said tract of land by assignment of a contract made with J. L. Neely, the vendor of complainant, some time prior to the sale of said land by the said Neely to complainant, Childers.

On the coming in of the answers, complainant filed an amended bill, alleging:

"That on the 3d of October, 1907, J. S. Neely and wife, E. A. Neely, were in the actual possession of the lands described in the original bill, and represented to him that said land was unincumbered; that he paid to them $800 the cash consideration, and executed his two promissory notes, due in one and two years, for $800 each, and delivered the same to J. S. Neely and wife, and prior to that time complainant had no notice, actual or constructive, of any alleged claim of defendants; that, when he purchased said land, defendants were not in possession, and so far as complainant knew, were not claiming any right to enter upon said land; and he states on information and belief that defendants had never been in actual possession of said land or the timber, had never cut or removed, and had never attempted to cut or remove, any white oak or other timber from said land up to and for some time after complainants had purchased said land."

Complainant further states as follows:

"He was put in possession of the land by said J. S. Neely on the 3d of October, 1907, and knew nothing of the claim of defendants until after he filed his original bill; that he is an innocent purchaser for value, and had no notice of the sale or transfer of the white oak timber then standing on said land, and that he paid a valuable consideration for the same; that defendants had entered upon said lands, without the knowledge of complainant or his consent, cut and removed and wasted valuable timber, and otherwise damaged complainant to the extent of $300."

It is further charged in the amended bill:

"That the instruments purporting to be deeds of conveyance under which defendants claim a superior title were neither actual nor constructive notice to complainants, for the reason that said assignment did not describe the land, and the instrument purporting to extend the time limit, contained in the original contract for the removal of the timber, was obtained through fraud, and was not properly acknowledged, and the certificate of the notary was not in compliance with the statute."

It was therefore charged that said instruments were not entitled to registration and that no notice was thereby conveyed to complainant.

The prayer of the amended bill is that complainant be declared an innocent purchaser for value without notice, and that he be decreed the title and possession of said land, etc.

Proof was taken, and on the hearing the chancellor, Hon. E. L. Bullock, presiding, decreed that the title of complainant to the land and timber was superior to any claim of the defendants, and that the conveyances under which defendants claimed title constituted a cloud on complainant's title. The chancellor made perpetual the injunction restraining the defendants from cutting and removing timber or otherwise committing waste, and pronounced a decree in favor of complainant for the value of timber already cut, and the damages accruing by reason of said waste, and ordered a reference to the master to take proof and report the amount of said damages. At the March term, 1909, the chancellor rendered a judgment in favor of complainant against the defendants for the sum of $150 for the trees cut and removed by the defendants, and the further sum of $9 as damages caused to the small timber by reason of the trees cut falling against and injuring same. The W. H. Coleman Company appealed from all of said decrees and has assigned errors.

The first assignment is as follows:

"The chancellor erred in decreeing that the title of complainant, E. J. Childers, is superior to the claim of defendants in and to the land and timber described in the pleadings, and that the claim of the defendants to the white oak timber on said lands is not valid, but constitutes a cloud on complainant's title, because the proof in the record shows that the contract under which the Wm. H. Coleman Company claimed ownership and title to the white oak timber was prior in time, and therefore superior in right, to any claim or title that complainant, E. J. Childers, had to said white oak timber. J. S. Neely, from whom both complainant, E. J. Childers, and the defendant Wm. Coleman Company claim title, conveyed and transferred all of the white oak timber on the 300 acres of land described in the pleadings to W. E. Small, by contract dated March 7, 1904; that on July 12, 1906, he extended the time for the cutting of the white oak timber on the lands sold to Small, and later sold to W. H. Coleman Company, to two years from date."

The second assignment of error will be considered in this connection, and is as follows:

"Second. The chancellor erred in making the injunction perpetual. The weight of the proof is that the appellee had notice of the timber contract of J. S. Neely with appellant at the time that he bought the land. The rule 'caveat emptor' applies to him."

The facts established by the record are that in October, 1907, complainant, Childers, who resided at Pulaski in Giles county, purchased this land, lying in Hardeman county, through a resident agent, one Camody. At the time of the sale Mr. Isaac Orme represented the vendor, J. S. Neely and wife. An abstract of title to the land was prepared at the instance of the vendor and sent to Mr. Childers at Pulaski; and, the title having been pronounced perfect by the abstractor, Mr. Childers accepted the deed and made a cash payment of $800, executing his notes for the two deferred payments of $800 each. The deed was executed on the 3d of October, 1907, and Mr. Childers was immediately put in possession of the land. The complainant had no actual or constructive knowledge, at the time he purchased the land, that the defendant W. H. Coleman Company claimed any right, title, or interest in the white oak timber on said land. It also appears that, at the time Childers was put in possession, no agent or employé of the defendant W. H. Coleman Company was in possession of said land nor did the complainant become apprised of any trespass on said land until after the lapse of about two weeks, when some of the defendant's agents went upon said land and began to cut and remove timber; the number of trees cut not exceeding 18. Thereupon complainant filed the present bill, asserting his title in fee to the land, and seeking to restrain the defendants against trespassing and committing waste.

As already stated, the defendant Coleman relied on a contract assigned to that company by W. E. Small July 12, 1906. The contract is as follows:

"For and in consideration of $400 to me in hand paid, I (or we) hereby sell and convey to W. E. Small, or assigns, all of the white oak timber on my land situated in Hardeman county, state of Tennessee, district No. 11, bounded as follows: On the east by Trim, on the north by Mills, on the west by Rogers and Mills, and on the south by Campbell—containing about 300 acres. Said land known as the ——— place, and lies ——— miles of ———. Said Small shall have three years from this date to work same, and shall have right of way to land and timber, with men and teams, to cut and remove same at his pleasure. There is no incumbrance or claim on said land that will interfere with said Small working said timber.

"Signed at Pocahtontas, Tenn., this 7th of March, 1904. [Signed] J. S. Neely.

"Witnesses:

"B. D. Irby.

"G. L. Paris."

It will be noticed this instrument was not acknowledged, and expired by limitation on March 7, 1907, seven months before the conveyance to Childers. On the back of this instrument, is the following indorsement:

"July 12, 1906.

"For value received, I assign all of my rights and title to the within timber contract to Wm. Coleman Co., without recourse.

"W. E. Small."

It appears that on July 12, 1906, the day on which this assignment was executed, J. M. Marshall, as agent for Wm. Coleman Company, went to Dr. Neely to procure an extension of the time limit of three years contained in the original contract. Dr. Neely testified that Marshall stated to him:

"That he would like to get an extension of the time for cutting the timber, provided he could buy the contract from Small. I told him, if he could arrange to get Small's contract, that I would give him one year's time from that date, and he wrote out an agreement, as I supposed, in keeping with our conversation to that effect, and, being busy at the time, I did not take time to read it, but signed it, and he went away."

It appears that one year's extension of the time limit of three years, contained in the original contract, would have extended the time for cutting the timber until July 12, 1907, or three months before the date of the deed to Childers, which was executed by Dr. Neely, as already stated, October 3, 1907.

It appears, however, that on April 23, 1907, Marshall, accompanied by M. Wilson, a notary public, returned to Dr. Neely with the contract, which had already been signed by Dr.

Neely, for an extension of the time, for the purpose of having the instrument acknowledged. The instrument produced, instead of extending the time for one year, extended it to two years from date, and was as follows:

"Pocahtontas, 7—12—1906.

"This is to certify that I have extended the time for cutting the white oak timber on my lands, sold to W. E. Small, and later transferred to W. H. Coleman Company, to two years from date. J. S. Neely."

Dr. Neely declined to execute this instrument, although he had previously signed it, for the reason that it contained an extension of the time limit to two years, instead of one year, as he had agreed, and which he supposed had been properly inserted in the contract. Several witnesses, who were present, testify that Dr. Neely refused to acknowledge this instrument on the ground that it did not embody his agreement with Mr. Marshall. This fact is admitted by Mr. Marshall himself, as well as by Mr. Wilson, the notary public, who was present.

But, despite the fact that Dr. Neely had repudiated the instrument and refused to acknowledge it, Marshall procured the notary public to attach his notarial certificate, certifying to the acknowledgment. The form of the certificate, however, was in the following language:

"State of Tennessee, Hardeman County:

"Personally appeared before me, M. Wilson, a notary public in and for said county and state, the within named J. S. Neely, the bargainer, with whom I am personally acquainted, and who acknowledged that he executed the within instrument.

"Witness my hand and official seal at Middleton, Tenn., this 23d day of April, 1907.

"M. Wilson, Notary Public."

It will be observed that the words "for the purposes therein contained," required by the statutory form of certificate, are omitted, and this fact is explained by the notary, who testifies that he marked out these words for the reason that Dr. Neely had never acknowledged the instrument for the purposes therein contained.

It will be further noticed that this instrument of extension contains no description of the land, and the proof is that at the time it was signed by Dr. Neely it was on a separate slip of paper, and not attached to the original contract for the sale of the white oak timber by Dr. Neely to W. E. Small. It is also in proof that, at the time this alleged extension was acknowledged, the original conveyance to Small of the white oak timber had not been assigned by Small to Wm. Coleman Company and none of these papers had been offered for registration. It appears, however, that afterwards these separate papers were pasted together, and, together with the notarial certificate of acknowledgment, were recorded in the register's office of Hardeman county.

Counsel for appellee, in answer to the two assignments of error already stated, says:

"(1) The alleged extension of two years was never in fact executed by Dr. Neely, and there was no consideration for it.

"(2) Both the assignments of Small to Coleman Company and the alleged extension of time are void under the statute of frauds.

"(3) All three of the instruments relied on by the defendants are lacking in any proper words of conveyance, and are insufficient and void as conveyances.

"(4) All of said instruments are insufficient under the laws relating to the acknowledgment of instruments of conveyances; none of them having a sufficient certificate of acknowledgment.

"(5) Said instruments were not entitled to registration and could not constitute constructive notice to Childers.

"(6) E. J. Childers was an innocent purchaser for value and without notice, either constructive or actual, of any of the instruments relied on by the defendants."

It has already been seen that the conveyance of the white oak timber from J. S. Neely to W. E. Small, dated March 7, 1904, and under which the William Coleman Company claims by assignment, provides on its face a three-year limit for the removal of the timber, and this time limit expired March 7, 1907, six months prior to the conveyance of the land by J. S. Neely to complainant, Childers, on October 3, 1907; but the defendant Coleman Company relies on an extension of two years to the original time limit, granted by J. S. Neely July 12, 1906, which contention, if established, would carry the time limit for the removal of the timber beyond the time of the purchase of the land by complainant, Childers. As a matter of fact, we are satisfied from an examination of the record that no such extension was granted by J. S. Neely. While there is some evidence to the contrary, the great preponderance of the evidence overthrows this contention. We think there is no doubt of the right of Childers to make this question in the present controversy, since it vitally affects his title to the property. In Iron Co. v. Iron Co., 58 Tenn. 434, this question was reserved upon the ground that the purchaser of the property had notice, but in the present case, as we shall see, the purchaser had no notice, of the prior incumbrance, actual or constructive. The assignment from W. E. Small to Wm. Coleman Company was not acknowledged at all, and was not, therefore, entitled to registration. It has already been observed that in the notarial certificate to the alleged "extension of time" conveyance the phrase "for the purposes therein contained" is entirely omitted. This was purposely done, as we have seen from the evidence of the notary already quoted.

It has frequently been held by this court that the omission of this language from the certificate of the notary is fatal to the registration of the instrument. Currie v. Kerr, 79 Tenn. 138; Hughes v. Powers, 99 Tenn. 485, 42 S. W. 1; McGuire v. Gallagher, 95 Tenn. 355, 32 S. W. 209; Ellett v. Richardson & Co., 68 Tenn. 295.

These instruments, providing for the assignment of a contract for the sale of growing trees and an extension of the time limit for the removal thereof, transferred an interest in land, and under our statutes were required to be registered.

In Ives v. Atlantic, etc., R. R. Co., 142 N. C. 131, 55 S. E. 74, 115 Am. St. Rep. 732, it is said:

"It may now be taken as settled that growing trees are a part of the realty and a contract to sell or convey them, or any interest in or concerning them, must be reduced to writing. They are 'fructus naturales,' and, being rooted in the soil, are by nature as much annexed to the freehold as any permanent fixture can be"—citing authorities.

This case is reported in 9 Am. and Eng. Ann. Cases, followed by an elaborate note of the editor, in which all the cases are collected, and the result was stated to be that the rule laid down in the reported case, to the effect that growing trees are a part of the realty, and that consequently a contract for the sale of standing timber is within the meaning and intent of the statute of frauds, and must be evidenced by a writing, has the support of the decided weight of authority. This question was considered by Judge Cooper in the case of Knox v. Haralson, 2 Tenn. Ch. 232, wherein it was held that a sale of so many cords of wood now standing in the tree is within the statute of frauds and must be in writing.

An exception to the general rule is found in the case of Iron Co. v. Iron Co., 58 Tenn. 441, where it appeared the contract was for a sale of timber at 10 cents per cord, to be paid for as fast as used. The court held that this was a sale of personalty, for the reason:

"The property did not pass in the timber until it should be used or received by the purchaser—at any rate, not until cut and corded up, as it was to be paid for by the cord, as used."

In the case of Dorris v. King (Tenn. Ch. App.) 54 S. W. 683, there was a contract for the delivery of timber by the vendor at the mill, already cut, and, following the case of Iron Co. v. Iron Co., supra, the Court of Chancery Appeals properly held the contract was not within the statute of frauds. In the note to Ives v. Atlantic, etc., R. R. Co., 9 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 188, the editor, in speaking of this exception to the general rule, says:

"In several jurisdictions, which recognize the general rule, it has been held that there may be a valid parol contract for the sale of timber as a chattel, where it is to be cut

And citing, among other cases, Dorris v. King, supra, and Iron Co. v. Iron Co., supra, the editor further states:

"That such a contract is not a contract for the sale of trees in their standing condition, but rather a contract whereby the vendor agrees to bestow work and labor upon his own material, and deliver it in its changed condition to the plaintiff."

In Tiffany on Real Property, § 228, it is said:

"A sale of growing trees, or of other growths of a semipermanent character, such as grass or fruit growing on trees, is, by the weight of authority, prima facie a sale of an interest in land, and consequently it must be in writing under the fourth section of the statute of frauds; and so it has been held that a mortgage or sale of standing timber must comply with the same requirements as if it were of the land itself. If, however, the title is not to pass until the products have been severed from the soil, as when one contracts to sell lumber to be cut, the contract is for the sale of goods."

In Beach on Contracts, § 540, the rule is thus stated:

"Contracts for the sale of grass and growing trees have been held to concern an interest in land. The word 'land,' in its legal signification, embraces more than the word literally imports. It is a comprehensive term, and includes standing trees, buildings, fences, stones, and waters, as well as the earth, and all pass under the general description of land in a deed. Standing trees pass to the heir as a part of the inheritance, and not to the executor as emblements or chattels. For this reason it has been usually held that a sale of growing trees, with a right at any future time, whether fixed or indefinite to enter upon the land and remove them, conveys an interest in the land; but, when severed from the freehold, it is settled learning that they become chattels."

It may be observed that, if the conveyance extending the time be considered as a lease, it would be within the statute of frauds, and good for only one year. So, if it be viewed as creating an irrevocable license to enter, this is in the nature of an easement, and must be in writing. Nunelly v. Iron Co., 94 Tenn. 397, 29 S. W. 381, 28 L. R. A. 421.

It follows, therefore, that, since these conveyances transferred an interest in realty, they were required to be registered; but since there was no acknowledgment at all complaint, Childers, had no actual notice of the original contract between Neely and Small, or of its assignment to the William Coleman Company, or of the alleged extension of the time limit. We are satisfied that Childers was an innocent purchaser for value of this property, without notice, actual or constructive, of any prior incumbrances or equities, and that he is entitled to a decree for this land, and for damages for the unlawful cutting of his timber. The decree of the chancellor will be in all respects affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wilson County; Jno. H. Richardson, Judge.

Cecil Palmer was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Turney & Turney and Frank McMillan, for appellant. Chas. T. Cates, Jr., Atty. Gen., for the State.

NEIL, J. The plaintiff in error was indicted and convicted in the circuit court of Wilson county for the crime of rape, committed upon the person of Mrs. Sophronia J. Yates, and was sentenced to be hanged. He thereupon appealed to this court and assigned errors. We have fully considered the evidence, and all of the errors assigned, in a memorandum opinion filed with record, and we do not deem it necessary, in the present opinion, to refer more particularly to the facts, and to certain of the errors assigned, than in the manner just mentioned. In this opinion, prepared for publication, we shall advert to only two or three matters of law which arose upon the hearing.

It is insisted that the trial judge erred in passing to the counsel for the prisoner the following veniremen as competent jurors, thereby rendering it necessary for the prisoner to challenge them peremptorily, viz.: J. V. Nettles, J. S. Hamilton, Albert Hawkins, J. S. Steed, R. W. Lannon, P. B. Smith, J. B. Young, Lea Ballinger, Jim Heran, R. B. Malone, Cates Bingham, E. P. Mitchell, Sam Lannis, and H. H. Smith. The latter was the twelfth juror, who was tendered to the prisoner's counsel after they had exhausted all of his peremptory challenges.

Most of the veniremen referred to stand upon the same ground, and can be disposed of together; but there are peculiarities about one or two of them, and they will be mentioned specially.

J. V. Nettles stated on his voir dire that he matter; that, if he had read the Banner news items and editorials, he would have formed an opinion which would require evidence to remove. The bill of exceptions continues: "The defendant offered to show the news items and editorials of the Banner, marked Exhibits D, E, and F to the defendant's affidavits for a continuance, to the venireman, asking the question if he had read them. The court refused to allow the venireman to read the articles, upon the ground that, if they were not disqualifying, they were not material, and, if disqualifying, it would not be proper now to disqualify a juror."

It is insisted that the trial judge erred in not permitting the counsel for the prisoner to exhibit to the proposed person the articles referred to and have him read them. We do not think there was any error in this action of the court. It is clear, from the examination of the venireman, that he had no opinion whatever as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. It would have been an idle thing to have him read a newspaper article in order to see if he would form an opinion. It is said the court held in Ward v. State, 102 Tenn. 730, 52 S. W. 996, that it was error in the trial court not to permit such a thing to be done. The facts in that case were far different from those in the present case. In Ward's Case it appeared that the prisoner was on trial for one of a series of forgeries of the same character; that there had been a former trial of one of these cases, in which the particular transaction which was the subject of the case then on trial had been testified to by the leading witness for the prosecution; that his evidence had been reported in a newspaper, and that this newspaper had been read by the venireman; and that from the facts so stated by the witness he had formed an opinion. The court held, under these facts, that the prisoner's counsel should have been permitted to exhibit the newspaper to the venireman and examine him thereon; that is, it was held that the counsel for the prisoner had the right to examine the venireman touching the very newspaper report which the venireman said he had read, and from which he said he had formed an opinion, and which evidence related to the particular transaction which was the subject of the case for which the venireman was being examined as a prospective juror. In the present case, as already stated, the venireman testified that he had formed no opinion and did not remember that he had ever read the article in the paper.

J. S. Steed and several others of the per-veniremen mentioned testified that they had formed an opinion, but that it was based merely on rumor; that it would require evidence to remove such an opinion, but that they could go into the jury box, and do fair and impartial justice between the state and the prisoner, and decide the case upon the law and the evidence. This was the case, also, of H. H. Smith, who went upon the jury as the twelfth juror after the prisoner had exhausted all of his challenges.

The case of R. B. Malone is thus stated in the bill of exceptions:

"R. B. Malone otherwise qualified, but said he had formed an opinion; that it was based on mere rumor; that he could go into the jury box, and do fair and impartial justice between the state and the defendant, and would decide the case upon the law and the evidence; that his opinion was a fixed one, which would require evidence to remove; that he had talked generally about the matter, but did not know whether he had talked with witnesses or not, but had accepted or received it as mere rumor; that he read the Lebanon Democrat."

The determination of the question arising as to the two veniremen last mentioned requires a reference to our cases.

We have quite a number of cases upon the subject of the competency of jurors.

The following may be mentioned as cases wherein it clearly appeared that the veniremen had been disqualified by the formation of an opinion: Rice v. State, 1 Yerg. 432; Troxdale v. State, 9 Humph. 422; Riddle v. State, 3 Heisk. 401; State v. Collie, 3 Shan. Tenn. Cas. 803, 807; Carter v. State, 9 Lea, 440; Cartwright v. State, 12 Lea, 620; Hoard & Fite v. State, 15 Lea, 318; Ward v. State, 102 Tenn. 724, 52 S. W. 996; Turner v. State, 111 Tenn. 593, 69 S. W. 774.

The following cases stand upon somewhat peculiar grounds: Henry v. State, 4 Humph. 270; Moses v. State, 10 Humph. 456; Norfleet v. State, 4 Sneed, 341, 343, 344.

There are several cases concerning the effect of an opinion formed on rumor. These are Howerton v. State, Meigs, 262; Payne v. State, 3 Humph. 375; Moses v. State, 11 Humph. 232; Brakesfield v. State, 1 Sneed, 215, 218, 219; McLean v. State, 1 Shan. Tenn. Cas. 478, 483, 484; Johnson v. State, 11 Lea, 47; Spence v. State, 15 Lea, 539, 543-547; Woods v. State, 99 Tenn. 182, 41 S. W. 811; Leach v. State, 99 Tenn. 584, 597, 42 S. W. 195; State v. Robinson, 106 Tenn. 204, 206, 61 S. W. 65. There is also the case of Watkins v. State, 1 Leg. Rep. 10, 2 Shan. Tenn. Cas. 206, which is out of line with the other cases upon the same subject.

We have also several cases which discuss the question of the competency of jurors in respect of matters of opinion generally. These are McGowan v. State, 9 Yerg. 184; Alfred & Anthony v. State, 2 Swan, 581; Eason v. State, 6 Baxt. 466; Conatser v. State, 12 Lea, 436; Spence v. State, supra; Woods v. State, supra; Wilson v. State, 109 Tenn. 167, 169, 170, 70 S. W. 57.

There is some conflict in the early cases. The dividing line between the early and later cases may be placed with Conatser v. State, supra, opinion by Mr. Justice Cooper, in which that great judge discusses the prior cases, and with infinite tact and delicacy indicates the transition from the earlier to the later view. The beginning of the modern doctrine may be placed with the case of Spence v. State, supra, in an opinion by the same eminent judge. That case contains a redaction of the Conatser Case. We shall not discuss or endeavor to reconcile the conflict between the present and the early doctrine, but shall begin our statement of the present doctrine with the Spence Case.

In this latter case the court said:

"The first error relied on for reversal is in the action of the court in pronouncing W. J. Taylor a competent juror. After the defendant had exhausted all his challenges, Taylor was presented as a juror. He stated on his voir dire that he had an opinion, formed from reading the newspapers and from talk in the neighborhood; that it would require evidence to remove this opinion; he had heard Spence had killed Wheat about a settlement, and that was all he had heard or read; did not know either of them; that, if taken on the jury, he would try the case on the evidence as sworn to by the witnesses, and would not try the case on what he had read or heard, and could do fair and impartial justice between the state and the defendant; that he did not remember having read the testimony given before the coroner's jury.

"In Conatser v. State, 12 Lea, 436, we had occasion to review the decisions of this court upon the competency of jurors in criminal cases, and to ascertain the general principles which might be considered as settled thereby. We found that the question whether the nature and strength of a juror's opinion are such as in law necessarily raise the presumption of partiality, is one of mixed law and fact, to be tried, as far as the facts are concerned, like any other issue of that character, upon the evidence, and that the finding of the trial court, before whom the juror gave his testimony in person, would not be set aside by the reviewing court, except for manifest error. The burden is upon the challenger to show the actual existence of a disqualifying opinion.

We held that if the opinion of the juror go only to the fact that a person has been killed, and that the defendant killed him with a particular instrument, in a case where these facts could not be disputed, he would not necessarily have a disqualifying opinion. We also held that, if the opinion of a juror be clearly such as disqualifies him, no inquiry is permissible whether, notwithstanding his opinion, he will be governed by the evidence alone, but that it is otherwise when the opinion is not based upon evidence or information that disqualifies, and that the law does not regard what the juror may call an opinion as an opinion at all, unless based upon knowledge or reliable information of facts, and the state of the mind of the juror in such case as to what weight he would give to the evidence to be introduced becomes an important element in ascertaining his competency. As a result we held that a juror was competent in the particular case who had heard persons say that the prisoner had killed the deceased with a hoe at a road working, who did not know whether these persons were witnesses or not, nor whether they had heard the evidence or not, who had the same opinion still, which was a fixed opinion from rumor, and that it would take evidence favorable to the prisoner to remove it, but that he could disregard that opinion, and be governed in his verdict by the evidence.

"In the case before us it is conceded that, if the juror had merely said that he heard that the defendant had killed Wheat, he would, upon the statements on his voir dire, have come within the rulings of the Conatser Case. But it is argued that the additional statement that the killing was 'about a settlement' took the case out of the rule. The fact that the juror had heard that the defendant had killed the deceased with a particular instrument, if undisputed, is, as we have held, immaterial; and it is difficult to see how the additional fact of the cause of the killing, if equally undisputed, could change the result, for the cause would not ordinarily fix the blame on either party, or show the nature of the offense. That is certainly so in the present case. And the testimony, as we have seen, is that the defendant himself, at the time and always, said that the difficulty originated in his wanting to get a settlement from the deceased. But the answer to the argument is that what the witness had heard and read was mere rumor. He had not read the testimony given before the coroner's jury, nor, so far as appears, any detailed statement. What he had read and heard was merely that defendant had killed deceased about a settlement, facts about which there was no dispute. Newspaper statements, to disqualify a juror, must be such as fall within the disqualifying sources of information, and rumor alone, then the case falls exactly within the ruling of Conatser v. State." 15 Lea, 543-546.

In Woods v. State, 99 Tenn. 182, 41 S. W. 811, the court said, upon the same subject:

"It is contended that the record discloses several errors of law, on account of which a new trial should be granted. It is said that the trial judge made an erroneous ruling as to the competency of E. W. Epperson, who was presented as a juror. When examined on his voir dire, Epperson said that he had read a detailed account of the killing in the newspapers; that he accepted what he read as true, and from it formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused; but that the account he read did not mention any witnesses, report any evidence, or refer to the coroner's inquest, and that he had no information about the homicide, except what he had read in the newspapers; and, finally, that he was without bias or prejudice as to the defendant, and thought he could render a fair and impartial verdict solely on the law and the evidence, if he should become a juror in the case. The defendant, by his counsel, challenged the proposed juror on account of his opinion. The court ruled that he was competent, and the defendant thereupon challenged him peremptorily, and he was excused.

"The defendant exhausted his other 23 peremptory challenges, and after that peremptorily challenged another person, who was accepted by the court over defendant's objection. Thus the defendant was compelled to take a juror whom he did not want, and whom he would have been able to avoid, had he not been forced to spend 1 of his 24 peremptory challenges upon Epperson, whom he first challenged for cause, and whom he now insists was incompetent. * * * A man who has prejudged the case upon its real facts is necessarily partial, and therefore incompetent to sit as a juror at the trial. An opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, however, is not always a disqualification. Some opinions are disqualifying, and others are not; the difference in effect being due to the difference in character and origin. Those opinions which are based upon personal knowledge of the facts of the case, or upon a statement of the facts made by the witnesses themselves, or by others who have heard the witnesses relate them, disqualify; but those formed from rumor do not disqualify. Rice v. State, 1 Yerg. 432; McGowan v. State, 9 Yerg. 184; Payne v. State, 3 Humph. 376; Moses v. State, 10 Humph. 456; Moses v. State, 11 Humph. 232; Alfred & Anthony v. State, 2 Swan, 581; Eason v. State, 6 Baxt. 466;

cence of the defendant,' from the reading of a newspaper which 'purported to give an account of the facts of the case, but did not purport to give the testimony in the case, and that, if accepted and sworn as jurors in this case, they believed they could give a fair and impartial verdict on the law and the testimony.' The trial judge pronounced those persons competent as jurors, and the defendant challenged them peremptorily. On appeal in error, this court reversed the ruling of the trial judge, and declared the enactment (chapter 51, p. 78, Acts 1870-71) on which it was based null and void, because in contravention of the constitutional right of trial by an impartial jury. 6 Baxt. 467, 477, 478.

"In Conatser's Case it was said that the newspaper account referred to in the Eason Case was treated 'as falling within the disqualifying sources of information, probably because detailed by those who professed to know the facts,' and that 'whether this assumption and the adjudication that the act of Legislature was unconstitutional are correct are questions not now before us.' 12 Lea, 442, 443. The latter suggestion has been regarded as raising some doubt as to the correctness of the decision in Eason's Case.

"The Spence Case lays down the following rule: 'Newspaper statements, to disqualify a juror, must be such as fall within the disqualifying sources of information, and purport to be detailed by those who professed to know the facts. Any other statement would only amount to rumor, whether in parol or printed.' 15 Lea, 546.

"Tested by this rule, Epperson was, undoubtedly, competent. His information was not derived from any one of the 'disqualifying sources.' He had no personal knowledge of the facts, had heard no statement of the facts by the witnesses, nor by others to whom the witnesses had related them, nor did the 'detailed account of the killing,' which he read in the newspapers, purport to be made 'by those who professed to know the facts.' The 'account' he read amounted to rumor only, and it was none the less rumor because circulated by newspapers, and not by oral deliverance. It follows that the opinion entertained by the proposed juror was based on rumor, and that he was, therefore, not disqualified by reason of that opinion. Nothing is better settled in criminal procedure in this state than that rumor is not a source of disqualification."

To the same effect, Leach v. State, 99 Tenn. 584, 596, 597, 42 S. W. 195.

These gentlemen, on their voir dire, stated that they had formed and expressed an opinion as to the merits of the case and the guilt of the defendant; that this opinion was based upon information which they relied upon and believed to be true; that they had read the newspaper accounts of the killing, but that they did not know that those from whom they obtained their information knew or professed to know the circumstances of the case; that they had a fixed opinion, based upon this information, which they regarded as true and reliable, and one which it would require proof to remove; that they could, however, try the case according to the law and evidence, and give the defendant a fair and impartial trial. The parties were held by the court to be competent, were accepted by the state, but challenged by the defense, and were placed on the jury over the protest of the defendant.

"The defendant exhausted all his challenges in making up the jury, and was forced to accept a juror over his peremptory challenge. This is assigned as error.

"We are of opinion that under the ruling of this court in Woods v. State, 99 Tenn. 182, 41 S. W. 811, there was no error in accepting these parties as competent jurors. They could not say that the accounts which they had heard and read were given by persons who knew or professed to know the facts, and they stated that they could render a verdict impartially upon the evidence, notwithstanding these preconceived opinions, which were formed, as we think, from rumor, and not from any account by any one purporting or assuming to know or state the facts. We think the statements they had read and heard of the facts must be treated as rumor and do not disqualify the persons from acting as jurors."

At the same term of the court, in the case of Morrison v. State, from Robertson county, an opinion was delivered by the present Chief Justice; but it has been lost, and the record also has been mislaid. We have had recourse, however, to the original bill of exceptions, and the action of the lower court, which was approved in that case, is thus disclosed:

"John Durrett testified on his voir dire: That he had a fixed opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, founded upon reading an account of the killing in the newspaper, and that it would require proof to remove said opinion. The court then asked the said John Durrett if he believed that he could fairly and impartially render a verdict in this case in accordance with the law and evidence. He replied that he Durrett. The defendant challenged him for cause. The court overruled and disallowed the challenge for cause, to which the defendant excepted. The defendant then and there challenged said John Durrett peremptorily.

"J. M. Birdwell was tendered as a competent juror. He also stated that he had a fixed opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, which was formed from reading a detailed account of the shooting in the Robertson County News, a newspaper published at Springfield, soon after it occurred, and that it would take proof to remove said opinion. The court then asked J. M. Birdwell if he believed that he could fairly and impartially render a verdict in this case in accordance with the law and evidence. He replied that he thought he could. The court held J. M. Birdwell competent as a juror. The state passed him. The defendant challenged him for cause. The court overruled and disallowed said challenge, to which the defendant excepted. The defendant then peremptorily challenged the said J. M. Birdwell.

"John Crosswy was tendered as a competent juror. He also stated that he had a fixed opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, which was formed by reading an account of the killing in the Robertson County News soon after it occurred, and that it would take proof to remove said opinion. The court then asked John Crosswy if he believed he could fairly and impartially render a verdict in this case in accordance with the law and evidence. He replied that he thought he could. The court held John Crosswy competent as a juror. The state passed him. The defendant challenged him for cause. The court disallowed and overruled said challenge for cause, to which the defendant then and there excepted. The defendant peremptorily challenged John Crosswy."

This court held that all of the foregoing persons tendered as jurors were competent, and also held that chapter 383, p. 891, of the Acts of 1899, was constitutional. That act reads:

"That hereafter, in the trial of any criminal case, the fact that a person called as a juror has formed an opinion or impression based upon newspaper statements shall not disqualify him to serve as a juror, if he shall, upon oath, swear that he believes he can fairly and impartially render a verdict therein in accordance with the law and evidence, and the court shall be satisfied of the truth of such statement."

This statute must, however, be construed, in connection with the cases already quoted from, and those which are to follow, as addendum to 111 Tenn., at page 588, 88 S. W. 774. In that case the court held that the juror was incompetent because, said the court, "it will be observed that during the course of his examination the juror stated he conversed with parties who had conversed with witnesses; that he accepted what they said as being the facts in the case; that he does not recall their names, but the names of the witnesses were given him in those conversations; that he has an opinion well grounded and fixed, etc.; that his opinion was unfavorable to the defendant; and that it will require evidence to remove it."

The next and last case in our Reports is Wilson v. State, 109 Tenn. 167, 169, 170, 70 S. W. 57, which was decided at the September term, 1902. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff in error had been convicted of murder in the second degree, and had been sentenced to the penitentiary and appealed. It was urged in this court that he had not had a trial before a fair and impartial jury. Said the court upon this subject:

"The specific objection is over the fact that Richard Rider, W. H. Farmer, and four others, whose names are not given, were not competent and impartial, in that they stated, when examined on their voir dire, that they had formed and expressed opinions touching the guilt or innocence of the defendant. They stated that they had heard a great deal about the case, lived in the locality of the killing, had heard persons state how the killing occurred, but did not know whether the persons who made the statements knew of the facts or not; that they had formed their opinions from these statements, but that, if selected as jurors, they could and would wholly disregard these opinions, and try the case alone on the law and evidence, and do equal and exact justice between the state and the defendant; that they would, however, go into the jury box with their opinions; and that it would take evidence to remove them. These parties were objected to as incompetent and disqualified for jury service, and were offered to be challenged for cause; but the court held them competent, and, being acceptable to the state, defendant was forced to peremptorily challenge them, and in this way exhausted his challenges, and was refused any others on that ground. Defendant, having exhausted all his challenges before the jury was made up, was forced to accept as a juror one C. A. Guy, whom he desired to challenge, and who was selected and impaneled as a juror over his protest and challenge.

"This matter has been often before this court, and its latest deliverance upon the questions involved is embodied in the case of Turner v. State, 111 Tenn. 593, 89 S. W. 778, are formed from the personal knowledge of the juror, the statements of witnesses, or of those who have heard the witnesses, and who repeat what they have heard, or from published accounts of the statements of witnesses; and opinions formed from other sources are based upon rumor, and do not disqualify. Woods v. State, 99 Tenn. 187, 41 S. W. 811."

It is unnecessary that we should add anything to what is said in the foregoing opinions from which we have quoted. Those opinions, in the excerpts which we have quoted, state fully and clearly the latest views of the court in this state upon the vexed subject of which they treat. It is manifest that, under the principles that are thus laid down, none of the jurors objected to were incompetent. The opinions of all of them must be treated as based on rumor.

It is insisted that the court below erred in failing to instruct the jury upon the subject of assault with intent to commit the specific crime of which the plaintiff in error was convicted. We do not think there was any error in this respect. There was no evidence upon which such a charge could have been based. The plaintiff in error was guilty of the charge of which he was convicted, or of nothing. Powers v. State, 117 Tenn. 363, 372, 97 S. W. 815; Frazier v. State, 117 Tenn. 430, 441, 100 S. W. 94.

We have thus gone over the various exceptions made, just as if these matters were properly presented to us upon overruling a motion for a new trial in the lower court. However, in the present case, it appears that the motion for a new trial was made in connection with the motion in arrest of judgment in the following form, as shown on the record, at page 7, viz.: "Defendant by attorneys thereupon moved in arrest of judgment, and for a new trial, which was overruled by the court."

In Freeman v. Railroad, 107 Tenn. 340, 64 S. W. 1, it is said: "It appears that its motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were made at the same time and in the same motion. A motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment cannot be made together and at the same time, and a motion in arrest of judgment is a waiver of a motion for a new trial." In the later case of Hall v. State, 110 Tenn. 365, 75 S. W. 716, it appeared that the motion was precisely the same as here. It is quoted on page 368 of 110 Tenn. and page 717 of 75 S. W.: "Comes the defendant and moves the court in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, which motion being heard is overruled." The court said: "Evidently there was a single motion, embracing two distinct, if not incongruous, matters of procedure, and invoking the judgment of the trial judge upon it. In addition, record just given, we think the necessary inference is that the motion in arrest was first made, and, being so made, was disposed of first. The legal effect of the waiver of the motion for new trial is that the court is confined to error assigned upon the face of the record."

It is insisted that there was error upon the face of the record, because the indictment was defective; but there was no motion to quash made in the court below. The trial judge may perhaps quash on his own motion, but he is not bound to quash, even on motion of the prisoner. Jetton v. State, Meigs, 192; State v. Willis, 3 Head, 157.

Objections to the indictment must be made in the lower court. Glidewell v. State, 15 Lea, 135; Rodes v. State, 10 Lea, 414; Luttrell v. State, 85 Tenn. 232, 237, 1 S. W. 886, 4 Am. St. Rep. 760.

Objections to the form of the indictment are generally waived by going to trial without calling the attention of the trial judge to them. Stevenson v. State, 5 Baxt. 683; Forrest v. State, 13 Lea, 106; Scruggs v. State, 7 Baxt. 38.

There was, however, in the lower court, a motion in arrest of judgment. This motion must rest on matter of record. King v. State, 91 Tenn. 649, 20 S. W. 169; State v. Rogers, 6 Baxt. 563. Such motion is ineffective, unless it states specifically the grounds on which it is based. State v. Steele, 3 Heisk. 135; Hall v. State, 110 Tenn. 365, 75 S. W. 716. In the first of these cases, it is said: "The record does not disclose for what reason the judgment in this case was arrested. The motion in arrest is general, and specifies nothing. It is certainly the better, if not the only correct, practice, in civil as well as criminal cases, formally to assign reasons in arrest of judgment upon the record in support of the motion in arrest, so that the attention of the court in the first instance may be at once directed to the alleged defect in the proceedings, and that the public, through all time, may, upon examination of the record, be informed as to the ground of its action." * * * The propriety, not to say necessity, of this practice, is more apparent when the cause is to be considered by a revising tribunal, whose attention should be directed at once to the reasons in arrest, assigned of record, instead of being compelled to make a critical, and often fruitless, examination of the record to find out the supposed defects."

In Hall v. State, it is said upon this subject: "The motion in arrest should state concisely the defects complained of, or the ruling of the lower court upon such motion, it is held, cannot be reviewed on appeal." * * * A motion in arrest is much in the nature of a demurrer, which goes to defects it or of our legislation as to demurrers. The general demurrer prevailed for many years in this state; but it was finally condemned as a vicious practice, in that it laid a trap for trial courts and for adversary counsel. So the Code of 1858 abolished it, and provided that the demurrer must specify the defects relied on. We think a general motion in arrest is equally objectionable, and should be discountenanced."

However, even if the objection made in this court to the indictment had been made in the court below, in never so specific a form, it must have been held of no avail.

The indictment reads:

"State of Tennessee, Wilson County. September Term, Circuit Court, 1908.

"The grand jurors for the state and county aforesaid, on their oath, present that Cecil Palmer, on the ——— day of July, 1908, feloniously did have unlawful carnal knowledge of Sophronia J. Yates, a female, forcibly and against her will, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

"Walter S. Faulkner, Attorney General."

The objection now offered is that the indictment does not use the word "ravished"—does not charge that the prisoner "ravished" the female. It is insisted that this word was essential at the common law, and that an indictment without it is fatally defective.

The point is not well taken. Our statute defines rape as follows: "Rape is the unlawful carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will." Shannon's Code, § 6451. The word "ravish" implies nothing more than that the act was done forcibly and against the will of the woman. Wilkey v. Commonwealth, 104 Ky. 325, 47 S. W. 219, 220; Tway v. State, 7 Wyo. 75, 78, 79, 50 Pac. 188; Harmon v. Com., 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 69; O'Connell v. State, 6 Minn. 279, 284, 285 (Gil. 190); Williams v. State, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 90, 92, 93, 28 Am. Rep. 399; Gibson v. State, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 574; Fields v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 488, 46 S. W. 418; Leoni v. State, 44 Ala. 110; Jackson v. State, 114 Ga. 861; 40 S. E. 989. In Tway v. State it is said: "It is contended by plaintiff in error that the information is insufficient because the word 'ravish' is not used in describing the offense. The alleged defect being in the manner in which the offense is charged, the objection should have been made by a motion to quash in the court below. The attention of the district court was not called to it in any way, and the question is not properly before us for consideration. But the information is in the language of the statute, and is sufficient. Bishop says: 'There are commonly employed, in setting out some reason for it in most cases is that either the offense is now, or it was in its origin, statutory, and the statutory term must be employed to identify it; such being the rule for all indictments on statutes. For example, murder, as distinguished from manslaughter, is a statutory crime, and hence the necessity for the technical words just mentioned. Under modern statutes, under different language from the old common-law and statutory definitions, the use of the same technical words is not always essential.' 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 335. And he states (volume 2, § 953): 'Ravish' is indispensable in the common-law indictment, because it is in the statute of Westminster II.' The word does not occur in the definition in our statute, and therefore there is no necessity for its use in describing the offense." 7 Wyo. 78, 79, 50 Pac. 188. Neither does the word occur in the definition in our statute, and there is no necessity for its use in describing the offense. Moreover, our Code provides that, "in all cases where the common law prescribes particular and technical language to describe an offense punished gree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon a conviction according to the right of the case" (Shannon's Code, § 7080), and "the statement of facts constituting the offense * * * shall be in ordinary and concise language without prolixity or repetition" (Shannon's Code, § 7077). Our statutory definition of the offense contains every element necessary to constitute the crime of rape. In drawing an indictment under it, it is only necessary to add, as was done in the present case, the circumstances of time and person. The man who is charged with having unlawful carnal knowledge of a particular woman (at a time stated) forcibly and against her will is charged with the crime of rape. The use of the word "ravish," along with the words contained in the statute, would add nothing to the charge. It would be mere surplusage, even with the full meaning accorded to it in the authorities we have cited, and there are other authorities which do not allow so extensive a meaning.

It results there is no error in the judgment of the court below, and it must be affirmed.

MENDOZ v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 28, 1909.)

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 52*)—AFFIDAVIT TO INFORMATION.

A conviction on an information, not accompanied by an affidavit, cannot be sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 163; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

Appeal from Hays County Court; Ed. R. Kone, Judge.

Luis Mendoz was convicted of wife abandonment, and he appeals. Reversed, and prosecution ordered dismissed.

B. G. Neighbors, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. This is a conviction of appellant on a charge of abandoning his wife; his punishment being assessed at $100 fine.

There is no affidavit in this record accompanying the information, without which a successful prosecution cannot be had.

Accordingly the judgment is reversed, and the prosecution ordered dismissed.

MALLORY v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 28, 1909.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1090*)—APPEAL—STATEMENT OF FACTS—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—REVIEW.

Where the record contained no statement of facts or bill of exceptions, and the indictment was sufficient, there was nothing for the court to review, and the judgment must be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1090.*]

Appeal from District Court, Kaufman County; F. L. Hawkins, Judge.

L. Mallory was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was convicted in the district court of Kaufman county on a charge of murder, and his punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of 50 years.

The record comes to us without a statement of facts or bill of exception. Some criticism is made of the validity of the indictment; but an inspection of the same demonstrates quite clearly that it is not subject to any substantial objection. In the condition in which the record reaches us there is no question which can be reviewed, and it follows, under the well-settled rule of this court, that the judgment must be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

CARROLL v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 28, 1909.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 162*)—AMENDMENT—COMPLAINT—AFFIDAVIT.

The county attorney administered the oath to one making an affidavit charging the violation of the local option law, and the information was filed on the same day; but he did not sign the complaint as swearing officer or make his jurat until the next day, when he did so without the knowledge or consent of accused or the court, neither of whom learned of his action until after conviction. Held that, while the complaint would have been sufficient if the signature and jurat of the county attorney had been authorized by an order of court before trial after due notice to accused, such an amendment could not be made without an order, and the complaint was insufficient to sustain a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 524; Dec. Dig. § 162.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 54*)—COMPLAINT—REQUISITES—JURAT.

The jurat of the swearing officer is essential to a complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 173; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

3. COURTS (§ 116*)—RECORDS—AMENDMENT—MODE.

Papers filed in a criminal case become a part of the record and cannot be changed, except by order of the court after full hearing and as authorized by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 369; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

Appeal from Hays County Court; Ed R. Kone, Judge.

J. S. Carroll was convicted of violating the local option law, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Will G. Barber, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted for violating the local option law. There was a motion in arrest of judgment made, urged, and overruled. The facts in this connection are embodied in a bill of exceptions, which shows that on the 22d of April, 1906, an affidavit was made by T. J. Jackman charging appellant with violating the local option law, and that on the same day an information was filed; that both pleadings were filed on the 22d of April; that after filing these papers the county clerk called the county attorney's attention to the fact that he had not signed the jurat, the oath having been administered by the county attorney; that he caused the county attorney to sign his name as the swearing officer on the 23d day of April, the day after the complaint and information were filed. It is also stated in the bill of exceptions as a matter of fact that the county attorney did swear Jackman, the affiant, at the time he took the affidavit, but that he did not as such officer sign the complaint as a swearing officer, or make his jurat to that effect; that his signature officially to the complaint as the swearing officer was made without the knowledge or consent of appellant or the court; and that it was never called to the attention of appellant, nor was he aware of it, nor was the court aware of it, until after the conviction.

We believe, under this state of case, this was error. It has been repeatedly held by this court, and in an unbroken line of decisions, that the jurat of the swearing officer is essential to a complaint, and the decisions have gone sufficiently far to hold that this could not be done after conviction, so as to make a complaint good, or as a basis, rather, of a valid information. This line of decisions is based upon the theory that an information cannot be predicated upon an insufficient complaint, and that a legal complaint is requisite by the statute as a basis or authority for the filing of an information. This complaint would have been sufficient if, prior to the trial of the case, this matter had been brought to the attention of the court and the facts all introduced, and the court thereupon had entered an order authorizing an amendment or the signature of the officer after due notice to appellant. But it ought not to be held that a party to a case, or an attorney in the case, could go among the filed papers of a cause, and add to or detract from, or in any manner change or amend, the pleadings without permission of the court. Such a proceeding as this should not be held valid. Amendments to indictments and practice of this sort have been provided for by statute, and where papers have been filed in a cause they become part of the court records and must remain as such, unless amendments or changes are authorized by the court after a full and fair hearing, and as authorized by law.

This judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

HABEAS CORPUS (§ 113*)—REVIEW ON APPEAL—EVIDENCE OF CRIME.

On an application for a writ of habeas corpus by one charged with murder to be admitted to bail, the judgment of the trial court denying his application will not be set aside, where there is proof showing his guilt to be evident.

Appeal from District Court, Tom Green County; J. W. Timmins, Judge.

John King, who was charged with murder, applied for a writ of habeas corpus. The application was denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State

RAMSEY, J. Relator was charged by indictment in the district court of Tom Green county with the murder of one Katie Ryan. He applied to Hon. J. W. Timmins, district judge, on January 25, 1909, for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging he was illegally restrained of his liberty, and praying that he be admitted to bail. On hearing before said court his application was denied, and he was remanded to the custody of the sheriff. From this judgment an appeal was duly prosecuted on a statement of facts properly filed and approved by the court below.

The testimony introduced on the part of the state is amply sufficient, if true, to show that relator is guilty of murder in the first degree. His defense consists of proof of alibi, and also involves to some extent an attack and impeachment of the state's witnesses. The case is peculiarly one of fact, and in respect to a matter of this sort, as we view it, from the statement of the evidence contained in the record, the judgment of the trial court should not be set aside, where there is proof showing the defendant's guilt to be evident. We are not prepared to say the action of the court below was without ample warrant, and without comment on the testimony we deem it our duty to affirm the judgment of the court below, which is here done.

MYERS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Feb. 3, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 19, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 589*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENT WITNESSES.

Where the facts which accused expected to show by a witness, in order to procure whom he asked a continuance, were not material or probably true, and the evidence tended to show collusion between accused and the absent witness, a continuance was properly denied.

In a prosecution for violation of the local option law, accused was properly asked whether he had in his possession whisky of the brand claimed to have been sold by him, and had whisky at all times; the testimony being admissible to show that accused was selling whisky, and not objectionable as an attempt to show a system or prove the offense of having whisky in his possession.

McGrady & McMahon, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. This conviction was for violating the local option law; the punishment assessed being a fine of $50 and 30 days in jail.

Appellant's first bill of exceptions complains of the action of the court in overruling his first application for continuance or postponement of the case until the following day for the want of the testimony of Henry Peck, who had been duly subpoenaed, but had gone out of town about eight miles that day, expecting the case to be delayed, as there were a number of cases ahead of it, and thinking he could get back in time for trial. The bill shows that appellant expected to prove by the witness Peck that he purchased a quart of the same kind of whisky claimed to have been bought by Bryant from appellant the night before this alleged sale, and that he went with Bryant to his boarding house and got the whisky; the theory of the appellant being, denying the sale absolutely, that Bryant was engaged in selling whisky, and sold this to Kitchell, and then, to avoid prosecution, claimed that he was merely the agent of Kitchell in purchasing it from appellant. The testimony of three witnesses show that Bryant kept whisky in large quantities at his boarding place; and appellant insists that the testimony, taken as a whole, shows that Bryant was the real seller, instead of appellant, which makes the testimony of Peck (the absent witness) important. We do not believe this testimony is material, or probably true, in the light of this record. Furthermore, the facts suggest collusion on the part of appellant in the absence of the witness.

Bill of exceptions No. 2 shows: While defendant was on the stand testifying in his own behalf, the state propounded to him the following question: "Haven't you had Yelthere could be no issue of a subterfuge, and no reason to prove system, and did not prove system; that it was an attempt to prove other offenses of having whisky in his possession, showing opportunity to commit them, and was absolutely irrelevant and immaterial to any issue in this case, and introduced for the purpose of prejudicing the jury against the defendant, and calculated so to do. All of which objections being overruled, appellant answered: "I don't know that I have had Yellowstone, but suppose I have." The state's attorney then asked the following question: "Haven't you had whisky at all times?" Appellant objected, for reasons stated above, which objections were overruled, and appellant answered: "I don't think I had any at that time; but most of the time I did have whisky." This testimony was admissible as a circumstance to corroborate the state's case and to show that appellant was selling whisky. See Southworth v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 582, 109 S. W. 133, Myers v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 558, 108 S. W. 392, and Wagner v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 306, 109 S. W. 169.

Bill No. 3 complains of the following charge of the court: "A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice, unless corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the offense committed; and it is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense. An accomplice, as the term is here used, means any one connected with the crime committed, either as principal offender, as an accomplice, as an accessory, or otherwise. It includes all persons who are connected with the crime by unlawful act or omission on his part, transpiring either before, at the time, or after the commission of the offense, and whether or not he was present and participated in the commission of the crime. Now, if you believe from the evidence that the witness Hamp Bryant was an accomplice, as that term is defined in the foregoing instructions, then you are further instructed that, before you would be authorized to find the defendant guilty, you must not only believe the testimony of the witness Hamp Bryant to be true, but you must further find from the evidence that said Hamp Bryant has been corroborated by other testimony, showing both the commission of the offense charged, as well as connecting the defendant therewith. The corroborating testimony necessary under the law must be material facts connecting the defendant with commission of the offense charged." Appellant objects to this charge, on the ground that it is unwarranted and uncalled for by any evidence adduced on the trial, and was upon an issue not raised by the testimony and not charged in the information, and authorized the jury to find the defendant guilty if he and Hamp Bryant, the party to whom the sale is alleged to have been made in this case, acted together in a sale to J. A. Kitchell. This bill is approved, with the following qualification: "That defendant's counsel presented his special charge No. 2 embodying a similar charge, after main charge was prepared, but before main charge was read to jury." Even if error, this is an invited error, under the explanation of the court, of which appellant cannot complain.

Bill No. 4 complains of the argument of the county attorney in his closing speech, wherein, among other things, he said that the reason the witness Bryant left the county was to keep from testifying in this case, and that the defendant caused him to leave. Appellant then and there objected to said argument, and asked the court to instruct the county attorney to stay within the record, and instruct the jury not to consider such argument, and the court refused to stop the county attorney in such argument. After the argument had been closed, and the court had delivered and read his charge in writing to the jury, the defendant filed and asked the court to give the following charge: "I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, not to consider the argument of the prosecuting attorney in the closing argument as to the witness Hamp Bryant leaving Fannin county because he was a witness against defendant." The court refused to give this charge. The bill is approved, with this qualification: "That, at the time of the above complained of argument, county attorney was replying to an argument made by defendant's counsel, to the effect that a man, such as witness Bryant, who would leave his bondsmen, was not worthy of belief, and that Bryant left to waive prosecution; and county attorney argued that all the facts and circumstances in case should be looked to in determining whether or not he had sworn truthfully, and suggested that it was as reasonable to believe that he had been induced to leave by defendant as that he would go on account of case against him." We think the argument was a legitimate retort upon defense's argument.

We find no error in this record, and the judgment is affirmed.

ROSS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 12, 1908. On Rehearing, May 19, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 603*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF WITNESS—SUFFICIENCY OF APPLICATION.

An application for continuance for the absence of a witness, which did not show whether the witness had permanently left the state, and did not show any probability that the witness would ever return to the state, was defective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1353-1360; Dec. Dig. § 603.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 598*)—CONTINUANCE—DILIGENCE.

A motion by accused during the trial for a postponement in order to procure testimony of witnesses by whom he could establish an alibi, averring that he had not been advised as to the date when the offense was claimed to have been committed, a date being alleged in the information, was properly refused, where it did not appear that any steps had been taken to procure the testimony; the matter not constituting surprise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1335-1341; Dec. Dig. § 598.*]

3. JURY (§ 95*)—QUALIFICATIONS OF JURORS—SITTING ON FORMER TRIAL OF ACCUSED.

That jurors in a prosecution for violation of the local option law had sat on a former prosecution of accused for an illegal sale of liquor, and had convicted him, would not disqualify them as having formed an opinion, where the alleged sales in the two cases were made to different persons and the state relied on different witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 424-430; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

4. JURY (§ 116*)—CHALLENGE TO ARRAY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 661, provides that accused may challenge the array for certain causes. Article 662 provides that the preceding article shall not apply where jurors summoned are those selected by jury commissioners, in which case no challenge to the array is allowed. Held that, where there is no showing whether the jury was selected by the jury commissioners or not, it will be presumed that it was organized according to law and drawn by the jury commissioners, and no challenge to the array will be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

On Rehearing.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 419*)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

In a prosecution for violation of the local option law, where the state's witness on cross-examination had admitted that, while employed by a railroad company, he had cashed his time check for $138, when the original check had been issued for $38, it was error to permit the state to introduce a clearance card, not under oath, alleged to have been delivered by the railroad company to witness, stating that his services had been satisfactory and that he had left the employment of his own accord, since it was hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 419.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—REVERSIBLE ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The admission of the card was reversible error, since the credibility of the witness, being the principal witness, was the main point in the case.

Jas. A. Graham, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. This is a conviction for violating the local option law; the punishment assessed being a fine of $25 and 20 days' imprisonment in the county jail.

Appellant presented application for continuance. The same is defective, in that it does not show whether the witness had permanently left the state or not, and does not show to the court any probability that the witness will ever be back in Texas.

During the progress of the trial appellant made a motion to postpone same in order that he might procure the testimony of several witnesses by whom he could establish an alibi for defendant; that he had not been advised as to the time when the offense was alleged to have been committed. The date alleged in the information of the commission of the offense was April 1, 1907. The record does not show any steps to procure the testimony, and this is not a matter of surprise, as has been frequently held by this court. It follows that the court did not err in refusing the postponement.

The record contains a motion to quash the panel of the jury because appellant says they are made up of Prohibitionists and that they had practically formed an opinion against defendant, for six of the jurors had heard the testimony in another case, where the defendant said he did not sell whisky, and, though he testified to that, they convicted him, and thereby had practically prejudged this case. The sale alleged in this case was shown to have been made to one Humphrey, while the sale in the other case in which he had been tried was made to one Bowman, and in no sense were they companion cases. This shows that the facts were different, and different witnesses, and would not disqualify the jury. Article 661, of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1895 provides that "the defendant may challenge the array for the following causes only: That the officers summoning the jury had acted corruptly and had willfully summoned persons upon the jury known to be prejudiced against the defendant with a view to cause him to be convicted." And article 662 says: "The preceding article does not apply when the jurors summoned are those who have been selected by jury commissioners. In such a case no challenge to the array is allowed." The bill of exceptions here fails to show whether the jury was selected by the jury commissioners or not, and in the absence of such statement in the record it will be presumed the jury was organized according to law and drawn by the jury commissioners, and the only question that can be presented here would be that the jury had formed an opinion in the case, and this cannot be held so, where it is a different offense and where the state relies upon different witnesses.

The other questions have been passed upon by this court in various local option cases; and, finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

On Rehearing.

This case was affirmed at a former sitting of this court, and now comes before us on motion for rehearing.

In the original opinion we failed to pass upon bill of exceptions No. 2, which presents the following matter: While the witness A. L. Humphrey was testifying for the state, and after he had testified to purchasing the bottle of whisky from the defendant, and on cross-examination by defendant's counsel had admitted that while working for the Ft. Worth & Denver Railway Company at Childress he had cashed his time check for $138, and that the original time check had been issued for $38, and said witness had sought to make his explanation thereof, the state's counsel presented said witness with what was called a clearance card, and the witness identified same, and testified that he had seen the proper officer sign the same at the time it was delivered to him, whereupon the state's counsel proposed to read said clearance card as evidence to the jury, and, before same was read as evidence, defendant's counsel objected, for the reason that the card was hearsay, and the same did not purport to be under oath of the party who executed same, which objections were by the court overruled, and the clearance card, which is as follows, was by the state read in evidence to the jury:

"Form 1012. Fort Worth & Denver City Railway Co. Certificate No. 492. Impression copy to be taken in book kept for that purpose. Childress, Texas, Jan. 29, 1903. This is to certify that A. L. Humphrey has been employed in the capacity of wiper at Childress in the M. P. & C. Department of the Fort Worth & Denver City Railway Co., from August 18th, 1901, to January 28th, 1903. Services satisfactory. Left of his own accord. Yours truly, Milton Player, Master Mechanic."

Stamped: "Master Mechanic, Childress, Tex., F. W. & D. C. Ry. Jan. 29, 1903."

This testimony should not have been admitted. It was clearly hearsay testimony, introducing the opinion of an outside party as to the character of the prosecuting witness, and this was the main point in the case—as to whether the prosecuting witness was a credible one. Being the main witness in the case, it clearly authorized a reversal of this judgment.

Accordingly the motion for rehearing is granted, and the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

In a prosecution for robbery, an allegation of the indictment that accused took one $10 bill and one $5 bill, current money of the United States, of the value of $15, must be proved, and evidence merely that he took "a $5 bill and a $10 bill" is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Robbery, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 780*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE—CORROBORATION.

In a prosecution for robbery, it was error to charge that a certain witness was an accomplice, and that a conviction could not be had on his testimony alone, unless the jury believed that it was true and tended to connect accused with the offense charged, and unless it was corroborated by other testimony tending to connect accused with the offense, and that the corroboration was not sufficient if it merely showed the commission of the offense charged.

Appeal from District Court, McLennan County; Richard I. Munroe, Judge.

Jack Early was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Taylor & Gallagher, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of robbery; his punishment being assessed at seven years in the penitentiary.

The evidence is conflicting, and it is not intended here to discuss its sufficiency. The accomplice testified to a state of case which, if sufficiently corroborated, might sustain the conviction. The indictment charges appellant with taking one $10 bill and one $5 bill, current money of the United States of America, of the value of $15. The evidence shows only that he took "a $10 bill and a $5 bill." No witness undertakes to testify what character of money, or that it was in fact money, further than the expressions "$5 bill" and "$10 bill." There is not a word of evidence that indicates it was United States currency of any sort, greenbacks, national bank bills, or treasury notes; but the evidence leaves it just as stated—"a $5 bill and a $10 bill." Why it is thus left is not explained in the record. This allegation of the indictment must be proved. The evidence is too indefinite in this respect. We call attention to this, so that upon another trial such uncertainty may be avoided.

The court charged the jury in regard to accomplice evidence as follows: "I instruct you that the witness Major Nolan is an accomplice. Now, you cannot convict the defendant upon his testimony alone, unless you first believe that his testimony is true and tends to connect the defendant with the offense charged; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense charged." Exception was properly reserved to this charge, and correctly. This charge has been condemned in a great number of cases. Jordan v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 145, 101 S. W. 247, where will be found quite a number of cases cited; Oates v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 449, 103 S. W. 859.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant filed an application for a continuance, which was overruled. This ruling of the court cannot be reviewed, because appellant failed to reserve an exception. There is no bill of exception in the record as to this or any other matter occurring during the trial.

He urges in his motion for new trial that the court erred in permitting the wife of defendant to be contradicted or impeached by showing that she made contradictory statements out of court to those to which she testified on the trial. There were no exceptions reserved to these rulings of the court, and, as we find the statement of facts, we are of opinion that the court did not go beyond the law in ruling as he did; but, in any event, vic-tion for burglary of a railroad car with intent to commit the crime of theft. The property taken from the car was quite a number of hams, branded "Red Gravy Hams." The facts show that appellant had quite a number of these hams in possession, which were taken from the car. There are other facts going to connect him with this transaction. It is also shown that, after being arrested and giving bond, he fled the country, and was arrested after some length of time in California. The details of the testimony cover several pages of the record, and present a sufficient case to justify the verdict of the jury.

The judgment is ordered to be affirmed.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 28, 1909.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 132*)—JOINDER OF COUNTS—ELECTION.

An indictment for the theft of a horse, which charged in one count that the horse was the property of a designated person, and in another count that the horse was in the possession of such person and alleged that it belonged to some person unknown, charged but one offense, and the court properly refused to require the state to elect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 425-453; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 132*)—JOINDER OF COUNTS—ELECTION.

The state will not be required to elect between counts, where the same transaction is embraced in any number of distinct counts, and where the same offense is charged; and each count alleges a different mode of doing the same act, constituting the same offense, or where distinct ways of doing the same thing are not antagonistic to each other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 425-453; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 621*)—TRIAL—ORDER OF TRIAL OF INDICTMENTS.

The court properly refused to require the state to try accused on a prior indictment, on it appearing that the present indictment was intended to cure a defect in the prior indictment, especially where accused was not deprived of any defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 621.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 590*)—CONTINUANCE—GROUNDS—SUFFICIENCY.

The refusal to postpone the case for 24 hours to enable accused to file a plea of former conviction was not erroneous, where the court offered to grant a reasonable time for filing the plea, and where the time requested was deemed unnecessary, and where the nature of the plea was not even hinted at.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 590.*]

R. J. McCard, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was indicted in the district court of Williamson county on a charge of theft. On trial he was convicted, and his punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of two years.

The indictment contains two counts. The first count charges the horse alleged to have been stolen to have been the property of one A. C. Aderholt, and the second count charges the possession to have been in A. C. Aderholt, but alleges the property belonging to some person to the grand jury unknown.

1. Appellant in the court below filed a motion, after the evidence was in, requiring the state to elect upon which count a conviction would be sought. This was denied by the court, and in this ruling there was no error. The rule is thus stated in the case of Keeler v. State, 15 Tex. Cr. App. 111: "The principle is that the court should always interpose, either by quashing the indictment or by compelling an election, where an attempt is made, as manifested by either the indictment or the evidence, to convict the accused of two or more offenses growing out of distinct and separate transactions, but should never interpose in either mode where the joinder is simply designed and calculated to adapt the pleadings to the different aspects in which the evidence on the trial may present a single transaction." In this case, when the facts are considered, it is obvious that the rule requiring an election cannot in reason be invoked, because this indictment charges but one felony; the different counts only charging different means of accomplishing the one act—the theft of the horse. See Moore v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 522, 40 S. W. 287. It is, well settled in this court that the state will not be required to elect between counts, where the same transaction is embraced in any number of distinct counts, and where the same offense is charged, and each count alleges a different mode or means of doing the same act, constituting the same offense, or where the distinct ways of doing the same thing are not antagonistic to each other. In such case they may be alleged conjunctively in the same count, and the prosecution has the right to proceed upon all the means alleged. Again, where the different counts in an indictment are in substance but different ways of charging the same offense and are pleaded for the purpose of meeting the evidence as it may transpire, the state cannot be required to elect and confine itself to one require the court, before proceeding with the trial of this cause, to put appellant upon trial on an indictment pending therein preferred against him at the July term of said court in 1908. This the court declined to do, and in explanation of his action states that when the motion was submitted to the court the district attorney stated to the court that the indictment in the cause from which this appeal results was intended to cure a defect in the first count of the indictment on which appellant sought first to be tried, and that he did not expect to and would not try defendant upon but one of said indictments, and that he preferred to dispose of this cause before taking any action on the first indictment preferred. The court further states, it not appearing to the court that defendant would be deprived of any right or defense by granting the request of the district attorney, the motion was overruled. The mere statement of the court in his explanation makes it obvious beyond doubt that there was no error in the action of which appellant could complain.

3. Again, appellant, through his counsel, filed another motion, in which he asked for postponement of the case for 24 hours in order to secure time in which to file a plea of former jeopardy. The motion states that counsel desired to file a plea of former jeopardy, and that it would require him at least the greater portion of the time requested to prepare said plea of jeopardy, and as a reasonable excuse for not having said plea prepared the motion states that since the filing of the indictment in this case there has been two cases pending against him in this court, to wit, case No. 6,562 and case No. 6,576, and that, until such time as the court shall pass upon the motion requiring the state to dispose of the first numbered case, neither his counsel nor appellant did and could know what to set up, which necessarily involved the ruling of the court in the other motion as to the facts in his said plea of former jeopardy. In allowing this bill of exceptions the court states that upon the day preceding the day upon which the above motion was filed the case against the defendant was called for trial, and the defendant's counsel stated that he desired to file a plea of former jeopardy, and asked that this case be postponed and another case called in order to give him time to prepare such plea. This request was granted by the court, and the case against the appellant was postponed for such purpose, and appellant filed the motion above referred to; that the court in this connection stated that an additional reasonable time for filing said contained in the court's explanation is sufficient, we think, to show that appellant is without cause of complaint. It will be observed that the nature of his plea of jeopardy is not even hinted at in his motion, nor, on the motion for a new trial, do the facts constituting such jeopardy appear.

4. Finally, it is insisted that the evidence in the case is insufficient to sustain the verdict. It must be confessed that the evidence is not of that conclusive character which might well be desired; but after a careful inspection of the entire record we are hardly prepared to say that the evidence is so slight as would justify us, in view of the finding of the jury and the action of the court in overruling the motion for a new trial, in setting aside the conviction on this ground.

Finding no error in the record, it is ordered that the judgment of conviction be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

COLLINS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 10, 1908. On Rehearing, May 19, 1909.)

1. LARCENY (§ 36*)—CONVERSION OF PROPERTY BY BAILEE—INDICTMENT.

An indictment which alleges that defendant was bailee of a sewing machine belonging to the prosecutor, and in violation of the contract of bailment sold the machine and converted the proceeds to his own use, is sufficient to sustain a conviction of theft as a bailee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. § 96; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

2. LARCENY (§ 59*)—CONVERSION OF PROPERTY BY BAILEE—EVIDENCE OF VALUE.

Though no witness testified to the exact value of the property, circumstantial evidence that defendant, as bailee, sold it for $5 and converted the same to his own use, is sufficient to sustain a conviction of theft by the bailee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 154, 155; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

Appeal from Bowie County Court; Sam H. Smelser, Judge.

Bob Collins was convicted of theft as a bailee, and appeals. Affirmed.

Hart, Mahaffey & Thomas, for appellant.
F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of embezzlement, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $50 and 30 days in jail.

The charging part of the information is as follows: "One Bob Collins having possession of a sewing machine then and there the property of Susan Simpson by virtue of his contract and agreement to turn said machine over to Jim Hughes, city marshal of Texarkana, Texas, or to pay to said Hughes a fine

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes and costs to satisfy a criminal judgment against said Susie Simpson, said contract and agreement of said Bob Collins with said Susie Simpson was violated because said Bob Collins did then and there unlawfully and without the consent of said Susie Simpson, the owner of said sewing machine, fraudulently convert said machine to his, the said Bob Collins', own use and benefit, and with the intent to deprive the said Susie Simpson, the said owner of the said sewing machine, of the value thereof; the value of said machine being then and there of the value of twenty dollars—contrary to the statutes in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state."

Appellant filed a motion to quash the information on the ground that same does not charge an offense and is in the alternative. In view of the allegation in the information which says he appropriated said machine to his own use and benefit, we hold that the information is sufficient.

We notice, however, appellant insists that the statement of facts does not show proof of the value of the machine. Furthermore, it is complained of in appellant's motion for a new trial. There is evidence that the machine was sold by appellant for $5. This is sufficient proof of value, in view of the fact that appellant was convicted of a misdemeanor.

The record showing no error, the judgment is affirmed.

On Rehearing.

This case was affirmed at a recent sitting of this court, and now comes before us on motion for rehearing.

Appellant insists the court erred in holding the indictment in the case was sufficient. After a careful review of the indictment, we hold that same is sufficient, and, while inartificially drawn, it shows that appellant was bailee of the prosecuting witness, Susie Simpson, and as such bailee he violated the terms of the bailment, and sold a sewing machine, and appropriated the money to his own use and benefit. We therefore hold that the information is sufficient.

Appellant is correct in saying the court erred in stating that appellant had been convicted of embezzlement. He was convicted, as appellant insists, of theft as a bailee.

Appellant further contends there is no evidence in this record to show the value of the machine appropriated by appellant. To this we cannot agree. It is circumstantially established that it is worth something like $5. While it is true no witness swears to the exact value of it, one witness does swear appellant sold it for $5; and this is a basis for this court, in conjunction with other circumstances in the record, to assume that it had some market value.

The motion for rehearing is hereby overruled.

PICKETT v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 28, 1909. Dissenting Opinion May 19, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*)—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS—NEW TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JURY.

Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 821, authorizes the state to take issue with accused on the truth of allegations in the motion for new trial, and permits the judge to hear evidence. A motion for a new trial, for misconduct of the jurors in commenting on the failure of accused to testify, supported by the affidavit of a juror, asked that the jurors be summoned and the matter inquired into. The district attorney denied the allegations and demanded strict proof. Held, that the court, on appeal from a denial of the motion, must assume, in the absence of a bill of exceptions, or anything to the contrary, that the matter was investigated and that the allegations were found untrue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1144.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 956*)—NEW TRIAL.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 821, authorizing the state to take issue with accused on the truth of the causes set forth in the motion for a new trial, and permitting the judge to hear evidence, counter affidavits and oral proof are receivable on a motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2373-2391; Dec. Dig. § 956.*]

Davidson, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from District Court, Bell County; John M. Furman, Judge.

John Pickett was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was convicted in the district court of Bell county on a charge of rape, and his punishment assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The record comes to us without a statement of facts or bill of exception. Appellant seeks a reversal, as he sought a new trial, on the ground, as stated by him, "that he has not had a fair and impartial trial in this cause on account of the misconduct of the jury which rendered the verdict in this case against him, in this: That after retiring to consider their verdict, and in consideration of the case against this defendant, the jury alluded to, mentioned, commented upon, and discussed the fact that this defendant failed to take the stand and testify in his own behalf on the trial of this case, and considered such failure to testify as a circumstance against him, to the injury of this defendant. The defendant says that he does not know and is unable to state the extent of the discussion of the fact that he refused to testify in his own behalf, in the amount of consideration given it by the jury, except as appears from the affidavits of W. N. Kelly and members of said jury." The affidavit of appellant was attached to the

a new trial in this case." The affidavit of the juror Kelly was to the effect "that the defendant did not take the stand and testify in his own behalf on the trial of said cause, and that the fact of his failure to testify on said trial was referred to, mentioned, and discussed by numbers of the jury during their consideration of this case, and before their verdict was reached; that I am unable to recall what member of the jury mentioned the fact of defendant's failure to testify in his own behalf, or to state what jurors spoke of it; but I am positive that the fact of defendant's failure to testify was mentioned and discussed among the jurors in their consideration of the case." This motion was filed on the 28th day of December, 1908. The allegations contained in this motion were denied by the district attorney as follows: "Now comes the district attorney and denies the allegations set up by the defendant, John Pickett, in his motion for a new trial herein, and says the said allegations are not true in whole or in part, and demands strict proof thereof. Wherefore he asks judgment, and that said motion be denied and refused, and he will ever pray. D. R. Pendleton, District Attorney 27th Judicial District of Texas."

It will be noticed that the affidavit attached to the motion is in very general terms, does not state any particular fact that was mentioned by any juror, the name of any juror discussing the failure of appellant to testify, or when or in what connection the matter was mentioned if at all. It may well be doubted whether, in view of the very general statement of this juror, the court would in any event have been required to grant a new trial. We have not infrequently decided that it is not every reference or casual allusion by the jury to the failure of a defendant to testify that would require the court to grant a new trial. See Smith v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 344, 106 S. W. 1161, and Arnwine v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 114 S. W. 796, where this subject is fully discussed. In any event, however, it is certain that, as here presented, we would not be authorized to reverse the judgment for the error alleged. In appellant's motion he makes the issue that he was deprived of a fair trial by reason of certain facts therein stated, in support of which motion he attaches the affidavit of the juror Kelly. This motion and the grounds thereof are denied by the district attorney in his official capacity and under the sanction and solemnity of his official oath. It will be noted, further, that appellant's counsel requested that the jurors be summoned and the matter inquired into. Here the matter rests. It is to be presumed that, if urged, this matter would have been inquired into. Criminal Procedure of 1896, referring to motions for a new trial, is as follows: "The state may take issue with the defendant upon the truth of the causes set forth in the motion for a new trial, and in such case the judge shall hear evidence by affidavit or otherwise, and determine the issue." And it has been held in many cases that counter affidavits are receivable on motion for new trial. Dignowitty v. State, 17 Tex. 521, 67 Am. Dec. 670; Hyde v. State, 16 Tex. 445, 67 Am. Dec. 630; Reynolds v. State, 7 Tex. App. 516. It has also been held in many cases that under the terms of this statute, by affidavit or otherwise, the court is authorized to receive oral proof. Childs v. State, 10 Tex. App. 183; Reynolds v. State, 7 Tex. App. 516; Rucker v. State, 7 Tex. App. 549; Wilson v. State, 17 Tex. App. 525; Richardson v. State, 28 Tex. App. 216, 12 S. W. 870; Ulrich v. State, 30 Tex. App. 61, 16 S. W. 769. While it is doubtless true that, in the absence of any contest, if the affidavit of the juror in its language had been sufficient, that the court should grant a new trial, it does not occur to us that the mere fact that appellant files a motion of this sort, notwithstanding the denial under oath of the district attorney, he is, in the absence of further showing, entitled to a new trial, and certainly it is not true that where, as in this case, he seeks and asks for an investigation, he is on the mere charge entitled to a reversal, in the absence of any showing, by bill of exception or otherwise, of any injustice or injury done him.

In the absence of statement of facts, this is the only question we can review, and, as we have stated, it seems to be without merit. It is therefore ordered that the judgment be, and the same is hereby, in all things affirmed.

DAVIDSON, P. J. (dissenting). I respectfully dissent from the disposition made of this case by my Brethren. There was but one question presented for revision, the record being without a statement of facts and bills of exceptions. Appellant filed his affidavit, which is part of the motion for a new trial, in which he states that the jury alluded to, mentioned, commented upon, and discussed the fact that he failed to take the stand and testify in his own behalf during the trial, and that the jury considered such failure on his part to testify as a circumstance against him. The district attorney files a reply to this in the following language, but to which he did not swear: "Now comes the district attorney and denies the allegations set up by the defendant, John Pickett, in his motion for a new trial herein, and says that said allegations are not true in whole or in part, and demands strict proof thereof, wherefore he asks judgment, and that said motion be denied and refused, and he will ever pray. D. R. Pendleton, District Attorney." In support of his motion appellant filed the affidavit of W. N. Kelly, one of the jurors who tried and convicted him, in which it is stated: "That the defendant did not take the stand and testify in his own behalf on the trial of said cause, and that the fact of his failure to testify on said trial was referred to, mentioned, and discussed by numbers of the jury during their consideration of this case and before their verdict was reached," etc. My Brethren say this is not sufficient showing to consider the question of the discussion of appellant's failure to testify, and is too general, and they indulge the further presumption that the court inquired into the matter and heard the evidence. There is nothing in the record, as I understand it, to sustain the conclusion that the court heard any evidence further than stated above. The judgment overruling the motion for new trial does not even recite the fact that evidence was heard. It does state that the case came on to be heard on the motion and amended motion of appellant, and "was duly considered by the court, and is in all things overruled." The main opinion treats the general denial on the part of the district attorney as if it were an affidavit denying all the facts, and places it upon the same plane, as a question of evidence, as they do the affidavit of the juror Kelly. The district attorney does not allege or state in his general denial that he knew any fact or was cognizant of anything that occurred in the jury room. He simply denied as district attorney the truthfulness of the facts set up in appellant's affidavit attached to his motion for new trial and calls for the facts. The district attorney, of course, was unaware of what occurred in the jury room, and necessarily could not know or be informed as to what was said and done, except from others.

It certainly is a dangerous precedent to establish, to wit, that a general demurrer or general denial of the district attorney has all the force and effect of being testimony at all, and it would still be more dangerous to hold that it would be testimony of such gravity as to overcome the sworn statement of jurors who participated in the occurrences to which they testify. The statute authorizes the court to hear evidence on motions for new trial "by affidavit or otherwise." The record in this case shows that the only testimony introduced or heard was the affidavit of the juror Kelly, and he stands uncontradicted and unimpeached that the jury "referred to, mentioned, and discussed the failure of the appellant to testify, and this before their verdict was reached." This does not come within the doctrine held by this court that it was a "mere allusion" to the defendant's failure to testify. It has not been laid down heretofore that the simple statement of a district attorney in the form of a general denial was testimony, or the equivalent to testimony. We find this question mentioned in McLaughlin v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 215, 87 S. W. 158, in the following language: "We find in the record a contest filed by the district attorney to the motion for new trial, in which the statement is made that, if the trial judge absented himself from the courtroom during the argument in said cause, it was only momentary, while said judge was at the urinal, a short distance from the courtroom, in sight and hearing of the people in the courtroom, and no injury could have been done defendant, because there was no objection to any proceeding during said momentary absence of the judge. This contest is not sworn to by the district attorney, nor is there any evidence in the record supporting it. Then we are relegated to the undisputed affidavit of appellant's counsel. We do not think the facts set up in the affidavit of appellant's counsel, the substance of which is stated above, authorize this court to say that this case comes within the rule laid down in Jeff Scott v. State, 47 Tex. Cr. R. 568, 85 S. W. 1060, 122 Am. St. Rep. 717; but in our opinion the facts come within the rule laid down in Bateson v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 34, 80 S. W. 88. We there held that where the judge had lost control of the trial, as the uncontroverted affidavit shows, it would be ground for reversal. There being no controverting affidavit, we have no alternative except to reverse this case, which is accordingly done." This quotation lays down, in my judgment, the correct rule.

Applying the principle enunciated in the McLaughlin Case to this, we have the affidavit of the defendant himself as to his information that the jury referred to, mentioned, and discussed his failure to testify before they reached the verdict. We also have an unsworn general denial of the district attorney, calling for proof, and only calling for such proof. This is met by the uncontroverted affidavit of the juror Kelly, who emphatically swears that they referred to, mentioned, and discussed the failure of appellant to testify before the jury had arrived at a verdict. Under the McLaughlin Case the showing was sufficient, and, being uncontroverted, the evidence was ample to sustain appellant's ground of his motion for new trial. If the language of the juror Kelly means anything, it shows that appellant's failure to testify was not casually alluded to, nor was it a "mere allusion" to his failure to testify, but that such failure to testify "was referred to, mentioned, and discussed by the jury before arriving at their verdict." Under all the decisions, so far as I am aware, in this state, this judgment should be reversed on account of the ground set up in the motion.

For the reasons above indicated, I most respectfully enter my dissent from the affirmance of the judgment in this case.

GOODRICH v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 28, 1909.)

HIGHWAYS (§ 151*)—FAILURE TO WORK ON ROAD AFTER SUMMONS—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

Pen. Code 1895, art. 491, provides that if any person liable to work on the public roads willfully fail or refuse to attend at the time and place designated by the road overseer, after being legally summoned, or shall fail, on or before the day for which he is summoned, to pay to such overseer $1 per day for each day he may have been notified to work on the road, he shall be fined, etc. In a prosecution thereunder the charging part of the affidavit was: "On or about the 16th day of January, A. D. 1908, G. [defendant] was liable under the law to work upon the public roads, to wit, all the streets and roads in the town of H., in precinct No. 68, in S. County, Texas, in said county was legally summons to attend and work on said road at a time and place designated by the said F., the said road overseer of said road precinct, to wit, 20th, 21, 22, 23, 24th days of January, A. D. 1908, and the said G. did then and there willfully and unlawfully fail to attend the time and place aforesaid, and did willfully fail and refuse on and before the day on which he was summon as aforesaid to attend to the said F., the road overseer of said road, the sum of one dollar per day for each day that he had been notified to work on upon said road." Held, that the complaint did not follow the Code, was unintelligible, and fatally insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. § 416; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

Appeal from Sabine County Court; H. C. Maund, Judge.

John D. Goodrich was convicted of failing to work on the public road after he was summoned, and he appeals. Reversed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was convicted in the county court of Sabine county, Tex., on the 18th day of February, 1908, of the offense of failing to work on the public road after due summons.

The charging part of the affidavit, as same appears in the record, is as follows: " * * * On or about the 16th day of January A. D. 1908, J. D. Goodrich was liable under the law to work upon the public roads, to wit, all the streets and roads in the town of Hemphill, in precinct No. 68, in Sabine county, Texas, in said county was legally summons to attend and work on said road at a time and place designated by the said J. D. Fuller, the said road overseer of said road precinct, to wit, 20th, 21, 22, 23, 24th days of January, A. D. 1908, and the said J. D. Goodrich did then and there willfully and unlawfully fail to attend the time and place aforesaid, and did willfully fail and refuse on and before the day on which he was summon as aforesaid to attend to the said J. D. Fuller, the road overseer of said road, the sum of $1 per day for each day that he had been notified to work upon said road."

The prosecution seems to have been begun and the case prosecuted under article 491 of the Penal Code of 1895. This article is as follows: Article 491: "If any person liable under the law to work upon the public roads shall willfully fail or refuse to attend, either in person or by substitute, at the time and place designated by the road overseer of his district or precinct, after being legally summoned, or shall fail, on or before the day for which he is summoned to attend, to pay to such overseer the sum of one dollar per day for each day he may have been notified to work on the road, or, having attended, shall fail to perform any duty required of him by law and such overseer, he shall be fined in any sum not exceeding ten dollars."

It will be noted that the complaint does not follow the provision of our Penal Code, and is really unintelligible. Our Assistant Attorney General has secured from the county clerk of Sabine county, Tex., certified copies of both the complaint and information, and the record seems to be, as tested by these instruments, correctly copied in the transcript. It is obvious that the complaint is fatally insufficient, and the allegation that appellant had failed "to attend to the said J. D. Fuller" is wholly meaningless.

There are a number of very interesting questions raised on the appeal, and some of them, not without difficulty, touching the effect of the creation of the road law in Sabine county; but as the case is not briefed, and as this prosecution will have, in any event, to be dismissed, we forbear any consideration or discussion of the other questions.

For the error pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the prosecution ordered dismissed.

PURYEAR v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 28, 1909. On Rehearing, May 19, 1909.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 308*)—MURDER IN THE SECOND DEGREE—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that if accused killed decedent in a sudden transport of passion, aroused without adequate cause, he was guilty of murder in the second degree, is not reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 642; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

The court, in testing the sufficiency of a charge, must consider the instructions as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1990; Dec. Dig. § 822.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 23*)—SECOND DEGREE MURDER.

One who kills another intentionally, not in self-defense, and under circumstances not amounting to murder in the first degree, nor

It is always unlawful for one to intentionally kill another, unless the act is in self-defense, or is justified in law, such as in case of a legal execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 146*)—IMPLIED MALICE.

Implied malice may be presumed, where there is an intentional killing without just cause or excuse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 265; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 308*)—SECOND DEGREE MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court correctly defined murder in the second degree, and charged that to constitute the offense malice must exist, and that implied malice was inferred from the act and fact of an unlawful killing, an instruction that if accused, with a deadly weapon, in a sudden transport of passion, aroused without adequate cause, and not in self-defense, "with intent to kill," shot and killed decedent, he was guilty of murder in the second degree, was not erroneous; for it required the jury to find, to justify a conviction of murder in the second degree, that the killing was unlawful under circumstances in which the law implied malice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 642; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 780*)—INSTRUCTIONS—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE.

Where the evidence showed such relation between a witness for accused and accused as to justify a finding that the witness aided in the commission of the offense, and on cross-examination, by way of impeachment, statements were attributed to the witness which, if standing alone, might form the basis for an adverse verdict, an instruction that, if the witness was an accomplice, his testimony, so far as it was adverse to accused, must be corroborated, but that, so far as it was favorable to accused, no corroboration was required, was sufficiently favorable to accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1860; Dec. Dig. § 780.*]

8. HOMICIDE (§ 295*)—PROVOKING DIFFICULTY—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where accused left the saloon where decedent worked after the latter had called accused a vile name, and then procured a weapon and came back and applied to decedent the same name, the court was authorized to charge on provoking the difficulty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 608; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

9. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Decedent called accused a vile name. Accused left the place, armed himself with a weapon, and returned and called decedent the same name. Accused believed that the language was liable to provoke a difficulty. Accused at the time told decedent to get his gun to give him a chance for his life. Held, that the court properly refused to charge that accused had a right to go and arm himself, and return to decedent, and seek a retraction of the insult offered by decedent, and that, if he attempted to attack accused, the latter had a perfect right of self-defense.

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the state impeached the testimony of a witness by proving without objection that his reputation for truth was bad, and accused offered testimony of an impeaching character, based on conflicting statements of witnesses, and accused made no request for an instruction limiting the use of impeaching testimony, the failure to give a charge limiting the use of the testimony was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1999; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 866*)—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

Statements by decedent, almost immediately after the firing of the fatal shots, to the effect that accused had shot him because he would not give accused a 15-cent drink of whiskey on credit, and that accused shot in cold blood, were admissible as a part of the res gestæ.

On Rehearing.

13. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE.

An instruction on self-defense, that every person may defend himself against any unlawful attack, real or apparent, that a reasonable apprehension of death or of serious bodily harm excuses one in using all necessary force to protect his life, that if accused killed decedent while decedent was about to make an attack on him, causing him to fear death or serious bodily harm, accused was entitled to kill decedent in self-defense, and that if accused sought the occasion on which decedent was killed for the purpose of slaying him, and provoked a difficulty with decedent, the killing was murder, etc., sufficiently submits the issue of self-defense.

Appeal from District Court, Williamson County; Chas. A. Wilcox, Judge.

Will Puryear was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. S. Walton, O. Dickens, D. S. Chessler, and J. F. Taulbee, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. This is the second appeal of this case. The report of the former appeal is found in 50 Tex. Cr. R. 454, 98 S. W. 258, where quite a full statement of the facts of the case will appear. There is no substantial difference between the facts as they appeared on the former appeal and as they appeared on the trial from which this appeal results. It may be stated, however, that on the first trial appellant testified on his own behalf. On this trial he did not. The state, however, offered extracts from his testimony on the first trial which contained statements believed by the prosecution, and as we believe, to be prejudicial to his defense. On the trial of the case from which this appeal results, which was had in the district court of Williamson county, on August 10, 1908, the appellant was found guilty of murder in the second degree, and his punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of 30 years. There are a number of questions raised in the appellant's motion for new trial and by bills of exceptions, many of which have been treated in the brief filed herein on behalf of appellant, and the most important of which we will undertake to notice and discuss.

1. The first error assigned relates to the charge of the court on murder in the second degree. The court instructed the jury as stated, and submitted the issue of murder in the first degree, murder in the second degree, and manslaughter, together with the law of self-defense, and presented as well the doctrine of provoking the difficulty. The portion of the charge criticised is as follows: "If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, with a deadly weapon or instrument reasonably calculated and likely to produce death by the mode and manner of its use, in a sudden transport of passion, aroused without adequate cause, and not in defense of himself against an unlawful attack, real or apparent, reasonably producing a rational fear or expectation of death or serious bodily injury, with the intent to kill, did shoot and thereby kill Minos Long, as charged in the indictment, you will find him guilty of murder in the second degree, and assess his punishment at confinement in the state penitentiary for any period that you may determine and state in your verdict, provided it be for not less than five years." The correctness of this charge is assailed on many grounds, and particularly because the court failed to instruct the jury that the killing, in order to be murder in the second degree, must have been done upon malice and implied malice; second, because the court failed to instruct the jury that an unlawful killing must be found to have been committed in order to find defendant guilty of murder in the second degree; and, third, because the court instructed the jury that if they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant killed the deceased in a sudden transport of passion, aroused without adequate cause, they should convict him of murder in the second degree.

The use of the language challenged in the third objection to this charge has not infrequently been condemned by this court, and notably in the cases of Clark v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 519, 102 S. W. 1136, Kannmacher v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 118, 101 S. W. 238, and other later cases; but in the later case of Walters v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 114 S. W. 628, this charge was held not to be reversible. In that case the earlier cases cited by appellant were substantially overruled. As to the other criticisms of this portion of the charge, it is not to be denied that the charge is not as full or as accurately expressed as is always desirable; but we believe, tested in the light of the entire charge, or considered in fairness and carefully analyzed within itself, the charge complained of is not so clearly erroneous as to constitute reversible error. We have frequently said, and it cannot be too often repeated, that in testing the sufficiency of a charge of the court, as, indeed, other instruments, the whole instrument and charge must and should be considered together. The entire charge of the court on the subject of murder in the second degree is as follows:

"The next lower grade of culpable homicide to murder in the first degree is murder in the second degree. Malice is also a necessary ingredient of the offense of murder in the second. The distinguishing feature, however, so far as the element of malice is concerned, is that in murder in the first degree malice must be proven to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt as an existing fact, while in murder in the second degree malice will be implied from the fact of an unlawful killing.

"Implied malice is that which the law infers from or imputes to certain acts, however suddenly done. Thus, when the fact of an unlawful killing is established, and the facts do not establish express malice beyond a reasonable doubt, nor tend to mitigate, excuse, or justify the act, then the law implies malice, and the murder is in the second degree; and the law does not further define murder in the second degree than to say that if the killing is shown to be unlawful, and there is nothing in the evidence on the one hand showing express malice, and on the other hand there is nothing in the evidence that will reduce the killing below the grade of murder, then the law implies malice, and the homicide is murder in the second degree.

"Every person is permitted by law to defend himself against any unlawful attack, real or apparent, reasonably threatening, or reasonably appearing to him to threaten, injury to his person, and is justified in using all the necessary and reasonable force to defend himself, but no more than the circumstances reasonably indicate to be necessary. Homicide is justified by law when committed in defense of one's person against any unlawful and violent attack, real or apparent, made or appearing to him to be made, in such a manner as to produce a reasonable expectation or fear of death or some serious bodily injury. If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, with a deadly weapon or instrument reasonably calculated and likely to produce death by the mode and manner of its use, in a sudden transport of passion, aroused without adequate cause, and not in defense of himself against an unlawful attack, real or apparent, reasonably producing a rational fear or expectation of death or serious bodily injury, with the intent to kill, did shoot and thereby kill Minos Long, as charged in the indictment, you will find him guilty of murder in the second degree and assess his punishment at confinement in the state penitentiary for any period that you may determine and state in your verdict, provided it be for not less than five years."

There is no complaint in the motion that murder in the second degree was not properly defined. The jury were in terms told that, in order to constitute murder in the second degree, malice must exist, and, further, that implied malice was inferred, or such as the law imputes to the act and fact of an unlawful killing. Then follows the language complained of. It is certain, if one kills another intentionally, under circumstances not amounting to murder in the first degree, or such as would reduce the grade of offense to manslaughter, and same is not in self-defense, it is unlawful. It is equally certain that under such circumstances the law would impute malice to appellant, and that the killing would be murder in the second degree. It is always unlawful for one person to intentionally kill another, unless the act is in self-defense or under such circumstances, as in case of legal execution, that the act would be justified in law; and in a case like the one at bar, where murder in the second degree is well and fully defined, so well, indeed, that the definition escapes criticism or complaint, it is not believed that the mere omission in a particular paragraph to require the killing to be unlawful, or upon malice, would vitiate what would be otherwise a proper charge, where the facts required to be found, both as a matter of law and as a matter of fact, would make the killing unlawful and stamp it inevitably as of the grade of murder in the second degree.

It is, as stated, the law, settled time out of mind, that implied malice will be presumed whenever there is an intentional killing without just cause or excuse. As was said by Judge Clark in the case of Harris v. State, 8 Tex. App. 90: "A perfectly exact and satisfactory definition of that term, signifying its legal acceptation in a form at once clear and concise, has been often attempted, but with no very satisfactory permanent result. The differing minds of different courts have employed different terms and language in an attempt to convey substantially the same meaning; and, while a general similarity is apparent in all the definitions, the legal mind has not yet crystalized the substance of the term into a terse sentence readily comprehensible by the average juror." Again, in the same case, the same learned judge uses this language: "If malice, in all cases, must be an inference of fact to be deduced by the jury, and not in any case an implication of law to be expounded by the court, the inquiry at once arises: From what fact must this inference be deduced? Every inference legitimately arising must have a substratum of fact as a basis, and in the absence of such basis the law permits no inference. Clearly, then, the jury must infer malice from the isolated fact of killing, because we are discussing by way of illustration a case in which nothing else is proven." Again, in the case of Gallagher v. State, 28 Tex. App. 288, 12 S. W. 1093, the court use this language: "Malice in its legal sense denotes a wrongful act, done intentionally, without just cause or excuse."

We think the charge, while not as clearly expressed as might be desired, is subject only to the construction that would imply and require a finding that the killing was unlawful, and a state of case in which the law of necessity would imply malice, and that the use of the words in said charge, "with intent to kill," relates back and covers any defect in the previous portion of the charge, and that the conclusion logically and necessarily follows that such killing was both intentional and unlawful. See Brittain v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 406, 37 S. W. 758; Neyland v. State, 18 Tex. App. 547.

2. Complaint is made of the charge of the court on the subject of accomplice. The particular paragraph of the charge assailed is as follows:

"A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice, even if such testimony be inculpatory and be believed by the jury to be true, unless such testimony be corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the offense committed (if any), and the corroboration (if any) is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense.

"An accomplice, as the word is here used, means any one connected with the crime committed (if any), either as principal offender, or an accomplice, or an accessory, or otherwise. It includes all persons who are connected with the crime (if any) by unlawful act or omission on his part, transpiring either before, at the time, or after the commission of the offense (if any).

"If, therefore, you find from the evidence that the witness Harvey Carroll was an accomplice, or if you have a reasonable doubt as to whether he was or not, as that term is defined in the foregoing instructions, and if you further find that the evidence of said witness is true, and that same shows the defendant's guilt of the charge contained in the indictment, you nevertheless, even if you should so believe, cannot find the defendant guilty upon said testimony, unless you are satisfied that same has been corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the offense committed (if any), and the corroboration (if any) is not sufficient if rated as above stated in order to warrant a conviction, has no application to testimony given by an accomplice which is exculpatory. If, therefore, you find that the testimony of said witness Carroll, or that any part of said testimony, shows, or tends in any degree to show, that the defendant was justified in shooting Minos Long (if he did so), or that said testimony, or any part of same, excuses or tends to excuse, or mitigates or tends to mitigate, the offense (if any), you are under no duty to require the corroboration of such exculpatory testimony (if any) before allowing full effect to same, even if you find from the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt that said witness was an accomplice to the offense (if any) of the killing of Minos Long."

This charge is complained of, first, because there was no testimony adduced showing or tending to show that Carroll was an accomplice; second, because Carroll was a witness for the defendant, and the rule of evidence as to the testimony of accomplices does not apply to witnesses for defendant; third, because it was calculated to confuse the jury, as it was impossible for the jury to distinguish the exculpatory from the inculpatory evidence of said witness, and required of the jury an impossible duty; and, fourth, because said charge was calculated to prejudice said witness before the jury, and cause the jury to believe that said witness was, in the opinion of the court, a particeps criminis to said killing. The evidence showed such relation of the witness Carroll to the facts preceding the killing and leading up to the homicide as might have well justified the jury in believing that he was aiding and encouraging appellant in the assault and attack upon deceased. It is true that Carroll was a witness for the appellant. On his cross-examination, and by way of impeachment, certain statements were attributed to him, which, if standing alone, and in the absence of such an instruction as that given by the court, might have been appropriated by the jury as the basis of an adverse verdict. The purpose, as evidently the effect, of this charge, was to advise and instruct the jury that, if they believed Carroll occupied the relation of accomplice to the homicide, they could not appropriate or use his testimony as a basis of conviction, even though it was true, unless corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses.

The last clause of the court's charge, which in substance instructed the jury that the rule requiring accomplice's testimony to be corroborated has no application to testimony given by an accomplice which is exculpatory, then thus instructs them: "If, therefore, you find that the testimony of said witness Carroll, or mitigates or tends to mitigate, the offense (if any), you are under no duty to require the corroboration of such exculpatory testimony (if any) before allowing full effect to same, even if you find from the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt that said witness was an accomplice to the offense (if any) of the killing of Minos Long." It is not certain but that this instruction was more favorable to appellant than he was entitled to receive. There is nothing in the complaint that the jury would be confused by this instruction, or that it was impossible for them to distinguish between the exculpatory and inculpatory evidence of this witness. The clear intent and effect of it was to advise the jury that if the witness was an accomplice, so far as his testimony was adverse to appellant's interest and affected or might affect the basis of a conviction, it must be corroborated, but in so far as it was favorable to appellant and tended to show justification, excuse, or mitigation of the offense alleged, that no corroboration was required.

3. The next complaint relates to the charge of the court on the subject of provoking a difficulty. This complaint, in substance, is to the effect that this issue was not raised by the facts, for that the appellant, under all the facts of the case, was entitled to a full and fair trial upon the law of self-defense, unembarrassed or uncomplicated with a charge on provoking a difficulty. As stated above, the facts are not essentially different from those on the former trial. In the course of his opinion on the former appeal, Judge Henderson, speaking for the court, says: "We believe that the court was fully authorized to give a charge on provoking the difficulty. According to appellant's own testimony, he left the saloon to procure a weapon, and came back and applied to deceased the same opprobrious epithet which he says deceased had applied to him. This, we think, sufficiently authorized the court to charge on provoking the difficulty. See McCandless v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 58, 57 S. W. 672, for character of charge to be given on this subject." The appellant does not complain that the charge of the court in respect to the issue of provoking a difficulty was in itself erroneous, but only, in effect, that the court was not authorized on the facts to charge on this issue at all. We agree with the former opinion rendered in the case that it was clearly the duty of the court to charge on this subject, and we think that the charge is substantially unobjectionable.

4. The next complaint urged by appellant relates to the action of the court in refusing to charge the jury, in substance, that if they believed that deceased had insulted appellant, attempted to attack defendant, that he (the defendant) had a perfect right of self-defense, and would not lose said right of self-defense by going and arming himself and returning for the purpose aforesaid. On the former appeal, touching appellant's right of self-defense, Judge Henderson uses the following language: "If, when appellant left the saloon, he had not formed the intent to take the life of deceased, but procured a pistol and returned to the saloon, and drew his pistol on deceased, and cursed and abused him, and deceased did not resent it, and he afterwards started to walk away, and deceased again cursed and abused him, and appellant's mind became excited, and he then formed the intent to kill deceased, and did so, then he was only guilty of murder in the second degree. And this is the only contingency, as it appears to us, wherein a charge on self-defense was required; that is, if appellant at this juncture had abandoned the difficulty and withdrawn therefrom, and deceased renewed it, and made a demonstration as if to get a weapon, and appellant believed himself thereby placed in peril of his life or serious bodily injury, he might have the right of self-defense. However, if there was no abandonment, and he came there, as he says himself, to provoke a difficulty, and, if appellant resented it, that he expected to have a mortal combat with deadly weapons, he could not claim self-defense."

This language is directly applicable to the facts of this case. Not only in the statement of facts, but in the very bill of exceptions contained in this record, appellant was shown by the record to have testified that he went back to the saloon to call deceased a son of a bitch; that he thought deceased probably would not take it, and would try to kill him; that he went and got the gun, to call deceased a son of a bitch, and, if he started to kill him, that he aimed to have something to defend himself with; that he knew it was language calculated to provoke a difficulty; that he believed that it was language which was liable to provoke a difficulty; that at the time he told him to get his gun, to give him a chance for his life; that he did not particularly want to fight with guns, when he said that he expected to fight because he had called him a son of a bitch; that he told him, "I have got my gun, and to get his," that he told him this because he had called him a son of a bitch, and naturally expected he would get a gun. There is so much of this testimony that we deem it unnecessary to set it out. Clearly, under these facts, the requested charge would have been wholly inapplicable, and it would have been error for the court to have given it.

5. Again, complaint is made of the error of the court in refusing to limit the testimony show that certain witnesses had theretofore made different statements from those made by them on the present trial, and impeaching testimony, as will fully appear from the statement of facts in the case, to which reference is made, and which impeaching testimony and contradictions are made a part hereof by reference to prevent repetition; and the court in its charge to the jury failed to limit the use the jury could or ought to make of same, and failed to tell the jury the purpose of permitting same to be introduced; and defendant called the attention of the court, in his motion for a new trial, to its failure to so instruct the jury, and asked for a new trial because of said failure, because the law requires the court to so instruct the jury when such testimony is introduced in evidence, or the jury are at liberty to use same for all purposes, and impair the defendant's rights." It will be noted that by the terms of this exception the nature or character of testimony is not set out. What it is we are at a loss to know, and in order to consider the bill at all, and to judge and determine whether the impeachment and contradictions are of such character as could or might have injured appellant, or whether they were such as should have been limited by the court, would require us to go through the voluminous statement of facts and determine, what the bill leaves open, the nature and character of the impeaching testimony, and whether in fact it should be limited. This, we think, under such a bill, we are not required to do; but in any event, in view of the explanation and qualifications of the court, it is manifest there was no error committed in the respect complained of. In approving this bill the court makes the following statement: "There was no impeaching testimony whatever introduced by the state, except the testimony of the witness Townsend, admitted without objection, that the reputation of the witness Carroll for truth and veracity was bad. All of the testimony as to conflicting statements of witnesses, and all evidence of an impeaching character, except as above stated, was introduced by the defendant, and the defendant made no request, either verbal or written, that such testimony be limited, under such circumstances. The court considered that it would be more favorable to the defendant not to limit said testimony, and same was not limited in the charge."

6. Again, complaint is made of the testimony of several witnesses in respect to statements and declarations of the deceased which were offered as dying declarations and as part of the res gestæ. These statements were to the effect that appellant had shot him because he would not sell him a 15-cent drink of whisky on a credit, and that he shot fired, and we think come within the rule of res gestae, and were admissible on this ground, and probably as well on the ground of their being dying declarations.

7. There are some other matters complained of in appellant's motion for new trial, as well as by bills of exceptions; but they are not matters of serious moment, nor do we believe that there was any error committed by the trial court in respect to any of them. We have carefully examined the quite voluminous record in the light of appellant's brief, as well as aided by his oral argument, and we do not believe that there was any error committed on the trial of the case for which we would be justified in reversing it.

It is, therefore, ordered that the judgment of conviction be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

On Rehearing.

The motion for rehearing filed herein vigorously assails the correctness of the opinion of the court in affirming the judgment of the court below. We have, on the fullest reflection, no doubt of the correctness of the matters discussed in the original opinion. The motion for rehearing, however, complains that the charge of the court on self-defense was so interwoven with the charge on provoking the difficulty as to constitute a limitation on appellant's right of self-defense, and is error, if self-defense pure and simple be in the case supported by ever so little testimony. This matter received our attention on the original submission; but it occurred to us that the contention had such little foundation in the record as not to require discussion. However, in view of the serious insistence of appellant, and to make the opinion complete, we will discuss the matter.

In paragraph 3 of the court's charge this instruction was given: "Every person is permitted by law to defend himself against any unlawful attack, real or apparent, reasonably threatening, or reasonably appearing to him to threaten, injury to his person, and is justified in using all the necessary and reasonable force to defend himself, but no more than the circumstances reasonably indicate to be necessary. Homicide is justified by law when committed in defense of one's person against any unlawful and violent attack, real or apparent, made, or appearing to him to be made, in such a manner as to produce a reasonable expectation or fear of death or some serious bodily injury." In the sixth paragraph of the court's charge the jury were thus instructed: "A reasonable apprehension of death or of great or serious bodily harm will excuse a party in using all necessary force to protect his life or person, and it is not necessary that there should be actual danger, provided he no event bound to retreat in order to avoid the necessity of killing his assailant. If from the evidence you believe the defendant killed Minos Long, but further believe that at the time of so doing the deceased had made an attack on him, or that it at said time appeared to defendant that deceased had made, or was making, or was about to make, an attack on him, which from the manner and character of it, or from any or all of the existing circumstances, caused him, when viewing the situation at the time from his standpoint, to have a reasonable expectation or fear of death or serious bodily injury, and that, acting under such reasonable expectation or fear, if any such there were, the defendant killed the deceased, or if you have a reasonable doubt as to whether or not such were the facts, then you should acquit him on the ground of self-defense."

It will be noted, from the quotations above, that the jury were instructed that if they found the facts which under the law constitute self-defense existed, or if they have a reasonable doubt of their existence, they should acquit appellant on the ground of self-defense. Then follows a charge on the doctrine of self-defense as affected by the issue of provoking the difficulty. This portion of the court's charge is as follows: "You are further instructed as a part of the law of this case, and as a part of the law on self-defense, that if you find from the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Will Puryear, sought the occasion on which Minos Long was killed (if he was killed) for the purpose of slaying the said Long (if he did so), and that said defendant, having found the said Long, then and there did some act, or used some language, or did both, as the case may be, with intent on his (defendant's) part to produce the occasion for slaying him and bring on the difficulty, and that said conduct on defendant's part (if there were such) was reasonably calculated to provoke a difficulty, and that on such account Minos Long attacked defendant, or reasonably appeared to defendant to attack him, or to be about to attack him, and that defendant then killed Minos Long in pursuance of his original design (if there was such), such killing would be murder of either of the first or second degree, according as the facts and circumstances in evidence may justify the jury in finding. But if the defendant provoked the difficulty that resulted in the death of deceased, and by his own wrongful act produced a necessity for taking the life of the deceased, but in doing so, if he did so, he had no intent to kill deceased, or to inflict upon him serious bodily harm, and suddenly, under the immediate influence of sudden passion arising from an adequate cause, as hereinbefore explained in this charge, he shot and killed deceased, then you will find the defendant guilty of manslaughter. But if you do not find from the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of the facts which would qualify the defendant's perfect right of self-defense under the law as it is given you in this paragraph of the charge, you will decide the issue of self-defense in accordance with the law on that subject contained in paragraph 6 of this charge and without reference to the law on the subject of provoking the difficulty."

The eighth paragraph is as follows: "The full and perfect right of self-defense of a person who provokes a difficulty revives as soon as such person in good faith abandons such difficulty. You are therefore instructed that, even if you find from the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant sought the occasion on which Minos Long was killed (if he was killed) for the purpose of slaying the said Long (if he did so), or for the purpose of provoking a difficulty with no intention of slaying said Long, and that said defendant, having found the said Long, then and there did some act, or used some language, or did both, as the case may be, with intent on his (defendant's) part to produce the occasion and bring on the difficulty, and that said conduct on defendant's part (if there were such) was reasonably calculated to provoke and did in fact provoke a difficulty, such facts would in no wise limit or abridge any right of self-defense that the defendant would otherwise have had on the occasion of the shooting, if you further find that defendant had at the actual time of the shooting abandoned said difficulty (if any) in good faith, or if you have a reasonable doubt as to whether or not he had at said time in good faith abandoned said difficulty (if any)."

We think a careful reading of the court's charge must convince the thoughtful reader that the issue of self-defense was, in the light of the entire record, submitted to the jury as fairly and as fully as it was possible to do.

The other questions of moment are discussed in the original opinion of the court, and we see no occasion to elaborate them.

The motion for rehearing is overruled.

BENSON v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 28, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 714*)—TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 823, providing that on a new trial the former conviction shall not be alluded to in the argument, the action of the district attorney, on a second trial for murder, in referring in the cross-examination to accused's former conviction, and in commenting in his argument on the infliction of the death penalty in the former trial, was reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1664; Dec. Dig. § 714.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court, in charging on murder in the second degree and manslaughter, should not alone charge with reference to an actual attack, but should also charge with reference to an attack about to be made by decedent, and thereby give accused the benefit of the reasonable apprehension of danger as it appeared to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 629; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 763*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

An instruction, if "you find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, or guilty of manslaughter, you will state of which offense found guilty," etc., and that if defendant is guilty of some grade of homicide, but there is reasonable doubt whether it is murder in the second degree, or manslaughter, accused is entitled to the benefit of the doubt, and "if you do not find the decedent is dead, and that defendant unlawfully killed him, a verdict of not guilty will be returned," is not erroneous as directing the jury to find defendant guilty of either murder in the second degree or manslaughter.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 763*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF TESTIMONY.

An instruction that the object of introducing impeaching testimony was to have the jury disbelieve the testimony of the witnesses, that impeaching evidence was used to affect the credibility of the witnesses and to enable the jury to attach such weight to their testimony as they might think proper, and that they might or might not believe the testimony so attacked, and might take all the evidence, and give such weight to it as might seem proper, etc., was objectionable as being on the weight to be given to testimony.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; Edward Dwyer, Judge.

Willie Benson was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Chester H. Terrell, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. This is the third appeal of this case. On the first trial appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and his punishment assessed at death. 51 Tex. Cr. R. 367, 103 S. W. 911. In this opinion there is a general, but fairly correct, statement of the facts in the case, which was to some extent, however, qualified on the trial of this case. On the second trial appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and his punishment assessed at 25 years' confinement in the penitentiary. The opinion on appeal on this conviction is reported in 111 S. W. 403. The conviction on this trial was reversed for the error of the court in charging on the matter of impeaching testimony. Appellant was tried the third time in the district court of Bexar county, and and there are perhaps more numerous objections made to the proceedings of the court below on this appeal than on either of the former appeals.

1. We think the case must be reversed on account of the action of the court in permitting the district attorney to refer to and discuss the former conviction of appellant. This action of the district attorney was duly excepted to at the time, and the point saved by proper bills. Among other things, on cross-examination, the district attorney asked the witness Isaac Walker, "Didn't you know it, and don't you know the papers were full of the Benson trial, and didn't you know the jury assessed the death penalty one month after the killing?" This question and the answer sought to be elicited thereby was objected to by counsel for appellant, for the reason that the district attorney had no right to refer to the death penalty having been given, and because he stated the fact in the presence of the jury that the death penalty had once been assessed against appellant. The court explains, in approving this bill, that the question objected to was permitted on cross-examination of the witnesses, who testified that they had not testified at the first trial, but had kept quiet; that the district attorney then pressed the witnesses, asking how they could remain silent and not tell what they knew, when the death penalty had been found by the jury, and the case had been affirmed by the higher court. This, the court states, was allowed, as going to the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given to their testimony by the jury. The court also states, in his explanation, that the death penalty was not in this case, and the court so informed the jury at the time, and it was not referred to, except to affect the witnesses as stated, and to show the jury the improbability of their testimony; they remaining silent under such circumstances. The former conviction, the court says, was a part of the history of the case, and, he adds, the attorney for the defendant and the witness Neunhoffer had mentioned the fact to the jury that the knife was found while the case was on appeal.

By another bill it is shown that in his argument to the jury the district attorney frequently commented on the death penalty having been given, in connection with the testimony of Isaac Walker and Ora Lee Moseley, and stated they should not be believed, because they remained silent, knowing that the death penalty had been given. These statements of the district attorney were objected to by counsel for appellant, and exception reserved, for the reason that commenting on the fact that a death penalty had been mony was admitted solely for the purpose of going to the credibility and weight of the testimony under the circumstances, and the further statement is made that on the second trial defendant was found guilty of murder in the second degree, and the death penalty could not be considered by the jury in this case, and they were so informed by the court, and no written instructions were asked by defendant's counsel on this subject. It will be noted that, according to the explanation of the court, the only reference made by defendant's counsel to the witness named was an incidental reference to the effect that the knife had been found while the case was on appeal. Whether this appeal would be considered by the jury as referring to his former conviction, or an appeal in an effort to obtain bail, does not appear, and is so casual and incidental as not probably to have been such as would have injured appellant, and was not such a statement as would warrant, as we believe, the district attorney to in terms refer to the fact of a former conviction of appellant, and that that conviction had resulted in the assessment of the penalty of death. Article 823 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1895 is as follows: "The effect of a new trial is to place the cause in the same position in which it was before any trial had taken place. The former conviction shall be regarded as no presumption of guilt, nor shall it be alluded to in the argument." It has been uniformly held in this state that it is reversible error for counsel, in argument on a second trial, to allude to a defendant's conviction on a former trial. Hatch v. State, 8 Tex. App. 416, 34 Am. Rep. 751; House v. State, 9 Tex. App. 567; Moore v. State, 21 Tex. App. 693, 2 S. W. 887; Fuller v. State, 30 Tex. App. 560, 17 S. W. 1108; Richardson v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 518, 27 S. W. 139. It has also been held that evidence with regard to the fact of defendant's previous conviction is inadmissible testimony. Richardson v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 518, 27 S. W. 139, 518; Hargrove v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 431, 26 S. W. 993.

In the case of Hamilton v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 464, 51 S. W. 217, it is said: "If the private prosecutor cannot allude to the former conviction in his argument, by the same reasoning he should not be permitted to allude to it during the progress of the trial. Here he not only alluded to it, but alluded to it in the adducing of testimony in a manner calculated to give weight to that testimony—that is, he was permitted to prove by a juror who tried appellant at a former trial that not only he, but the entire jury, believed the prosecutrix's testimony on that not have convicted him without this illegal testimony, or they may, without this testimony, have given him a less term of years in the penitentiary. We cannot tell. We only know that the evidence and the remark of the private prosecutor were improper and illegal, and were of a character calculated to prejudice appellant. Washington v. State, 23 Tex. App. 336, 5 S. W. 119."

In the later case of Coleman v. State, 49 Tex. Cr. R. 82, 90 S. W. 499, in respect to a matter not so serious as this, the court reversed the judgment of conviction. In that case it seems that the district attorney alluded to and discussed the facts of another case, and it seems, according to the statement of the court, the argument was drawn out by some remarks of appellant's counsel. According to the report the matter arose in this way: "That the case referred to was a murder case, somewhat similar to this case, and that case showed the death penalty had been inflicted, and such allusion was calculated to influence the jury and prejudice their minds against defendant. The court signed the bill by stating 'that the district attorney in his closing argument, in answer to some authorities read by counsel for defendant, showed what it took to make murder in the first degree. As soon as objections were made, I told the district attorney it was not proper or right to discuss the fact before the jury in a case not on trial.' In the following bill it is shown: 'Defendant's counsel claimed the fact that the defendant told the officers about the occurrence and surrendered was proof of his innocence. The district attorney then in reply said that he knew of a case of a negro named Spencer, and that counsel for defendant and some of the jury knew of said case, where defendant came across the river to Red River county, surrendered to the officers, and was subsequently convicted and sent to the penitentiary for a term of 99 years.' Appellant objected to this for various reasons, and the court signs the bill with the explanation that the court instructed the jury not to consider the remarks of the district attorney. These remarks were highly improper, and the objection to them should have been sustained at once. It is true that the court withdrew the remarks, or rather instructed the jury to disregard them. Still the remarks were made, and evidently found lodgment in the minds of the jury. If the facts stated by the district attorney in his argument had been introduced and offered before the jury, they would have been clearly inadmissible, and the admission of them before the jury would have required a reversal of the judgment. Why matters of this sort should continually occur in the trial of cases we do not understand, and all matters that intrude upon the jury, whether in evidence or argument. It hardly answers this sort of erroneous proceedings that subsequently the court withdraws the matter from the consideration of the jury. It may or may not. It is owing to the seriousness of the statements. But these matters have become so frequent, and we find them in so many records, that we feel called upon to discountenance them. Trial courts should promptly suppress such remarks and argument, and attorneys refrain from using them, to the end that only fair and legitimate testimony and argument may be considered by the jury in the disposition of cases involving life and liberty."

The importance of this statute and the intent and meaning of it are thus expressed by this court in the case of Hatch v. State, 8 Tex. App. 423, 34 Am. Rep. 751: "This statute either means something or it means nothing. If it means anything, then its violation is an injury done to the rights of the defendant, for which the judgment in this case should and must be reversed. It was said by the court in Tucker v. Henniker, 41 N. H. 317: 'It is irregular and illegal for counsel to comment upon facts not proven before the jury as true, and not legally competent and admissible as evidence. The counsel represents and is a substitute for his client. Whatever, therefore, the client may do in the management of his case may be done by his counsel. The largest and most liberal freedom of speech is allowed, and the law protects him in it. The right of discussing the merits of the cause, both as to the law and the facts, is unabridged. The range of discussion is wide. He may be heard in argument upon every question of law. In his addresses to the jury it is his privilege to descant upon the facts proved or admitted in the pleadings, to arraign the conduct of parties, impugn, excuse, justify, or condemn motives, so far as they are developed in evidence, assail the credibility of witnesses when it is impeached by direct evidence, or by the inconsistency or incoherence of their testimony, their manner of testifying, their appearance on the stand, or by circumstances. His illustrations may be as various as the resources of his genius; his argumentation as full and profound as his learning can make it; and he may, if he will, give play to his wit or wings to his imagination. To his freedom of speech, however, there are some limitations. His manner must be decorous. All courts have power to protect themselves from contempt, and indecency in words or sentiments is contempt. * * * When counsel are permitted to state facts in argument and to com-

v. Swineford, 44 Wis. 282, 28 Am. Rep. 582, the following appropriate language upon this subject is used by the court: "The profession of the law is instituted for the administration of justice. The duties of the bench and bar differ in kind, not in purpose. The duty of both alike is to establish the truth and to apply the law to it. It is essential to the proper administration of justice, frail and uncertain at the best, that all that can be said for each party, in the determination of fact and law, should be heard. Forensic strife is but a method, and a mighty one, to ascertain the truth, and the law governing the truth. It is the duty of the counsel to make the most of the case which his client is able to give him; but counsel is out of his duty and his right, and outside of the principle and object of his profession, when he travels out of his client's case and assumes to supply its deficiencies. Therefore is it that the nice sense of the profession regards with such distrust and aversion the testimony of a lawyer in favor of his client. It is the duty and right of counsel to indulge in all fair argument in favor of the right of his client; but he is outside of his duty and his right when he appeals to prejudice irrelevant to the case. Properly, prejudice has no more sanction at the bar than on the bench. But an advocate may make himself the alter ego of his client, and indulge in prejudice against his adversary, as far as they rest on the facts in the case. But he has neither the duty nor right to appeal to prejudices, just or unjust, against the adversary, dehors the very case he has to try. The very fullest freedom of speech, within the duty of his profession, should be accorded to counsel; but it is license, not freedom of speech, to travel out of the record, basing his argument on facts not appearing, and appealing to prejudices irrelevant to the case and outside of the proof." We might cite many other authorities to the same effect, but will content ourselves with making the following extract from the opinion of our Supreme Court in Thompson v. State. Moore, J., commenting upon the character of discussion indulged in by the district attorney in his concluding address to the jury, says: "We deem it, however, of sufficiently grave importance, and so highly objectionable, as to require the decided condemnation of the court. Zeal in behalf of their clients, or desire for success, should never induce counsel in civil causes, much less those representing the state in criminal cases, to permit themselves to endeavor to obtain a verdict by arguments based upon any other than the facts in the case, and the conclusions legitimately deducible from the law applicable to them." 43 Tex. 268."

It not only conveyed the information to the jury that in a trial had in the same court, only a month after the homicide, another jury, with the facts fresh on the minds of the witnesses, had found appellant guilty, but the further information that in their judgment the offense was so flagrant as to entitle the state to the assessment of the death penalty. We can well understand how any jury, with this information thus conveyed, would have been reluctant to have acquitted appellant, and how natural it would have been for them, if they should convict him at all, to assess a penalty having some relation, at least, to the severity of the penalty assessed on the first conviction. We cannot sanction a conviction thus obtained, and feel that we have no recourse but to reverse the case, if we are to follow the law and give effect to the statutes in force in this state.

2. There are a number of other questions raised on the appeal, which, perhaps, in view of another trial, it is proper we should discuss. Complaint is made of the charge of the court in many particulars, and exception is urged that in charging, both on murder in the second degree and on manslaughter, the court charged alone with reference to an actual attack, and does not charge the jury with reference to an attack about to be made by the deceased, or give appellant the benefit of the reasonable apprehension of danger as it appeared to him. The charge of the court is, indeed, subject to this criticism, though, when the court comes to charge on self-defense, the instruction is not subject to serious criticism. We suggest that, in framing the charge on another trial, the court should conform to the suggestions pointed out in appellant's motion for a new trial.

3. Complaint is also made of the charge of the court in respect to the issue of manslaughter, and the definition given by the court is seriously complained of. The case was tried, and brief for appellant was filed, before the handing down of the opinion of this court in the Waters Case, 114 S. W. 628; and in the light of that decision, and under the rule now established, we do not think the charge subject to the criticisms leveled against it.

4. A reversal is also sought for the reason, as claimed, that under the charge of the court the jury were in effect directed to find appellant guilty of either murder in the second degree or manslaughter, and we are cited on this subject to the case of Haynes v. State, 2 Tex. App. 84. We think the case at bar easily distinguishable from the charge contained in that case. Here the court instructed the jury as follows: "Should you find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, or guilty of manslaughter, you will state of which offense found guilty; culpable homicide, but you have a reasonable doubt whether the offense (if any) is murder of the second degree or manslaughter, then you must give the defendant the benefit of the doubt, and in such case, if you find him guilty, it could not be of a higher grade of offense than manslaughter. If you do not find that the said Albert Miller is dead, and that the defendant unlawfully killed him, then you will return a verdict of 'not guilty.' It will thus be seen, reading the charge as a whole, that this instruction went no further than to advise the jury that if they found appellant guilty they were required to state the grade of the offense and name the punishment assessed therefor, but that if they did not find that the killing was unlawful they would acquit him.

5. The charge of the court on impeaching testimony is not correct, and we are not sure but that the case should be reversed for that alone. This charge is as follows: "A witness may be impeached by proving that he or she has sworn differently from what he or she does before you concerning matters material and relevant to the issue. The defense has introduced certain portions of the evidence of the state's witnesses Beulah Miller, Jesse Baird, Arthur Miller, Willie Taylor, Dr. Balderserelli, and Robert Jefferson, taken at former hearings herein, to impeach them, by showing that they had given contradictory testimony to that given by them now before you. The state has also introduced portions of the evidence of witnesses Emmet Polk and Sarah Jones, taken at the inquest trial, and a portion of the testimony of Will Benson, taken at a former hearing, to impeach them, by showing that they had given contradictory testimony on said occasions to that given now. The object of both state and defendant in introducing the impeaching testimony is to have you disbelieve, and not accept as true, and to refuse to give credence to, the testimony of said witnesses, as given before you. Impeaching evidence is used for the purpose of affecting the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses giving the testimony, and to enable you to attach such weight to it, if any, as you may think proper. You may or may not believe the testimony so attacked, or you may or may not believe the attacking testimony; and you may take all the evidence before you altogether, and give such weight to either or both as you may see proper, should you so see fit, in arriving at a verdict herein."

This language follows pretty closely the opinion of this court on the former appeal, where the effect of the impeaching testimony was discussed; but it is not always permissible for the jury, in substance, to do where the evidence was conflicting it was the duty of the jury to reconcile the conflicting testimony, if in their power to do so, or, they could not do so, it was their province "give faith and credit to such as you think entitled to belief, and to disbelieve such as you see proper to disbelieve." In passing this charge the court said: "Under repeat decisions of this court the objections seem to have been well taken, and the charge gives the jury the right arbitrarily to disbelieve or discredit the testimony, and is an invasion of the province of the jury." A similar rule has been made in many cases. See Pharr v. State, 9 Tex. App. 129; Butler v. State, 10 Tex. App. 48; Wilbanks v. State, 10 Tex. App. 642; Knight v. State, 7 Tex. App. 206.

6. There are a number of other questions raised by the assignments and noted in appellant's brief. Some of these are not of character likely to arise on another trial, nor do we believe that in respect to any of them there is such error as would justify a reversal.

For the grounds stated above, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Appeal from District Court, Brazos County; J. C. Scott, Judge.

Application of Will Thomas for a writ of habeas corpus for his release from confinement pending his trial on a felony charge. From a judgment denying the writ, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. G. Board, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. The relator was indicted in the district court of Brazos county on a charge of rape, and also on a charge of assault with intent to commit rape, upon one Mary Jackson. He was allowed bail by the court below in the sum of $750. On April 5th of this year he made application to the district court of Brazos county for a writ of habeas corpus, seeking his release on the ground that he was not subject to prosecution in the ordinary manner for this crime, but was entitled to be tried and punished, if at all, under the laws of this state in respect to juveniles. He further alleged that at the time of his application he was confined in the jail of Brazos county with all manner of criminals charged with murder and other felonies.

1. The law by virtue of which relator seeks release is, as we understand it, the act entitled "Delinquent Child." Chapter 85, p. 137, Acts 30th Leg. 1907. This act undertakes to define what is a delinquent child, and makes provision for the disposition, care, and nurture of such child through juvenile courts, and contains, among other things, in section 4 of said act, the provision that no child within the provisions of this act shall be incarcerated in any compartment of a jail or lock-up in which persons over 16 years of age are being kept or detained. This section of the statute, and the provision above quoted, have reference, as we believe, only to the confinement of such child during proceedings brought under the terms thereof for the disposition and rearing of such child, and was not intended to oust the courts or the executive officers of the state of their power and authority to confine prisoners under 16 years of age in a jail or other secure places to await trial in due season, when such detention was necessary to secure their safety until trial.

2. Release is also sought under the provisions of section 9 of said act. This section is as follows: "The county or district court when it deems it proper and necessary may order a child coming under the definition of this act, and which is charged with the com-order being first so entered. And after conviction of such child so prosecuted for a misdemeanor the court shall have full power to stay the execution of such judgment and to release such child on good behavior or other such orders as the court may see fit to make. Whenever it shall appear to the district court of this state that any person being prosecuted in such court for a felony is a child under sixteen years of age, such court shall have authority to order such prosecution dismissed and to order such child to be committed to the juvenile court of the county in which such district court is being held, for such action and disposition as said juvenile court may think proper in the premises. Or the said district court may after conviction on trial of such child, suspend judgment and order the defendant released on good behavior or such other orders as in the judgment of such district court would be for the best interest of said child."

It is doubtless true, under this act, that it lies within the discretion of the district judge to require the dismissal of a prosecution of such child and to order his commitment to the juvenile court of the county in which such district court is being held for such action as said juvenile court may think proper in the premises. But, if this be a proper construction, it is undoubtedly true that where, as in this case, the court entertains a writ of habeas corpus and declines to release the relator, who brings himself under the provisions of this act, it is to be conclusively assumed that the court so trying the case had exercised his discretion not to order a dismissal of such cause. The crime charged against relator is a felony, and, except for his age, a capital felony. We do not believe, as presented, he is entitled to a discharge.

The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

CABRERA v. STATE

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Feb. 8, 1909. On Rehearing, May 12, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction: "Do the facts * * * show such a general disregard of human life as necessarily includes the formed design against the life of the person slain? If so, the killing, if it amounted to murder, will be upon express malice"—is not misleading, as leading the jury to believe that in the opinion of the court accused was a dangerous and reckless person.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

2. HOMICIDE (§ 286*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the evidence showed that accused and a codefendant approached at night decedent's room, and fired a shot into the room, killing him, an instruction that, if the acts showed such a general disregard of human life as necessarily included the formed design against the life of decedent, the killing, if amounting to murder, would be on express malice, was not open to the objection that it instructed on a phase of the law not raised by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 423*)—CONSPIRATORS—DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where two or more persons act together, any acts or declarations, prior to the commission of the crime, illustrating the purpose and animus or probable co-operation of the parties in the commission of the crime, are admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 989-1001; Dec. Dig. § 423.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 423*)—ACTS OF CONSPIRATORS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence showed that accused and his codefendant acted together in murdering decedent, and that they went together at night to decedent's room, and fired a shot into the room, killing decedent, any evidence that they were present, or were probably present, at the time of the killing, together with evidence that the codefendant had been seen during the evening of the night of the killing going to the place of the killing, was admissible, though there was no testimony that accused and his codefendant were acquainted prior to the night of the homicide.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 423.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 349*)—FLIGHT OF ACCUSED—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The state may prove, as a circumstance to show flight of accused, that he was incarcerated in the general jail in a distant city, charged with the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The error, if any, in admitting evidence that accused had been incarcerated in the general jail in a distant city, charged with the crime, was not prejudicial to accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1036*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—EXCEPTIONS.

To take advantage of the admission of improper evidence, accused must object to its introduction and preserve his exceptions to the overruling of his objection; and a requested instruction directing the jury not to consider such testimony is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1036.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence showed that accused and his codefendant went to decedent's room at night, and fired a shot into the room, killing decedent, and there was nothing to show that they were not acting together, and the court charged fully on the law of principals, and stated that the jury must believe that accused and his codefendant were acting together at the time of the commission of the offense, the refusal to charge that the mere presence of accused at the time and place of the killing did not justify a verdict of guilty, unless the state showed that accused, knowing the unlawful intent of his codefendant, aided him in the commission of the offense, was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, on the trial of a Mexican for murder, there was nothing suggesting the necessity of a charge that the jury must not allow the fact that accused was a Mexican to influence them, the refusal to so charge was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1979-1985; Dec. Dig. § 814.*]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, on the trial for the murder of a district judge, there was nothing suggesting the necessity of a charge that the jury must not consider the bare fact that decedent was a district judge, the refusal to so charge was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1979-1985; Dec. Dig. § 814.*]

11. HOMICIDE (§ 183*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, on a trial for homicide, the state proved that on the morning after its commission, and after the discovery of decedent's body, a large number of men, marching in file and headed by a band, stopped in front of decedent's house, and that the men were accompanied by a number of armed men, and the court admitted testimony that accused was legally carrying arms, the refusal to permit accused to read a decision of the Court of Criminal Appeals, determining that a third person had authority to commission men to carry arms, and to show that the third person had deputized accused to carry arms on the day after the homicide, was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

12. HOMICIDE (§ 174*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

A witness may testify that he sighted through an aperture where a slat was broken out of the shutter on the window of the room in which the decedent was sleeping at the time he was shot, towards the body and wound of decedent, and that the window of the room was immediately behind the body of decedent and immediately behind the wound in his back, was admissible, though the body had been removed and replaced; that fact going only to the weight of the testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

13. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 478*)—EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY—COMPETENCY.

An expert on gunshot wounds is competent to testify that the bullet which killed decedent entered in the back near the right shoulder blade, and that the point of exit was the wound in front of the body on the left breast.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 478.*]

14. WITNESSES (§ 48*)—COMPETENCY—CONVICTION OF FELONIES.

The offenses of illicit retail liquor dealing, and of receiving and concealing smuggled property in violation of the federal statutes, though punishable by fine or confinement in the penitentiary for a term greater than a year, are not felonies, within Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 768,

A witness, impeached by proof of statements contradictory to his sworn testimony, may be corroborated by proof that he had made statements similar to his testimony.

16. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 721*)—FAILURE OF ACCUSED TO TESTIFY—COMMENT BY PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

Where a witness for the state, on cross-examination, in reply to a reiterated question, said, "Yes, sir; there he [defendant] is; you can ask him," and no protest was made to the statements by accused, the action of the prosecuting attorney, in inadvertently repeating what the witness stated, was not a comment on the failure of accused to testify.

17. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1174*) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—MISCONDUCT OF JURY.

Where the court found that a juror was not influenced by a communication received from a third person to the effect that the juror's horse had run away while his children were riding, but that the children were not hurt, nor by occurrences in the jury room, the irregularities were harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1174.*]

18. HOMICIDE (§ 253*) — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to justify a conviction of murder in the first degree on the theory that accused was a guilty participant in the assassination of decedent.

On Rehearing.

19. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 784*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Where witnesses testified that accused and a codefendant went in the nighttime to the room of decedent, that a shot was fired by one of them into the house, killing decedent, and that the following morning the body of decedent was found in the room with a fatal bullet wound, the refusal to charge on circumstantial evidence was proper.

Ramsey, J., dissenting.

Appeal from District Court, De Witt County; James C. Wilson, Judge.

Alberto Cabrera was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. B. Creager, A. I. Hudson, Lackey & Le-wright, and J. L. George, for appellant. Davidson & Bailey, F. W. Seabury, J. I. Kleiber, Dist. Atty., and F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and his punishment assessed at life imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Between 12 and 1 o'clock at night on No-

and the district attorney the other. The homicide occurred on the night preceding an election. Judge Welch was at said city holding court at the time. Appellant and Jose Sandoval approached the window of Judge Welch's room, where he was sleeping, and remained standing there, close together, side by side, for a short period of time. One of the two fired a shot into the house through the window where Judge Welch's body was found. He was shot from that point through the back. The evidence shows only one shot was fired in that neighborhood that night. The evidence shows that the wound that killed Judge Welch was fired from the window as indicated. Judge Welch's body was within four or five feet of the window, inside of the room, in the direction from which the shot was fired. Only one bullet hit the body. Cayetano Pena and his wife, Jesusa Gonzales de Pena, are the two witnesses who testified that they saw appellant and his codefendant fire the shot as above detailed. They furthermore testify they were sitting at their home, some 120 feet away from Judge Welch's room, and early in the night appellant and his codefendant passed by their house and they recognized them. Some time thereafter, while they were still sitting, one in the door, and the other on the bed looking out of the door, in the direction of Judge Welch's window, they saw appellant and his companion approach and fire the fatal shot. They then saw them run away hurriedly from the window. They swore positively that it was appellant and his codefendant. If the testimony of the witnesses is to be believed, as disclosed by this record, the motive for the killing was political, and appellant and his codefendant were the hired assassins of political enemies of Judge Welch, since there is nothing to suggest that appellant and his codefendant had any personal animus against the judge. No one knew that Judge Welch was killed until early the next morning, when the district attorney entered the room and found that he had been shot as suggested. Alarm was given, various parties gathered in, and after continued search appellant was some time subsequently arrested in old Mexico, and brought back to this state on a proper requisition and tried for this homicide. The jury gave him murder in the first degree, with life imprisonment. Pena and his wife testified that, at the time that appellant and his codefendant passed their house, Judge Welch was sitting just inside of the east door of his room, and there was a light burning in the room. Appellant and his codefendant passed on, going to the north of the house in which witnesses lived, then turned to the right, and disappeared. Some time after these parties passed, Judge Welch's light went out, and his door was closed. About an hour after they passed the first time, the same two parties, coming from the same direction as before, walked up to the east window of the south room of Judge Welch's house and fired a shot. They did not know which fired the shot. There are other circumstances in the record that we do not deem necessary at this time to rehearse.

Appellant's first ground of his motion for a new trial complains that the court erred in failing to charge on circumstantial evidence. To support his contention he cites us to the following authorities: Early v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 344, 97 S. W. 82; Guerro v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. R. 445, 80 S. W. 1001; Trijo v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 127, 74 S. W. 546; Poston v. State (Tex. Cr. R.) 35 S. W. 656; Leftwich v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 489, 31 S. W. 385; Polanke v. State (Tex. Cr. R.) 28 S. W. 541; Montgomery v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 20 S. W. 926; Deaton v. State (Tex. App.) 13 S. W. 1009; Puryear v. State, 28 Tex. App. 73, 11 S. W. 929; Beason v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 442, 67 S. W. 98, 69 L. R. A. 193. The case of Puryear v. State, supra, and other authorities noted by appellant do not sustain his contention. There is a long line of authorities in this state, holding that, where the defendant is in such juxtaposition to the crime committed as the facts in this case show, a charge upon circumstantial evidence is not required. The latest case that our attention has been called to, sustaining this modification, is the case of Dobbs v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 630, 103 S. W. 918. In discussing the question as to whether the issue of circumstantial evidence was presented in that case, we used this language: "The state's testimony shows that a witness a couple of hundred yards away heard a gun fired at the spot where deceased was subsequently found, and in a few moments saw appellant and his son (his son having a gun) coming from the direction of where the deceased was subsequently found. The witness walked up the road in company with another witness and discovered deceased lying on the ground shot, and these facts place appellant in such juxtaposition to the crime, of themselves, from the state's standpoint, so as to preclude the issue of circumstantial evidence." So we have in this case the parties thoroughly identified as being the parties who fired the shot that killed the deceased. There was no one else in the room, or that slept in the room. So we hold that the court did not err in failing to charge on the issue of circumstantial evidence. In passing upon this case, on the question of habeas corpus, as reported in 110 S. W. 898, we there stated that "the testimony for the state is positive and unequivocal that re-lator, in company with another, killed the deceased by shooting him through a window at night," and we meant by that statement evidently that the facts placed appellant in such juxtaposition to the crime as to exclude any other issue than that of positive testimony. The state, in its brief, in addition to the Dobbs Case, supra, cites as also pertinently bearing on this question the following authorities: Keith v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 63, 94 S. W. 1044; Kidwell v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 264, 33 S. W. 342; Holland v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 172, 74 S. W. 768; Beason v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 442, 67 S. W. 98, 69 L. R. A. 193; Polk v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 495, 34 S. W. 633; Adams v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 470, 31 S. W. 372; Baldwin v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 589, 21 S. W. 679; Crews v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 533, 31 S. W. 373; Bennett v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 216, 22 S. W. 684; Hardin v. State, 8 Tex. App. 653.

The fourth assignment of error complains of the following charge: "Do the facts and circumstances in this case show such a general disregard of human life as necessarily includes the formed design against the life of the person slain? If so, the killing, if it amounted to murder, will be upon express malice." Appellant insists that said charge is erroneous, because it instructed the jury as to a phase of the law and as to an issue not raised by the evidence in this case, and for the further reason that said portion of the court's charge was calculated to lead the jury to believe, and did lead the jury to believe, that in the opinion of the court this defendant was a dangerous and reckless person. This is simply an illustration used by the court to get the jury to understand what murder in the first degree is. Furthermore, the circumstances surrounding this case to our minds do not show that the charge was not altogether pertinent to the facts. There is no error in the charge.

Appellant insists the court erred in refusing the following charge: "That there is no evidence before you showing or tending to show that the defendant ever saw or knew Jose Sandoval prior to and at the time of 11 o'clock p. m. of November 5, 1906. Therefore you are instructed that any act, acts, conduct, or conversation of or with said Sandoval prior to said time of 11 o'clock p. m. of November 5, 1906, cannot be considered by you in this case as in any way tending to criminate the defendant on trial herein." And in this connection appellant further complains that the court erred in failing to give the following charge: "That the testimony of Rufino Clark, Francisco Martinez, and Rafael Moreno was admitted before you upon the statement of the state's counsel that the materiality thereof would be subsequently shown; but, inasmuch as this has not been done, the court now instructs you that you will not consider for any purpose the evi-or any other person, or to any message sent to him or received by him on said night (if they were sent or received by him). Said evidence must not be considered by you for any purpose whatever; and it is your duty as jurors to wholly disregard the same, exclude it from your minds, and try this case as though you had never heard it." The record shows that the court permitted Rafael Moreno to testify for the state that he was overtaken on the night of November 5, 1908, by Jose Sandoval, while riding on the road from Roma to Rio Grande City, at or about 9 p. m., and that he rode with said Sandoval about a league in the direction of Rio Grande City; that he conversed with Sandoval, and that said Sandoval then left the witness and rode on ahead toward Rio Grande City. It is shown by Rufino Clark that he saw Sandoval at a ranch five miles below Roma, in Starr county, and on the road leading from Roma to Rio Grande City. This testimony was entirely germane and pertinent. The evidence for the state shows that the parties were acting together in the commission of this murder, and any evidence going to show that they were present, or were probably present, one or each of them, or both, was germane and pertinent, and it follows, therefore, that the court did not err in refusing the above-quoted charges. Where two or more parties act together, any acts or declarations, prior to the consummation of a crime, that will illustrate the purpose and animus, or probable co-operation, of the parties in the commission of the crime, are admissible. The sheer fact that there was no testimony showing that the parties were acquainted prior to the night of the homicide does not show that they did not act together. If they met for the first time on the night of the homicide, the testimony that he was going to where he met appellant would be clearly admissible. It would be only a circumstance to be argued to the jury to indicate that they did not.

The trial court permitted the district attorney, John I. Kleiber, to testify for the state that while he was in the City of Mexico, he saw this defendant incarcerated in the general jail in said city. Appellant objected to this testimony, as shown by bill of exception No. 4, on the ground that same was irrelevant, immaterial, and prejudicial to the rights of this defendant, and upon the further ground that it was not competent nor proper for the state to prove that this defendant had been in jail for this or any other offense. It was proper for the court to permit this testimony. It is a circumstance to show flight, or at any rate it could not prejudice the rights of appellant, to prove that he was in jail charged with this crime.

The twelfth error complained of was the to wit: That the fact (if it is a fact) that the defendant was extradited from the Republic of Mexico, or the fact that he did or did not undertake to defeat said extradition by legal process or otherwise, cannot be considered by you in this case as in any way tending to incriminate this defendant. Every citizen has a right to appear before the proper officials and defend himself in an extradition proceeding, and the fact that he does so is not and cannot be considered by you as a fact or circumstance showing or tending to show his guilt or innocence as to the crime with which he stands charged." It is contended that the court was in error in refusing this, because evidence was introduced to show that appellant, while in the City of Mexico, fought the extradition from the United States and resisted being returned from the asylum country. He asserts in the statement in his brief that exception was reserved to this testimony in his bill of exceptions No. 3, found on pages 31 and 32 of the transcript. An inspection of that bill does not verify this contention. There is nothing in the bill indicating that appellant fought extradition. The exception was reserved to the statement of District Attorney Kleiber that he went to the City of Mexico on business connected with extradition of the defendant, and there the bill ends, so far as this phase of the testimony is concerned. It may be conceded, so far as this charge is concerned, that testimony was introduced that appellant fought the extradition; but, in order to take advantage of this, the defendant must object to the introduction of this testimony, and, if the court overruled the objection, appellant should have properly reserved his bill of exceptions; but this was not done, nor was a motion made to exclude the testimony subsequently. We find no bill of exception was reserved, but appellant seeks to use a special charge to meet his failure to except to the introduction of it. This cannot be done. A charge cannot be used to serve the office of a bill of exception in regard to the admission or rejection of evidence. Pippin v. State, 9 Tex. App. 269; Thomas v. State, 16 Tex. App. 535; Capps v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 104, 48 S. W. 517; Nalle v. Gates, 20 Tex. 315; Lanham v. State, 7 Tex. App. 126; Bohanan v. Hans, 26 Tex. 445. We therefore hold that a requested instruction cannot take the place of a bill of exception in regard to testimony illegally introduced or rejected. The authorities cited by appellant, notably the case from Missouri, are not in point, inasmuch as the question is not properly before the court. There having been no bill of exception reserved to the introduction of this testimony, it cannot be raised by a special charge. Therefore the following authorities relied upon by appellant: Johnson v. State (Tex. Cr. App.)

principle of the law of the court to give the following charge: "That the mere presence of the defendant at the time and place of the killing, if he was present, would not justify you in finding him guilty of the offense charged, unless the state has satisfied your minds by competent evidence, and beyond reasonable doubt, that he (the defendant), knowing the unlawful intent of the party committing the act, aided him by acts or encouraged him by words or acts to commit such offense. And it would devolve upon the state to prove such acts by competent evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, before you can convict defendant upon such evidence." The charge on principals in this case was very full. It covered every possible phase required under the law of this state. It told the jury in clear and succinct language that they must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the parties were acting together at the time of the commission of the offense, and it was not necessary. Furthermore, there was no testimony that parties were not acting together.

Appellant insists the court should have charged the jury that they must not allow the fact that he is a Mexican to influence them in arriving at a verdict. There is nothing suggested in this record to require such a charge, or a charge to the effect that they must not consider the bare fact that the deceased was a district judge.

The seventeenth and eighteenth assignments of error complain that the court erred in refusing to permit appellant to read a decision of this court in the case of Francisco Gonzales, which shows that Jose Pena had authority to commission men to carry arms, and, further, to show that he had deputized appellant to carry arms on the day after the homicide. It seems that the state proved that on the morning of the 6th, after the homicide, and after the discovery of Judge Welch's dead body, a large number of men, marching in file and headed by a band of music, marched by and stopped in front of the house of the deceased, and that said men were accompanied by a number of armed men carrying rifles or Winchesters and pistols. Appellant insists that this testimony was calculated to impress the jury that the parties were unlawfully armed, and that this defendant was one of the parties. It was pertinent for the state to show that appellant, in company with others, was armed the next day following the homicide. The court admitted testimony to the effect that appellant was legally carrying arms, in order to rebut the presumption created by the state's evidence; but we do not think a decision of this court holding that one Pena was authorized to issue a commission to bear arms was admissible under any view of the case. Nor do we think the testimony of sufficient mosignificance of error complain that the court erred in permitting John I. Kleiber to testify, for the state, in substance and effect, that during the next day after the commission of the homicide he sighted through the aperture where the slat was broken out of the shutter on the east window of the room in which the deceased was sleeping, and in which the body was found, on the morning of November 6, 1906, towards the body and wound of the deceased, and that the east window of said room was immediately behind the body of Judge Welch, and immediately behind the hole in the back of said body. This testimony was admissible. The testimony of Dawson to the same effect was also admissible. The fact that the body had been removed and replaced would only go to the weight of the testimony.

The twenty-fourth assignment of error complains that the court erred in permitting the witness Dawson to testify, for the state, that the bullet which killed the deceased entered in the back near the right shoulder blade, and that the point of exit was the wound in front of the body, on the left breast. The bill shows the witness was an expert on gunshot wounds, and there was no error in admitting his testimony. The testimony of the witnesses as to the condition of the window blind and all other circumstances surrounding this homicide were admissible.

Bill of exceptions No. 14 complains that the court erred in permitting the district attorney to frighten and intimidate the witness Rafael Moreno. The qualification contradicts this contention.

The thirty-first error complains that the court erred in admitting before the jury the testimony of Cayetano Pena, a state's witness, over the objection of appellant, and upon the defendant's challenge as to the competency of said Cayetona Pena as a witness herein; it being shown by uncontroverted evidence introduced by defendant, at the time said witness was offered by the state, that he had twice been convicted in the United States District Court at Brownsville, Tex., of felonies, to wit, the crime of illicit retail liquor dealing, and the crime of receiving and concealing smuggled property, both in violation of the federal statutes for such cases made and provided, and introduced in evidence. Under the United States statutes defendant might legally be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for a term greater than one year in duration; appellant urging the incompetency of said witness under the terms of section 3 of article 768 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of Texas of 1895. In the case of Reagan v. United States, 157 U. S. 301, 15 Sup. Ct. 610, 39 L. Ed. 709, Bannon v. United States, 156 U. S. 464, 15 Sup. Ct. 467, 39 felony. In the case of Pitner v. State, 23 Tex. App. 366, 5 S. W. 210, in passing upon a similar question, we held that the defense, in order to make the judgment available for the purpose of disqualifying the state's witness, should have proved by the law of Kansas that forgery was a felony. We therefore hold that the witness was not disqualified to testify, since, according to the federal decisions, the offense of which he was convicted was not a felony, and could not come within the terms of the statute invoked by appellant to disqualify him from testifying.

The thirty-third error complains that the court erred in permitting Cayetano Pena to testify for the state that he told his son-in-law, Pancho Trevino, in April, 1907, what he (Pena) claims to have seen and heard on the night of November 5, 1906, pertaining to the murder of Judge Welch, as shown by bill of exceptions No. 21. This testimony was objected to by appellant on the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and hearsay; furthermore, that said Pena had not been impeached by any other witnesses at the time he was allowed thus to testify. But the record and bill does show that he was impeached by proving contradictory statements to the one sworn to in the trial of this case. Therefore it was permissible to prove what he told his son-in-law.

The thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth assignments show the following: While the witness Jose Maria Gonzales, a witness for the state, was testifying, on cross-examination by defendant, in reply to a question, the witness stated, "There he is; ask him," pointing to the defendant at the time he made said remark. From this circumstance Mr. Seabury, counsel for the state, in his argument to the jury, undertook to impress upon the jury the idea that said witness Gonzales was an honest and truthful man, as shown by the remarks made by him and his pointing at the defendant. The defendant said that said argument and conduct of said Seabury constituted and were in fact an indirect, but exceedingly harmful, allusion to the failure of this defendant to testify herein in his own behalf. The bill of exceptions in reference to the matter presents it as follows: While the witness was on cross-examination he was asked: "Q. What were the first words Cabrera spoke to you? A. In what direction was the shot? Q. What did you reply? A. I told him it was that way (indicating). Q. Is that all you said, just 'that way'? A. Yes, sir; towards the courthouse. Q. Did you mention his name? A. No, sir. Q. Are you sure those are exactly the words he used? A. Yes, sir,

A. He said, 'We were drinking coffee when I heard the shot, and I do not know in what direction it was.' Q. He had just told you what direction he thought it was, had he not? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then he turned around and told you that he had been taking coffee and did not know in what direction it was? A. Yes, sir; you can ask him; he is there present (indicating the defendant). Q. Did any other words at all pass between you at that time? A. No, sir. Q. Are you sure the words you have given here under oath are the exact words that passed? A. Yes, sir." During the discussion of the above facts by Mr. Seabury, he referred to this incident in the trial of the case, which had been brought out by examination of appellant's counsel, whereupon an objection was immediately made that appellant had not testified, and the court, passing upon this matter, indorsed upon the bill of exceptions a complete and full statement of the facts, and stated, in his explanation attached to the bill, that Mr. Seabury never referred to any matter that could be construed as intimating to the jury anything about appellant not having testified. In the light of the explanation of the court, we cannot hold it was an allusion to defendant's failure to testify. The bill is quite long, and we have copied same as fully as the length of this opinion will justify. There appears to have been no protest at the time the witness made the statement on the part of the defense's counsel. The witness replied, "Yes, sir; there he is; you can ask him;" but appellant's counsel never protested against it, and the attorney inadvertently repeated what the witness stated. We cannot say that this violates the statute invoked in this case.

There is a long bill of exceptions in this record complaining of the argument of Hon. A. B. Davidson. In the light of the explanation of the court, the argument was legitimate, or at least was a retort upon the argument made by appellant's counsel, and provoked by them.

The thirty-ninth error complains of the misconduct of the jury in this: After the jury had heard part of the argument in this case, but before said argument was finished, and before the jury received the charge of the court herein, one Charles Lenz approached H. C. Huebotter, who was then and there a duly impaneled and sworn juror in this case, at or near the restaurant of said Lenz in the city of Cuero, Tex., and stated to said Huebotter that he (Lenz) had received a telephone message to the effect that said Huebotter's horse had run away with his buggy, in which his (Huebotter's) children were riding, and had torn up the buggy, and that the horse was badly cut up by barbed wire, but his children were not hurt, and for him not to be uneasy. Attached to the bill presenting this matter is the affidavit of the juror; but the district judge found as a matter of fact that said affidavit was untrue, and the juror trying this case was in no way influenced by what occurred, and the juror Huebotter had stated facts not true, and that the verdict of the jury was in no way affected by what occurred in the jury room, nor what occurred in the presence of Mr. Lenz. To present these matters in detail would be unnecessary, since, after a very careful reading of same, we hold that the irregularities complained of were harmless to defendant, and did not in any way jeopardize his rights, or increase his punishment, pains, or penalties. Other misconduct of the jury complained of by appellant has also been reviewed by us, and we find no ground for reversal of the judgment by reason of such misconduct.

We have discussed with much candor and detail all the assignments of error raised by appellant in this very voluminous record, covering in all nearly 1,000 pages, and feel constrained to say that a verdict in consonance with justice and with law and the procedure of this state has been secured. The record clearly shows that appellant, in conjunction with his codefendant, acting as a cowardly tool of a lot of political assassins killed the district judge of his district. That the evidence is as clear and cogent as it might be cannot be said, but that it is sufficiently convincing to show to any fair mind that the appellant was one of the guilty participants in the assassination, we take it, there can be no cavil about.

So believing, and so finding the record, the judgment is in all things affirmed.

RAMSEY, J. (dissenting). I am not prepared to agree to the judgment of affirmation. It seems to me that the court should have charged the law of circumstantial evidence. Again, I am inclined to think that the special charge No. 10, requested by appellant's counsel, should have been given. Nor am I sure there are not other errors in the record. I may write my views later.

On Rehearing.

BROOKS, J. This case was affirmed at the recent Dallas term, and now comes before us on motion for rehearing.

The first ground of the motion is that this court erred in finding, as a matter of fact, that Cayetano Pena and his wife testified that they "saw appellant and codefendant fire the shot" alleged to have killed the deceased. If appellant's counsel had construed the opinion as a whole, as all opinions must be construed, they would have seen that this criticism was gratuitously incorrect, since it will be shown by a reading of the opinion that the following statement is therein made, to wit: "Judge Welch was at said city holding court at the time. Appellant and Jose Sandoval approached the window of Judge Welch's room, where he was sleeping, and remained standing there, close together, side by side, for a short period of time. One of the two fired a shot into the house through the window where Judge Welch's body was found. He was shot from that point through the back." Further along in said opinion will be found the following statement: "Only one bullet hit the body. Cayetano Pena and his wife, Jesusa Gonzales de Pena, are the two witnesses who testified that they saw appellant and his codefendant fire the shot as above detailed." Further along in said opinion appears the following: "They saw appellant and his companion approach and fire the fatal shot." The latter statement, when construed in the light of the two previous statements, shows that appellant's criticism is hypercritical, since this court never attempted to say, nor does it now understand the record to be, that appellant himself fired the shot that killed the deceased; but the evidence does conclusively establish the fact out of the mouth of the two above-named witnesses that appellant, in direct co-operation with Sandoval, was present when the shot was fired that killed the deceased through the window about 12 o'clock at night, and they either walked or ran away together after said shot. It is immaterial whether they ran or walked away. They left. They were at the house at an unseemly hour. They had previously approached the house, and, seeing deceased sitting in his door, disappeared, and a short while after deceased's light was blown out or turned out. Then they approached the window, as stated, and fired a shot into the back of the deceased, according to the testimony in this record. The witnesses did not say, nor does the opinion of this court say, that the witnesses stated which one of the two defendants fired the shot. Nor does it matter under the law of principals which one fired the shot.

Appellant further insists that both of the state's witnesses testified that they did not see any weapon whatever in the possession of either appellant or Sandoval, upon either of the occasions testified to by said witnesses. Moreover, said witnesses testified that they did not see the flash of any pistol or rifle shot at the time they claim to have heard the shot fired by either appellant or Sandoval. The testimony of the witness Cayetano Pena, found on page 492 of the statement of facts, in reference to the immediate facts of the shooting, is as follows: After testifying that he saw appellant and Sandoval together a short while before the killing, he then testified as follows: "The second time that I saw these two men come by my house that night, they were going this way (indicating by reference to map). This is the corner of my house, and this is the house of the judge (indicating). When I saw these two men there the second time that night, they went this way (indicating), to the window of the judge's room. After they got to the window, and the shot was fired, they went this way (indicating by reference to map). I did not see any pistol or gun on either of these two men when they passed my house either time that night. When the shot was fired, I did not remain sitting in the door. I went to the window. I went to the window in that same house of mine. After I had opened the window, my wife stood at my back behind me. My window there had a blind on it. When I went to the window the blinds were shut. When I got to the window I opened it—opened one of the shutters. When they fired the shot, I was at the door. At the time I saw them go to the corner of the priest's yard, the wall, I was at the window. When these two men left the corner of the house in which I lived and went to the window of Judge Welch, they went in a natural walk, side by side. Before they fired the shot, they remained at Judge Welch's window very little, hardly any time, and they just stood there a few moments after they fired the shot." Furthermore, the witness testifies: "The window into which I saw this shot fired was the first window on the part towards the river. After the shot was fired, they went steadily away. They went in an ordinary pace. That is what I saw—that they went in an ordinary pace. I did not know that night that Judge Welch had been killed." Now, as to whether the witness means, by saying "they went steadily away" from the scene of the homicide, that they ran or walked, as stated above, becomes utterly immaterial. They left the building together. They went there together. They went at a time when no possible inference of innocence could be attached to either, at the dead hour of the night, walking together up to the window. One of the two fired a shot into the house; the deceased lying a few feet from the window. The mark of the weapon from which the fatal ball was fired was impressed on the window blind, and on a direct line, as the witnesses testify, with the back of the deceased, and that the hole in his back was made by the bullet; the bullet having passed probably through his heart.

The second ground of the motion complains that the court erred in finding as a conclusion of fact that said Cayetano Pena and his wife saw appellant and Sandoval run away hurriedly from the window of Judge Welch's house. The last statement above made answers this criticism upon the opinion of this court.

The third ground of the motion is that the court erred in its conclusion of fact that "if the testimony of the witnesses is to be believed, as disclosed by this record, the motive for the killing was political, and appellant and his codefendant were the hired assassins of the political enemies of Judge Welch." Appellant insists that this conclusion of the court is absolutely unsupported by and contrary to the record facts, and urgently requests this court to set out such of the testimony of the witnesses as this court considers to be sufficient to prove that appellant was the hired assassin of political enemies of Judge Welch. Appellant further submits that this court has given a most lame and impotent reason for this finding of fact, viz., because there is nothing in the record to suggest that appellant and his codefendant had any personal animosity against the judge. Appellant further states that upon reflection this court must see the weakness of that position. This record contains something over 1,000 pages. The opinion in this case had to be gleaned from over 500 pages of statement of facts, and in sheer deference to the fact that appellant insists that the court erred in its conclusion of fact that the motive for the killing was political we will now state the substance of the evidence that we think suggests the motive for this killing. To do so in detail would make the opinion unnecessarily prolix and tedious. The evidence shows that appellant belonged to a political organization in the county of the homicide at variance with that of the district judge whom he assassinated. The party with whom Judge Welch and the district attorney affiliated and appellant's faction or party were each holding a political meeting on the night of the homicide. Judge Welch had been appealed to by one of the adverse factions to appoint part of said adverse faction deputy sheriffs to keep the peace on the next day, which was election day. This he positively refused to do. The record shows that, after his death, appellant, armed by some authority, marched by and stopped in front of the judge's office, where he was killed, in company with many of his companions, about 70 of whom, if this record is to be believed, were armed. In fact, one bill of exceptions in this record complains of the action of the court permitting the state to prove this last fact.

We did not mean to say, nor do we now state, as a matter of law, that the reason was political; but no other conclusion can be reached by the candid mind in reading this record other than the fact, as stated in the original opinion, that appellant was the hired assassin of political enemies, since the record discloses that appellant and the deceased were unknown to each other, or at least that they had no sort of bickering, misunderstanding, or personal animosity one to the other. The record is replete with various circumstances showing the most intense animosity existing among the crowd that appellant ran with against the judge and his efforts, as he conceived them, to enforce the law. We are not here called on, nor are we attempting, to pass upon the justness of the insistence; nor are we intimating the illegality here of appellant's insistence from a political standpoint. With those matters we have naught to do, and care less. Therefore, if appellant had no personal animosity, conceding him rational, and no plea of insanity was interposed for him in this case, and the record being full and replete with suggestions of political animosity, the killing, occurring at the dead hour of night, when the victim was asleep, cannot be designated otherwise than as an assassination. Then the evidence showing to our minds conclusively that appellant committed the assassination, and political animosities being ripe and manifest from a careful inspection of this record, we cannot ascribe the motive to any other reason than as stated, and we reiterate and here state that it is apparent to this court that the basis and motive for this homicide and assassination was political. In addition to the above detailed facts, we make this addition thereto as demonstrating a clear and rational basis for the conclusion, stated in the original opinion, that the motive for this killing was political. Appellant and companion were seen at the meeting or headquarters of the political faction with which they affiliated and opposed by the faction with which the deceased affiliated before killing. The deceased commissioned members of his side and had refused to authorize those of the opposing faction to act as police or go armed the following day—election day. Appellant and his companion were seen and talked to by Gonzales just after the killing. Appellant claimed the shot was fired in the direction of headquarters of his faction, while Gonzales said the shot was fired in the direction of deceased's room; that appellant then had a gun concealed, only the barrel of which could be seen by Gonzales during the conversation; that they separated, appellant and confederate going towards headquarters, where he (appellant) was subsequently seen.

The fourth ground of the motion complains that the court erred in its conclusion of fact that after continued search appellant was some time subsequently arrested in old Mexico. The record shows, as appellant insists, that he remained in the county where the homicide occurred for some time after the homicide, and that he did not leave there for Mexico until after the adjournment of the district court of Starr county for its spring term, 1907. It is furthermore true that the principal witnesses against appellant, viz., Cayetano Pena, his wife, and Jose Maria Gonzales, lived in Rio Grande City, the place of the homicide; but the record does show, and this is the only statement we were attempting to make, that appellant was captured after continued search in Mexico, and extradited, and brought back to Texas—he resisting arrest and doing all he could to escape being brought back to Texas. This is the only thought we meant to suggest, and the only legitimate conclusion that could have been drawn from the statement in the opinion.

The fifth ground of the motion complains that the court erred in finding that the trial judge committed no error in failing to charge on circumstantial evidence and in refusing to charge upon circumstantial evidence, and feels that when this court begins to discuss those cases, and attempts to state just why they are not in point upon appellant's contention here, the court will reach the conclusion that it erred in its original finding upon this question of law. In the first place, as stated in the opinion rendered in this case on habeas corpus (53 Tex. Cr. R. 466, 110 S. W. 898), the court unanimously held that the testimony of the state is positive and unequivocal that relator, in company with another, killed deceased by shooting him through a window at night. We have re-examined all the authorities that appellant cites, together with a great many other authorities, and have no occasion now to change our opinion that this is not a case of circumstantial evidence. This case was tried by the court below under the guidance of the habeas corpus opinion, which stated that the evidence was positive; and while we would not hesitate to reverse, if we thought we were in error, still, after a thorough and careful review of all the authorities, we hold, as stated, that it is a case of positive testimony. In appellant's motion for a new trial he insists that none of the authorities cited support this court in the previous opinion. In the case of Polk and Watts v. State, cited in the original opinion, we have a case, as we think, exactly in point with reference to the facts of this case. The dying declaration of the deceased covers all the salient features of the state's testimony, and from it we quote. After stating he went to a literary society at the church, he then says: "After the exercises broke up, the two Parsons boys got company and started home. The balance of the boys, including myself, followed along behind them, so we could get together after they took the girls home. The reason why we did this was because we feared something would happen. After we left the church, we saw three boys coming behind us, and we stopped to see who they were, and they passed us on the other side of the street, and I saw who they were. They were Austin Polk, Biz Watts, and Mack Hughes, who had one eye. They walked on ahead of us for some piece, and after they had passed us they got on the same side of the street we were on, but kept ahead of us, and we saw them turn out of the road into some bushes, in a run, when they stopped. At this time we were about 50 feet from them, and I heard them snapping what sounded like a pistol. I told Mack not to shoot; that it was me. Mack jumped up and started to run, and, as he did, all three of the boys commenced shooting. I could tell that Mack Hughes was shooting at me, but could not tell which way Austin and Biz were shooting, but think they were shooting at the Parsons boys. I was looking at Mack Hughes, and had been talking to him before he shot me. Mack Hughes was the one that shot me. I know this. There were several pistol shots fired. I don't remember how many though; but all the boys were shooting. At the time of the shooting it looked as if Austin, Mack, and Biz were shooting at the Parsons boys, who were with the girls, as well as me, and the boys who were with me." Now, the above is practically the state's case against the appellants Polk and Watts, the decision now under consideration. Mack Hughes was tried separately. The record does not show what was done with his case. Now, a casual reading of the above statement, and certainly a full reading of the decision last cited, will show that the deceased did not swear that appellants Polk and Watts shot him at all, but swears positively that they did not. The evidence further shows that it was dark. He had seen these two defendants go into the woods with Mack Hughes, and Judge Hurt found that it was not necessary, in the trial of these two defendants, to charge on circumstantial evidence, using in that connection the following language: "There was no error in omitting to charge upon circumstantial evidence. See, also, Kidwell v. S., 35 Tex. Cr. R. 264, 33 S. W. 342. There was positive evidence of the parties participating in the main act, the killing; and, if not, the facts were in such close juxtaposition as rendered such charge unnecessary."

The facts show that Judge Welch and the district attorney, Kleiber, were sleeping in a small, one-story house; each occupying rooms adjoining. The appellants walked up at the dead hour of night, and one or the other shot into the window, inflicting a wound in the back of the deceased while sleeping. Now, then, if the evidence had shown that this shot waked Kleiber up, and he should have run into the room and discovered appellants walking "steadily away," could it be rationally insisted that the case would have been a case of circumstantial evidence? Certainly not, especially when the evidence of the two Penas is considered. Then the only difference between this condition and the record before us is that Kleiber did not enter the room immediately, but came within five or six hours, or at least when he waked up in the morning and found the judge dead. Pena and his wife saw one of the parties shoot into the room. There was no one else in the room, and Kleiber, when he awoke, went into the room and found the judge dead. Would the fact that he went then, instead of immediately, render the case one of circumstantial evidence? Certainly not. Where the evidence shows that a certain party is sleeping alone in a room, and another party is seen to approach said room at the dead hour of night and fire into said room, the fact that his dead body is not found until the next morning does not per se make it a case of circumstantial evidence. Suppose Pena and his wife, after hearing the shot fired into the room, and, after appellant and his companion steadily walked away, said Pena and wife approached the house and found deceased lying on his cot dead; would this have made it a case of circumstantial evidence? We apprehend not, and yet they could not swear they saw the bullet kill the deceased; but they could swear, as Kleiber did swear, that there was no one else in the room, and the physical facts show that the bullet which was fired into the window killed the deceased. But, as stated in the original opinion, if these are circumstances only going to show the fact that deceased was killed by appellant, still the facts are in such juxtaposition to each other as not to call for a charge on circumstantial evidence.

Appellant in his zeal insists on an impossibility of this court, in that he suggests that we point out a decision exactly like the one here under consideration. The philosophic principle has been laid down by many courts that, where the facts are in such juxtaposition one to the other as in this case, the court does not have to charge on circumstantial evidence, and we apprehend, with the utmost confidence in the statement, that no court of last resort would hold the facts in this case warrant a charge upon circumstantial evidence.

So believing, the motion for rehearing is in all things overruled.

RAMSEY, J. (dissenting). Dissenting opinions are usually in vain, and for the most part useless. I am always reluctant to dissent from an opinion representing the deliberate convictions of my Associates, and heretofore, in the few instances in which I have found myself unable to agree with them, I have done no more than to briefly note that fact, with as brief a statement of the substance of my own opinion; but the importance of the questions involved in this case and that decent respect for the opinion of the profession which every judge should entertain have constrained me to set out at length the particular reasons upon which my own opinion is based. I am sure, if I write with earnestness, it will be understood that it is without disrespect to the opinion of the majority and is due to the strong opinions which I entertain. In my judgment, and as I read and interpret the law, the opinion of the majority overturns the ancient landmarks of the law, is a departure from the settled rule in this court, and our Supreme Court for more than a half century, is wholly unsupported by any authority, in the face of all the authorities, and wholly without legal reason as a basis. If this opinion I so entertain is correct, I ought to dissent. As to whether I am right or wrong will be judged by the reasons given and authorities cited in this opinion.

What are the facts? Stanley Welch, judge of the Twenty-Eighth judicial district, was assassinated in Rio Grande City, Starr county, Tex., on the night of November 5, 1906. The general election at the time fixed by law was to be held on the next day, and there was and had been considerable political excitement in that section of the state, and particularly in Rio Grande City. The body of the lamented judge was found on the morning of November 6th, between 7 and 8 o'clock. His death undoubtedly resulted from a gunshot wound, and he had apparently been dead for several hours when found. There was a bullet wound in his back, one in his breast, and two wounds on his left arm, evidently made by the same bullet. He was occupying, when killed, the south room of a two-room one-story brick house; the adjoining or north room being occupied by John I. Kleiber, the district attorney. To the east of the office building, in the south room of which Judge Welch's body was found, and at a distance of about 120 feet, was a one-story building, one room of which was occupied by Cayetano Pena and Jesusa Gonzales de Pena, his wife. This last-named house was situated upon a rise about seven feet above the elevation of the Welch house. The view from the two houses was practically unobstructed. There was no fence around the Welch house. To the north lay Third street, 60 feet in width, upon the opposite side of which was what is known as the "Priests' inclosure," occupying about a half block, and surrounded by a brick wall about seven feet in height. To the south of the Welch house were vacant lots, and then a small jacal. The county courthouse is situated at the head of Britton avenue, about 500 feet north of where Judge Welch was killed. The Catholic Church is diagonally across Britton avenue, northwest from the Welch house, and facing south upon the corner of Britton avenue and Third street. Two political meetings were being held in Rio Grande City on the night of the assassination. One meeting was held at what is known as the "Red Corral" or club, where the Democratic adherents were gathered, and the other at the "Blue Corral" or club, where Independent and Republican forces were assembled. The former was held in what is known as the old courthouse, and the latter in what is known as "Juan Hinojosa's inclosure." The Rio Grande river runs approximately east and west at the foot of Britton avenue, south of the courthouse and Welch house. The cot upon which Judge Welch's body was found lying was directly in front of, and at a distance of from four to six feet from, the east window of his room. The south room was separated from the north room by a brick partition, in which was a white pine door, with a transom over same. None of the witnesses knew, or even suspected, that Judge Welch had been killed until between 7 and 8 o'clock on the morning of the 6th of November.

There is no evidence in the record to show any motive whatever on the part of either appellant or Jose Sandoval to kill Judge Welch, except as same may be implied by the circumstances. We think the inference is fair that his death was due to political animosity, though there is nothing to show any special reason that his death should have been sought by either appellant or Sandoval. There is no evidence to show that either of said parties was personally acquainted with Judge Welch, nor was there any evidence to show that appellant and Sandoval were acquainted with each other, or had ever met, prior to the night on which the judge was killed. Sandoval lived in Mexico and was a citizen of that republic. Appellant had lived in that section many years, and the testimony indicates that he was an adherent of the opposition party to Judge Welch, though he was not specially prominent in it; nor was there a hint in the testimony of any words spoken by him or to him touching Judge Welch. It is simply shown that there was an intense feeling and hostility between the factions, and that he belonged to the Independents, and, later, the fact that Judge Welch was killed. The testimony upon which a conviction was sought, except a few wholly incidental circumstances, rests in the evidence of Jesusa Gonzales de Pena and her husband, Cayetano Pena. There are many contradictions between these witnesses. They contradict themselves repeatedly, their testimony is contradictory as same was delivered on habeas corpus trial, and on this trial they contradict themselves and contradict each other. Cayetano Pena was shown to have been charged and convicted of more than one offense growing out of the customs laws, and his wife, Jesusa Gonzales de Pena, is shown to have been a witness of such dense ignorance and incapacity as to almost stagger belief. She testified that she did not know how old she was, did not know the date of the birth of any of her 11 children, did not know the date of her own marriage, did not know how many windows there were in the front of the house in which she had lived at the time of the murder for a year, did not know what year it was at the time she testified, did not know what month or day of the week it was upon which she was testifying, and did not know the year in which the shot was fired which killed Judge Welch. She also testified that she did not know what north, south, east, or west was; that she did not know how to read or write, or tell the time by the clock or a watch. Her testimony, however, on this trial, was to the effect, in substance, that on the night of the murder she and her husband were in the house above described; that on that night, between 11 and 12 o'clock, her husband was sitting in the door in a chair, and she was ting inside his room in front of the door; that there was a light burning in his room; that while she and her husband were sitting there, and while Judge Welch was also sitting in his door, appellant and Jose Sandoval passed in front, and within six or seven feet of the door where witness was sitting; that they were coming from the direction of the river, and were going toward the north. Witness knew them both well; that they passed along in front of the house, along the walk, and said nothing; that some time after these two men passed Judge Welch's light was extinguished and his door closed; that about an hour, more or less, after they passed the first time, witness saw appellant and Jose Sandoval coming from the same direction in which they had come before, but before getting in front of her door they turned off towards Judge Welch's office, and, walking upright and in a perfectly natural manner, walked to the window of Judge Welch's room; that when they got to the window they stood close together a few moments, and then witness heard a shot fired; and that in a short time after the shot was fired appellant and Sandoval walked off in the direction of the priest's house. She did not know, nor did she indicate by any hint in the testimony, which of the two men fired the shot, though she testifies that the shot was fired at the east window of Judge Welch's room; that she did not see that either of the parties had a rifle or a pistol or firearm of any kind on either of the two occasions when she saw them; that she heard no other sound, nor did she see the flash of any pistol or gun. She also testified that after the firing of the shot she suspected nothing wrong, and did not know Judge Welch had been killed until she was so told the next morning. She testified, as did her husband, that they agreed that they would tell no one of the circumstance of the night before, because they were afraid to do so; nor did they say anything about the fact to any one until several months thereafter.

Jose Maria Gonzales testified that he was living in Rio Grande City, at a place between Judge Welch's office and the Blue Club; that he had been attending the two political meetings, which were going on on the night in question, and went home about 12 o'clock, and had partly undressed, when he heard a shot in the direction of the Welch office, and got up, dressed, and walked out in the street near his house, and met appellant and another man whom he did not know, coming from the direction where he had heard the shot; that appellant carried what witness took to be a rifle partly concealed under his coat. This witness had some conversation with appellant, in which appellant said in substance they had so desired; but they came on toward him, walking at a natural gait, walked straight up to where he was in the street, and spoke in a perfectly natural way as they passed him, asking him in which direction was the shot. It was shown that a message had been sent to Mexico on November 5th for Jose Sandoval, and the witness Clark saw him on this side of the river in Texas that evening about five miles from Roma; and he was on horseback, and was at the time on the way to Rio Grande City. It was demonstrated to my mind by quite a number of circumstances that the shot which killed Judge Welch passed through the east window of his office, entering the body in his back, and causing his death. It is a fair inference, I think, from the entire record, that the motive for this killing was political animosity, due to the activity, as believed, of Judge Welch in respect to political differences between the two contending factions, and particularly to his refusal to grant the right to bear arms to the party of which appellant was a member. In this connection it should be stated that in a general way the testimony of Cayetano Pena supported that of his wife as to the movements of appellant and Sandoval as to the firing of the shot and their presence at the window when the shot was fired, and for the purpose of this discussion (whatever might be my own opinion as a matter of fact) it will be assumed that the evidence is sufficient to show that appellant and Sandoval were at the window of Judge Welch's house, and that one or the other of them fired a shot into said window.

If this be true, and so much be conceded, two questions arise: First, whether or not, even if it be conceded that appellant fired the shot, it was a case of circumstantial evidence, and should the court have given in charge to the jury an instruction in respect to that character of testimony? Second, the question whether, while the evidence shows that one of the two parties committed the murder, without showing which one of them, and the other did nothing—that is, committed no overt act and spoke no word, as testified to by any witness—and that his connection and relation with the killing is to be gathered from his presence and other circumstances connected with the killing, was not a charge on circumstantial evidence required? It is well settled in this state, where the case is one depending alone upon circumstantial evidence, the court must charge upon that character of evidence, whether requested to do so or not. Hunt v. State, 7 Tex. App. 212-236; Howard v. State, 8 Tex. App. 53-59; Ross v. State, 9 Tex. App. 275; Ward v. State, 10 Tex. App. 293-297; Barr v. State, 10 Tex. App. 507-513; Robertson v. State, 10 Tex.

State, 13 Tex. App. 309-318; Lee v. State, 14 Tex. App. 266-270; Dovalina v. State, 14 Tex. App. 312-314; Cooper v. State, 16 Tex. App. 341-344; Black v. State, 18 Tex. App. 124-130; Puryear v. State, 28 Tex. App. 73-77, 11 S. W. 929. It is as well settled that, where the case is not dependent alone on circumstantial evidence, the court is not required to charge upon that character of evidence. Tooney v. State, 8 Tex. App. 452-456; Buntain v. State, 15 Tex. App. 515-520; Hunnicutt v. State, 18 Tex. App. 498-522, 51 Am. Rep. 330; House v. State, 19 Tex. App. 227-240; Smith v. State, 21 Tex. App. 277-307, 17 S. W. 471. These general principles are so well settled that the propositions need no discussion, and the rule seems to be recognized in the majority opinion. That this was a case of circumstantial evidence, judged by the decisions of this court heretofore, we shall hereafter undertake to demonstrate. None of the cases cited by the court in the original opinion herein were cases of circumstantial evidence, and none of them are in point in support of the conclusion reached by the majority, except the case of Beason v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 442, 67 S. W. 96, 69 L. R. A. 193, which sustains, as I believe, my position. All the other cases cited in the original opinion of the court were cases of direct testimony, and in not one of them was the testimony circumstantial. To establish this conclusion let us review the cases.

The first case cited, Dobbs v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 629, 103 S. W. 918, was a case in which the wife of the appellant testified in express terms to the fact of the killing. Indeed, it was not denied. The issue in that case was an issue of self-defense. We find in this opinion, written by Judge Brooks, this statement: "Appellant, however, insists the court erred in failing to charge the law of circumstantial evidence. Appellant's wife saw the difficulty, and testifies to the shooting of deceased by her son; appellant being present at the time." We have examined the original record, and note that the statement of facts on this trial was returned, under the direction of this court, to the court below, and we cannot, therefore, do more than quote from the original opinion; but on the second appeal of this case (113 S. W. 923), wherein the opinion was written by myself, this statement appears: "Mrs. Dobbs had testified on direct examination that when the gun fired she was just north of her house putting up some chickens; that she heard deceased say in a loud voice, 'Pap is going to swear lies on me about that land;' that she ran up to where she could see them, and, when she got within 40 or 50 yards from where her husband was, she saw deceased jump out of the buggy and grab her husband's gun; that they scuffled over the gun awhile, and it was finally broken, her son fired." Thus it will be noted by an inspection of this case that Dobbs was an active participant in the encounter and that the act of the killing was in response to his invitation and by his procurement, and that this fact was testified to by an eyewitness. Of course, it is obvious that in this case no charge on circumstantial evidence was required.

The next case cited is the case of Keith v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 63, 94 S. W. 1044. That was not a case of circumstantial evidence, and is not in point at all. Judge Davidson, who wrote the opinion in that case, gives a brief statement of the facts. I quote enough of it to show what was in his mind in passing on the issues raised therein: "The evidence shows that when appellant reached the residence, and after being introduced to deceased, they sat awhile conversing on the gallery. Appellant mentioned his mission; that he had come there, not for the purpose of talking with him about his family troubles, but to talk with him in a quiet and friendly way about his treatment of his (appellant's) mother. As soon as this statement was made, deceased got up from his position, where he was sitting on a cot, and started in the direction of appellant, with his right hand reaching towards his pocket, where he had a knife, remarking, 'If that is your game, I will kill you,' accompanying the expression with an oath. Appellant told him to stand back; he did not want to hurt him; did not want any trouble with him; not to come on him. Deceased continued to come, until he came to close quarters. Four shots were fired, and deceased was killed." In discussing the question of the necessity of a charge on circumstantial evidence, Judge Davidson disposes of the matter in this summary fashion: "We do not believe that the court erred in failing to charge on circumstantial evidence. Appellant admitted the killing. The circumstances place the two parties on the gallery together, and appellant in such close juxtaposition to the killing that, even without the confession, it would not, in our judgment, be a case calling for a charge on circumstantial evidence. He did all the shooting."

The facts of the case in Kidwell v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 264, 33 S. W. 342, are somewhat obscure; but as we understand the facts, interpreted in the light of the companion case of Moffatt v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 257, 33 S. W. 344, it is no more in point than the case we have just mentioned. In the course of the opinion, Judge Henderson, speaking for the court, says: "The appellant in this case asked a charge on circumstantial evidence, and contends in that connection that, although the accomplice was present and saw the killing, yet, it being dark, and at the very time" of the killing he being some was an accomplice furnished no reason why a charge should be given on circumstantial evidence, and at the time the fatal stroke was given he was so near and in such juxtaposition, though he may not have seen which one of the two parties inflicted the stabs and blows, several of which were fatal, yet, in the view we take of the case, it would make no difference, as to their guilt, which one may have caused the wounds." As above stated, the facts are not given in the Kidwell Case; but in the companion case of Moffatt v. State it is recited by the witness Lay as follows: "That, after Pratt fell, Moffatt and Kidwell came to where witness was standing, and said that they had killed Pratt. Kidwell had a dirk in his hand, carrying it with the point hanging down." So that it is obvious in this case that this was not a case of circumstantial evidence, and has no sort of relevancy to the case under consideration here.

The case of Holland v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 172, 74 S. W. 763, is still less in point. That was a burglary case. The evidence showed that one Schroeder, whose house was burglarized, had just left the room and closed the door, and that two or three minutes after this he went downstairs, and his wife went upstairs to their room, and he heard her scream; that when his wife reached the room she saw defendant in there. Here the fact that the door was closed is shown by positive testimony. The fact that the appellant entered the room and was in the room is shown by positive testimony. Appellant admitted being in the room, though he says the door was partly open, and gave the explanation that he was looking for a closet. There is no discussion in this case, further than a remark that the court did not believe the evidence was circumstantial as to the breaking, and hence it followed that the court did not err in refusing to charge on circumstantial evidence.

The case of Polk v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 495, 34 S. W. 683, which is discussed at some length in the opinion on motion for rehearing, is perhaps least of all the cases cited in point. There it unqualifiedly appears that the guilt of appellant was shown by positive testimony. Let us examine that case. Judge Hurt, speaking for the court, in the course of his opinion says: "There was positive evidence of the parties participating in the main act, the killing; and, if not, the facts were in such close juxtaposition as rendered such charge unnecessary." In the dying declarations of Rufus Jamison, the deceased, among other things, he says: "Mack Hughes was the one that shot me. I know this. There were several pistol shots fired. I don't remember how many, though; but all the boys were shooting. At the time of the shooting, it looked as if Austin, Mack, and the parties in same were animatively disclosed by positive testimony, and this fact is expressly recognized by Judge Hurt, who was not likely to be mistaken in his opinion.

Nor is the case of Adams v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 470, 31 S. W. 372, in point. That was a case of horse theft. The facts in the case, as briefly stated in the opinion, are that appellant was "seen by the witness Lowe on the day of the alleged theft, just outside of said pasture, near a road which led along the fence; and the defendant was just ahead of the colt, which seemed to be following him. He told said witness, as he passed him, that the colt had just jumped out of the pasture, and that he was following him, and that he was going to drive him back. At some distance further on, in the same road, which led along the pasture fence, he was met by the witness Counts, and was then driving said colt along the road. Defendant offered to sell the said colt to the witness Counts. He told him that the colt had the distemper, and that he had been riding him, and he was afraid it would not hold out to make the trip he was on." This is positive evidence, first, that when first seen appellant disclaimed any knowledge of the animal, and when seen a very short time thereafter he was driving the colt and set up a claim of ownership to it. No more positive testimony of a taking could well be imagined. It was not necessary, in order to make the evidence of the taking positive, that any one should have actually seen him put his good right hand on the horse's mane and put a rope around him; but the facts are shown by positive testimony that the property did not belong to him, that when first seen he recognized this fact and stated he was going to drive the colt back, and that at some distance further on in the same road he was met by another witness, who saw him driving the animal and heard him in person set up a claim of ownership to the colt. There is no discussion by Judge Hurt in this case, but he disposes of the claim and contention that the court erred in not charging on circumstantial evidence in this language: "If said colt had jumped out of the pasture, as stated by appellant, said witness Lowe saw him at or about the time he was in the act of taking possession of the colt, and the witness Counts met him in a very short time thereafter. But if it be conceded that no witness saw him in the very act of taking possession of said colt, yet the testimony places defendant in juxtaposition to the main fact, which is the act of taking in this case, so that the omission to give the charge on circumstantial evidence was not calculated to injure defendant's rights."

The next case referred to, Baldwin v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 589, 21 S. W. 679, is at all, is not of sufficient importance to require a reversal. The missing hogs were tracked a short distance from the place at which they were taken, and discovered in the possession of defendant and his brother, who were driving them, and who drove them on home and butchered them. While no witness saw defendant actually take possession of the hogs, yet the criminative circumstances are in such 'juxtaposition to the main fact' that the omission to give the charge was not calculated to injure defendant's rights."

The next case referred to, Crews v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 533, 31 S. W. 373, was a case of positive testimony. That was a case of murder, and is well briefed by both counsel for the state and defendant, and seems to have received more than usual attention both by counsel and the court. Judge Henderson in that case says: "While it is true in this case that no witnesses testify that they saw the act of killing, yet the facts and circumstances of this case are of a character to place defendant in such proximity and juxtaposition to the fact of killing as to render such a charge unnecessary, and, besides, the statements of deceased and Mrs. Crews were in the nature of positive evidence." The whole facts, taken together, show beyond the shadow of a doubt that the evidence was positive and true, as the following statement will show: "The little boy in the house heard his mother, just before she received her death wound, cry out to Crews not to shoot, and the father, as soon as they went to him, as a part of the res gestæ, when asked who did it, said that it was Crews, and that he robbed him, and rode off on his horse Joe; and he was seen a short time thereafter, near the scene of the homicide, riding the deceased's horse, with his gun." So that here is the spontaneous cry of a little child, testifying to the declaration of his mother, in her extremity and just before she received her death wound, crying out to Crews not to shoot, and the father, who was also killed at the time, spontaneously stating as part of the res gestæ that it was Crews who did the killing. There can be no doubt that this was a case of positive testimony.

Nor is the case of Bennett v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 216, 22 S. W. 684, in point. That, also, was a case of positive evidence. Let us examine the record. The opinion is quite brief, nor are the facts given at any length; but in paragraph 3 of the opinion, written by Judge Simkins, this statement was made: "The court did not err in failing to tell the jury that this was a case wholly of circumstantial evidence. The evidence was direct and positive as to appellant's guilt, as testified to by an eyewitness, and, if the shooting was not seen, the facts were in such close wrote the opinion in that case, among other things, states: "The evidence in this case is not wholly circumstantial in a legal sense. The presence of the defendant at the scene of the theft, and his active confederation with the actual thief, were established by evidence of a positive nature. The rule as to circumstantial evidence has not yet been extended to a case of that character."

These are all the cases cited in the majority opinion, except the case of Beason v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 442, 67 S. W. 96, 69 L. R. A. 193. With the reasoning of that case, nor as to its conclusion, we have no complaint to make, nor do we differ from it in any respect. The opinion in the case is written by Judge Brooks, and contains intrinsic evidence of the most careful consideration, and is in clear accord, as I believe, with my views, and if the doctrine applied in that case is to obtain here, under my view, this case should be reversed. The following lengthy quotation from the opinion in that case is a better statement of my views than I could myself write: "It has been held that a charge on circumstantial evidence is necessary only when the case rests 'solely' and 'alone' upon circumstantial evidence. * * * The word 'solely' or 'alone' has been repeatedly construed in this state by every court of last resort, and the decisions of this state have been followed with approval by the courts of other jurisdictions. The rule is this: That it is only necessary where the main fact, or, as one case puts it, 'where the gravamen of the offense,' or, as another case has it, 'where the act of the crime,' rests solely upon circumstantial evidence, that then it becomes a case known as a case of circumstantial evidence, requiring a charge upon that. In the Buntain Case, 15 Tex. App. 515, Judge White used the following language: 'If a court were required to charge the law of circumstantial evidence in all cases where reliance was had upon circumstances to establish any particular fact, then, indeed, there would be but few, if any, cases in which such a charge would not be required; but such is not the rule. A charge upon circumstantial evidence is only required where the evidence of the main facts essential to guilt is purely and entirely circumstantial.' In the Hanks Case, 56 S. W. 922 (opinion rendered by this court), in reference to whether or not positive evidence of uttering a forged instrument, where the indictment was for the forgery, was sufficiently direct to lift the case out of the real or circumstantial evidence, the following language was used: 'We are aware of the rule, and we adhere to the same, that when the main fact constituting the gravamen of the offense is proved by direct testimony, and the intent merely with which the act was case the discussion of the principles applied to burglary is involved. At the risk of being prolix, but in order that the same may be made clear, we quote copiously from that case: "Mr. Starkie, in his work on Evidence (section 862), says: 'The force of circumstantial evidence being exclusive in its nature, and the mere coincidence of the hypothesis with the circumstances being, in the abstract, insufficient, unless they exclude every other supposition, it is essential to inquire with the most scrupulous attention what other hypotheses there may be which may agree wholly or partially with the facts in evidence.' The court in Beavers' Case said: 'We can conceive of no hypothesis by which, in the order of natural causes and effects, the facts proved can be explained consistently with the innocence of the prisoner; and this is the true test of circumstantial evidence. It excludes all reasonable doubt of the prisoner's guilt.'" 58 Ind. 531, 537. But this principle applies only to proof of the act, and not to proof of the intent. Accordingly, in a case of burglary, an instruction which contained the following sentence was properly refused: "Where a criminal intent is to be established by circumstantial evidence, the proof ought to be not only consistent with the defendant's guilt, but it must be wholly inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than that of the defendant's guilt." The court said: "This rule is proper when the act which is claimed to be criminal is sought to be established by circumstantial testimony. But when the act is proved by direct testimony, and all that remains to be found is the intent which accompanied the act, and which may be inferred from the circumstances accompanying the act, then this principle does not apply." In the reversal of this case upon its former appeal this court said: 'Now, while it is true a confession to the burglary would take the case out of the rule, yet a confession to theft alone, under the circumstances of this case, would not make the charge of burglary a case of positive evidence. The possession of the corn recently after it is stolen would only be a circumstance pointing to the burglary, for the corn may have been stolen, and yet no burglary have been committed.' See Wooldrige v. State, 13 Tex. App. 443, 44 Am. Rep. 701; State v. Calder, 23 Mont. 504, 59 Pac. 909; Leeper v. State, 29 Tex. App. 154, 15 S. W. 411. Therefore it is clear that, where the act constituting the main essential fact of a crime is testified to by direct evidence, it is not a case of circumstantial evidence. But where the main fact, or the act constituting the crime, is shown by indirection, it is a case of circumstantial evidence, although the intent may rest upon positive proof. What is the main fact, or the act of a crime, robbery, rape, murder, or any other felony. The main essential fact of burglary is the breaking and entering of the house. The commission of the crime intended when the house was entered need not be executed, and yet the crime is complete. Martin v. State, 1 Tex. App. 525. In this case, both upon this trial and upon the former appeal, no human eye saw, nor did a human lip testify to, the actual breaking of the house alleged to have been burglarized. That it was broken and entered depends solely upon inferences and deductions. It was arrived at by the method of exclusion. True, appellant pleaded guilty to the theft of the corn; but what was the effect of his plea? It was merely an admission of all the facts alleged in the complaint and information charging theft. 'A plea of guilty,' says Mr. Bishop, 'is a recognition of whatever is well alleged in the indictment.' Crow v. State, 6 Tex. 334; Doans v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 468, 87 S. W. 751."

The facts of the case last cited are more fully set out in the opinion on the first appeal, which will be found in Beason v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 63 S. W. 633. The syllabus in that case briefly states the facts, which, as I believe, are much stronger than the facts of this case. This syllabus is as follows: "Where, in a prosecution for burglary, there was no positive evidence as to the entry by breaking, the fact that the defendant had pleaded guilty to theft committed in the alleged burglary, and stated that he would turn state's evidence against his codefendants, and that he knew enough on them to send them to the penitentiary, did not amount to a confession of the burglary, and it was error to refuse a charge upon circumstantial evidence." It was also shown in that case that the property taken from the burglarized house was soon thereafter found in the possession of Beason, and it is stated, as a reason why the charge on circumstantial evidence should have been given, that the fastenings were of a flimsy character, and evidently such as might be blown open by the wind, or, the house being an outhouse, some person might in the meantime have pushed some of the doors open and so left them, and because the state's evidence showed that after 12 o'clock on the night in question one of the doors was open.
